THE P R E F A C E.

THE Edition we here give our Readers of this History or Chronicle of England, being very much altered from those which have been published before, it is necessary to give some Account of those Alterations, and of the Reasons why they were made.

In the first Place, in Sir Richard Baker's Part, very many Mistakes in the Names of Places and Persons have been corrected; which before were not only an Eye-sore, but sometimes an Hindrance to the Reader; though here and there the Printer's Mistakes have frustrated our Pains in these Amendments. It was not possible to make these Corrections in every Place; because the Author himself being, as it should seem, little acquainted with the modern Languages, has disguised some foreign Names in such a Manner, that it is not easy to know where to look to set them right. But this happens but very seldom, and where it does, it is upon Occasions of little Importance.

The Continuation by Edward Phillips to the Year 1660. has been contracted; yet we may safely say, without any Prejudice to the Reader. For that Writer appears plainly not to have rightly understood the Nature of the Work he was upon; so that he has (quite contrary to the Method he should have followed) inserted many publick Pieces, Lists of Names, and other Things of little Moment, at full Length, when he ought to have given only the Substance of them; and this he has done not only in Matters of Consequence, but in such as are not so. All Pieces therefore of that Kind have been left out; and such a brief, but clear, Account given of their Contents, as will abundantly serve the Reader's Purpose. Some needlessly diffuse Accounts of Transactions have been also abridged; and some superfluous Pieces wholly omitted; such as Lists of the Nobility, &c. And thus the whole Work has been so contracted, that with the Addition of the second Continuation to our own Times, the Bulk of the Book remains within a Trifle the same that it was before. The Account that Author has given of the King's Restoration, though a good deal more prolix than was necessary, being taken from Sir Thomas Clarges's Mouth, who had a great Part in those Transactions, and also from the Duke of Albemarle's Papers, is left just as it was. Only some Papers that were inserted at Length, and whose Substance might as well be given in few Words, have been omitted.

Lastly, That the Book might contain an entire Series of English History, a second Continuation has been added of the Reigns of the several Princes of our Country, till the Death of King George I. But this last Work being new, the Writer thinks it will be proper, if not necessary, to give some Account of it by Way of Preface.

I was very sensible that it would be utterly impossible for me to compose the History of a Nation, divided into two furious Parties, in such a Manner as to give no Offence to any. However, as the Undertaking was proposed to me, I did not think the displeasing of some Persons a sufficient Reason for declining it; being of Opinion, that such a Work, if managed with that Impartiality, I thought, I felt within myself, might be not altogether without its Use. Upon this Inducement I set myself about it, with this main End in my Eye; namely, to give the Readers a just Representation of the Face of Things, during the Times I was to write about; free from that Paint and Varnish, with which Party Prejudice on both Sides has generally coloured and disguised it.

To

The P R E F A C E.

To answer this Intention I entered upon this Work, at least I endeavoured to do so, without any Bias upon my Mind, except one, the Love of my Country. I obliterated all former Notions received from Education, Discourse, or Reading, in Relation to Actions or Characters of any Persons or Parties; and turned my Mind into a Rasa Tabula, that the Impressions I should receive from this more accurate Examination I was going to begin, might not be confounded with others taken in upon weaker Grounds. With this Temper I surveyed the several Actions and Persons I wrote about; my only Care being to find out the Truth, without the least Concern what Man, or what Side would be hurt or advantaged by it.

As to the Materials for this Work, I was very differently furnished. For the Reign of King Charles II. I found good Store of Helps, more than sufficient for a Work in which Brevity was to be consulted. I have made Use of Sir William Temple, Dr. Welwood, Mr. Echard, the Bishop of Salisbury, and other Writers of inferior Character, which I perused with Care. The History of King James II. has been given us by the Author of the Life of King William III. in a very impartial Manner; and with many useful and entertaining Particulars. Many important Informations also may be gathered from the three Authors last mentioned above.

In the two succeeding Reigns little or nothing of the secret History has been published; but in Recompence it has happened luckily enough, that the important Transactions in them were chiefly of a publick Nature. So that from the ordinary Accounts that have been sent Abroad, it must not be very difficult to draw an instructive and entertaining History, if a Writer be furnished with the Talents necessary to set them in an agreeable Light.

The Truth is, as this History was not designed to be voluminous, it was the less necessary to look into a great Number of Authors, who would only furnish Particulars, for which by the Nature of the Work, there could be no Room. However, as People are naturally more inquisitive about the Times that are near them, than those that are more remote, we have thought it proper to gratify them so far, as to be somewhat more prolix than Sir Richard Baker was in those Reigns that he has described.

As to the Method, I have digested it into the Form of Annals, setting the several Transactions in each Year in as proper an Order as I could. I have been careful to give a methodical Account of the Proceedings of Parliament, without which an History of our Country, especially in these late Times, must be very imperfect. If the Reader finds any Thing delivered here with less Prolixity than he may think it deserves, I would put him in Mind that it was not my Intention to give a compleat History of the Times. That would require, besides Leisure, Capacity and other Helps, which were wanting to Me, a larger Compass than that I was confined to. My Aim was to give such a Picture, as should be like; but it was not my Design to touch exactly every small Lineament. Nevertheless, as I have used both Diligence and Impartiality in marking the chief Lines, I am in hopes that the Resemblance will not be altogether inaccurate. Only as to the Reign of his late Majesty, and the latter End of Queen Anne, I have barely given the Series of Matters of Fact; the secret Springs of the Transactions in those Times being not yet laid open. I have also in the last Reigns omitted the Article of famous Men; for I need not tell any considerate Reader, how justly I should be censured for pretending to distinguish the different Merits of so many extraordinary Persons as have appeared of late.

All that is here written must be taken upon Trust; for it would have been uneasy and tiresome to the Generality of Readers, if I had upon every Occasion quoted my Vouchers, or given my Reasons for what I lay down. So that they must rely on my Judgment for the Conclusions I have drawn from the Materials I have consulted. I am sensible indeed that those Conclusions will be disapproved by a great many; and it is no more than I expect. As to those Readers, whose Abilities and Knowledge exceed my own (if any such should condescend to cast an Eye on what I have written) I shall thankfully receive, and gladly submit to, their Correction. Of such Persons as have not looked carefully into these Things, but have taken their Notions from a slight or cursory Examination, or perhaps from none at all, I would only desire them to do by me, as they would do by others in the like Case. If they were to consult with a Workman about

about building an House, they would certainly be willing in many Things to submit their own Opinions to his, and think it reasonable so to do. Not but that on every other Subject they may be a great deal wiser, and more knowing than that Man; but in this particular Matter, his greater Experience makes amends for his inferior Understanding. Therefore I think it but a reasonable Request of such Readers, that if they find my Representation of Things sometimes different from what they imagined before, they would not hastily throw the Book aside, but rather consider, whether one who has been obliged to make a deeper Enquiry into these Things than they themselves have done, may not possibly have good Reasons sometimes to differ from them a little; especially, when I assure them, that I have used the utmost Care (as I said before) to free myself from any Prejudice, for or against any Person, or Party whatever.

A great many Persons, I know, bring with them a Set of Opinions concerning these late Transactions; and their Way of judging of such Writings as this is by their Agreement or Disagreement with that System. Others expect, that a Relation of this Kind should be like the Chain of Reasoning in a Mathematical Demonstration, producing some Truth resulting from the whole; and that this great Truth should be a Panegyrick on one Party, and a Satire on the other. If there are Readers who expect to find this done, I give them Warning to look no farther, for they will certainly be disappointed. There cannot be in my Eye a more wretched Employment than that of a Writer, who madly espouses the Cause of one Party; nor is there any Thing more ridiculous, and at the same Time more odious, than the miserable Pains taken by such Men to obscure and palliate the Truth, when it flies in the Face of their favourite Faction; the strange Paradoxes they will advance, and their Misrepresentations of the plainest Facts. But this Turn of Mind I have endeavoured to avoid; and as far as I was able, have taken Care to give every Thing its proper Name; and in our homely Phrase, to call a Spade a Spade. For the Truth is, both Parties have been guilty of great Errors, and both have done wise and excellent Things. I have been sparing in Censures and Commendations, except where they were notoriously deserved; upon which Occasions I have distributed them with Impartiality to all Sorts of Persons. In some disputed Points I am content to relate the bare Matter of Fact; in others, I give the Arguments pro and con with the utmost Force and Clearness I was capable of; without Partiality to either Side of the Question, and without interposing my own Opinion.

For my Part, I am much inclined to think that Persons of both Parties generally mean the same Thing. For I do not see how the Generality of a Nation can possibly have any other Views than to live peaceably, and enjoy their Possessions, and the Fruit of their Labours in quiet. This End is what all certainly agree in: And as to the Means, there is not a great deal of Difference, if Men would consider Matters a little coolly. For all the National Security and Prosperity we can enjoy, depends principally upon the Form of our Constitution; and this great Truth is not more certain in itself, than it is deeply imprinted upon the Minds of all our Countrymen. Ask any Man that knows the Meaning of the Words, and he will tell you, that he is for a King and Parliament with all his Heart; and twenty to one, but he will add some passionate Expression against any who should think otherwise. Ask the Question of a Nonjuror, of a Church-Man, of a Dissenter, they will all make the same Answer. And that this Principle dwells in Mens Hearts as well as on their Tongues, appears from two remarkable Examples; the Restoration and the Revolution; at both which Times, when all Things were subverted and disjointed, the whole Nation, however divided in other Points, called with one Voice for the ancient Constitution, and settled under it in a Moment. And it may be observed even in behalf of the Nonjurors, whose Principles are thought the least favourable to Publick Liberty, that no Men more strenuously opposed King James's Exorbitances, than many of those whose Consciences would not permit them to take the Oaths to King William.

For these Reasons I resolved to take as little notice of our Party Divisions as possible; unless it were to animadvert upon the Madnefs of them both. The Truth is, both Parties have so often changed their Principles and Proceedings, that to follow them through all those Mazes, would be not only an invidious but an uncertain, and sometimes impossible, Work; not to mention that it could serve to no Use but to revive those Discords which now, by God's Goodness, are in a good Degree laid asleep. I have even avoided the mentioning of those Names by which the two Parties styled themselves, unless in a very few Places, and where I was obliged to speak of them, they are always mentioned with equal Respect. I must confess however, as the Intrigues of the Factions in a State are very often the Spring and Source of Publick Transactions; so if a true and impartial Account of the secret Designs of the Leaders in both Parties, and of the Influence they had on the publick Steps, during the Times here described, could be procured, it would be of very great Use. But this ought to be the Work of one who has been intimately and personally conversant with the Intrigues he relates, and who tells nothing but what he has seen and heard himself; not of those who have spent their Lives in Obscurity and Retirement.

I said just now that a Prejudice in Behalf of our Constitution was generally rooted in the Hearts of our Countrymen. I think it will not be improper in a Preface to the History of England, if I go on to shew that this Prejudice is entirely founded on Reason. And this I shall do by taking a Survey of the several Forms of Government that have been most famous in the World, and having impartially shewn their Defects and Excellencies, I shall set our own Constitution by them for a Comparison.

One Form of Government, which is indeed that which prevails in most Nations, is the subjecting all to the Will of one Man, or what we call Absolute Monarchy. This Constitution has its Conveniences. For where Countries are governed by settled Laws, it is generally necessary to keep close to the Letter of the Law; from whence, through the Multiplicity of Circumstances that attend Humane Actions and Affairs, many Hardships and Inconveniences may arise, and many Acts of Wickedness go unpunished. All which is unavoidable, by Reason of the Weakness of Mens Understandings, who cannot foresee, nor provide for, all the Circumstances that may attend the Execution of the Laws they establish, nor all the Variety of Subterfuges that the Wit of Man, when exercised in Wickedness, is able to invent. But this Defect of written Laws is remedied by placing an absolute Power in the Hands of a wise and good Man, who not being bound by stated Rules, can accommodate himself to the several Circumstances of particular Actions, and adapt his Rewards and Punishments with incomparably more Exactness than general Laws can possibly do. Examples of this are to be met with here and there in the Course of ones Reading. With respect to neighbouring Powers, this Form of Government has also its Advantages, either for Offence or Defence; such an uncontrollable Power assembling and applying the Wealth and Strength of a Nation to any determinate End with much more Ease and Readiness than is commonly done in Countries where Orders do not come with such a resistless Force. Of this we had a famous Example in the Wars of the Confederacy with Louis XIV. in which the Kingdom of France, by the Help of this Absolute Command directing and applying her Strength, was a Match for all her Neighbours; while the Empire of Germany, though in Extent of Land, and Number of People, superior to France, stood like a Cypher in the Confederacy; purely for want of such an Authority to enable that great Country to exert its Strength in a proper Manner.

This is the bright Side of Absolute Monarchy; but the Beauty of it will soon be clouded by the Reflection that all its Felicity depends upon the Supposition that the Prince is admirably wise, and brave, and just, and good; having no Fear, but of God, and no Affection or Desire but for his People, and their Happiness. But among the long Lists of Absolute Princes, that History exhibits to us, how scarce are the Names of these Prodigies?

———bimembri

Hoc monstrum puero, vel miranti sub aratro
Piscibus inventis, vel fœtæ comparo mulæ.

But if on the other Hand, this Power be lodged in the Hands of a Fool, or a wicked Man, the Consequences are too plain to be insisted on. The Histories of all Times are full of the Miseries brought upon Mankind by that savage Wantonness and Pride which resistless Power has infused into Absolute Princes. I shall therefore pass them over, and go on to the Consideration of the Inconveniences that attend this Form of Government, where it is neither in its best, nor in its worst Condition. In the first Place, we may take notice that it is in a great Measure true of Absolute Princes, what * Guicciardine says of the Popes in his Time, that they are then called good when they are not wickeder than other People. So when we say that their Subjects live well under them, our Meaning is that they are not so much oppressed but that they can stand under their Burthens; though they are such as in free Countries would be cried out against as intolerable. Besides, let the present Reign be ever so tolerable or so good, none knows what the next Successor may prove. An Example of this we have the Moment I am writing, in one of the Kingdoms of Europe, whose Misfortune it is to be placed under an Absolute Sovereignty. During the Reign of the last Prince, the Subjects passed their Time very easily; but his Successor having taken into his Head a ridiculous Pride of keeping vast Forces on Foot beyond what his Country is able to support, they are now perhaps the most unhappy People in Europe; their very Hearts and Backs being broke with the Burthens and Oppressions attending the Maintenance of so many Soldiers. Farther, it is certain in Fact, that Absolute Rule, even though there be no remarkable Faults to be charged on the Governours, always weakens a Country, and that Liberty as certainly strengthens it. What the Reason of this is, cannot be so cleared up as not to leave room for Cavil; but this is certain, that the Thing itself appears from Experience. There never was since the World began, an Absolute Monarchy that was feared or revered for any Time, unless it derived its Greatness from a vast Extent of Territory; whereas Free States, though possessed of a small Tract of Land, have been great, and dreadful for Ages together; and shaken the most mighty Monarchies. This undoubted Fact confutes without Reply all that ill-designing or unthinking Men have ever said or dreamed in Behalf of Absolute Sovereignty.

We now come to consider the Constitution of those Republicks of ancient Time, which though long since destroyed through the Flux and Change of human Affairs, live in their Fame and Renown to this Day, and will continue to do so to the End of the World. To these we shall add the most remarkable Republicks of the latter Ages. The Wisdom and Felicity of these several Constitutions has been admired and celebrated by different Persons; and with great Reason; there being something in every one of them that challenges our Admiration.

The famous Republicks of ancient Times were Sparta, Athens and Rome. The Republick of Sparta had the following Original. The Government of Sparta or Lacedæmon having, by several Incidents, fallen into great Corruption, Lycurgus, who was a Person much revered amongst them, both for his Quality and Wisdom, persuaded the Members of the State to put themselves under his Direction; upon which he composed a Body of Laws and Frame of Government for that People, and established the same on such solid Foundations, that for seven hundred Years together it lasted and prospered, with very little Alteration from within or from without. The great End proposed by this Legislator was to form a Body of Citizens who should be trained and habituated to the Exercise of Valour, Temperance, Obedience, and all other publick Virtues. To this End, he instituted a most rigid Course of Education, which every one passed through; by which Dangers, Hardships, and whatever could form or exercise the most enduring Patience, were rendered familiar to them, and the Objects of their daily Acquaintance and Practice. To prevent the Entrance of Luxury and Avarice, he banished the Use of all Superfluities, and even of Gold and Silver Money. And the Way to Honours was so well fenced, that none could hope to enter it, but through the Gate of Merit, and in the Order prescribed by the Laws; which effectually controuled the immoderate Aims of aspiring Minds. In this Manner he provided for the Strength and Safety of his new Republick; and the Consequence answered his Intention. The Virtues he designed to infuse into his Spartans became universal amongst them; and by the wonderful Force of Custom, they came to take a Pride and Delight in so severe a Discipline; so that Antiquity is full of their hardy Valour, their Submission to the Laws, and the Sovereign Empire they maintained over their most natural and powerful Affections and Appetites. By these Arts they soon subdued the People near them; and this produced a new Order in the State. For they found that to attain that Fortitude and Temperance which their Laws required from them, the purchasing of which compelled them to such rigorous Observances, it was necessary they should not be hindered by an Attendance on the Necessaries of Life. This Task therefore they set apart for the People they had conquered; whom they brought into their own Country, and doomed them and their Posterity to be for ever the Slaves of their Conquerors. And thus the Members of this Commonwealth consisted of two perfectly different Sorts of People; the Spartans, properly so called, who were the Governors and Soldiers of the State; and the conquered People, and their Descendants, who were called the Helotes; which last performed the Offices of Agriculture, and exercised exercised those few Trades that were necessary among a People to whom Luxury was an utter Stranger. Upon these Foundations the Republick of Lacedæmon stood; and so well did they answer their Purpose, that the Spartan Name was terrible all about them; and they boasted that for six hundred Years together, no Enemies Trumpet was heard to sound in the Territory of Laconia. Their Glory might have been of a still longer Duration, had not some Successes drawn them into an Attempt their Constitution was not made for; namely, the making remote and extensive Conquests; in which though their Valour at first gave them Success, they were unable to hold it long. So that the same Persons who beheld Sparta the Mistress of Greece, saw, ten Years after, her Empire and Glory overthrown in one Battle; which the Constitution itself of Lycurgus did not long survive.

The great Defect in this Constitution of Sparta was, that the Members of the State were very unequally treated, and a considerable Part of them very cruelly used. For though the Spartans, properly so called, were happy and free, the Helotes were very far from being so. Those poor People were delivered down from Father to Son in an uninterrupted Course of Slavery; which was the more grievous because they had no Hopes of emerging from it, and because it was accompanied with the most barbarous Usage from their Masters, in order to keep their Spirits broken and depressed. The Spartans indeed were instructed in Wisdom and Virtue; but the Helotes, whose only Fault it was to be born of Parents who were Slaves, were so far from receiving such Instruction, that the very Use of those Words was forbidden them; as if they were polluted by being in the Mouths of those unfortunate Persons. And though it might be pretended when their Ancestors first were conquered, that the Victors might give what Laws they pleased to the Vanquished, yet to keep a numerous Succession of People in Eternal Bondage from Generation to Generation was an Injustice not to be excused. Yet this Institution was the Corner-Stone of their State; and the Spartan Virtue could not have been kept up, if those who were educated in it had been distracted with the Avocations that in other Places attend the procuring the Necessaries of Life. For the Discipline was so excessively rigid, that it was a full Employment for a Man's Mind to learn to subject itself to those severe Restraints. Thus we see in this celebrated Republick there was a most crying Iniquity, and indeed Barbarity, so incorporated with its very Substance that the State could not possibly have subsisted in that Form without it. Some other Blemishes of Lycurgus's Institution might be pointed out; for by overmuch Care to restrain the Corruptions of Nature, he sometimes departed too far from her. But these not being of equal Importance with the last mentioned, I shall for Brevity's Sake pass them over, and come now to consider Sparta's great Rival, Athens.

This Commonwealth is not to be compared with that of Sparta, for the Artifice of its Fabrick, or the Length of its Duration. But it appears with much greater Lustre to Posterity, through that wonderful Genius which shined out among its Citizens, and made that State the Fountain and Seat of all Knowledge, Arts and Politeness. The Frame of this Government was very plain and simple; their Polity being founded on this single Institution, that every Man, who was a Citizen of Athens, should have a Part in the publick Affairs, whether rich or poor; so that the Assembly of those Citizens, met together in a Body, were King, Lords and Commons, having the absolute Disposal of the State, and every Thing relating thereto. All Things and Persons passed in Review before them, and were submitted to their Judgments, from which there was no Appeal to any superior or collateral Power. This Institution had an Appearance of very great Equity; because every Man who had a Concern in the State, had Power and Opportunity to overlook the Management of its Affairs; and to give his Advice and Suffrage in them. But though it appeared very well in Speculation, this Form of Government would not do so well in Practice. For not to mention that the Consultations of such a Multitude must be of course very turbulent and tumultuous, it filled the State with two very great Evils; an intolerable Pride, and an Envy and Jealousy of their best and worthiest Men. For every Citizen, finding himself a Partaker in the Government of a mighty City, looked upon himself as a Sort of a King; and took State accordingly. This Pride naturally bred Envy in the worthless Part of them to all Men who became eminent; and as in all numerous Bodies those of no Merit will make a Majority, it came to pass that these Persons, envying the Fame of those whose Virtues gained them Applause, and having Power to exert their Malice, never failed to take the Opportunity. This private Envy to worthy Citizens was increased and countenanced by an Accident that happened when their Republick was first found-

The P R E F A C E.

ed. For while Solon was yet alive, who gave them their Laws, Pisistratus found means under a specious Appearance of Virtue, to seize the Supreme Authority; and held it with so fast a Hand, that he delivered it to a Successor. This Accident bred in this State an incurable Jealousy of extraordinary Men; and introduced their famous Ostracism; which was a Proceeding by which the Body of the Citizens had Power to banish any Person of dangerous Popularity, without giving a Reason for it. This publick Sanction being given to private Malice, the Consequence was that the best and bravest among the Athenians, who had raised their City to its highest Pitch of Glory, were all of them ill-treated by their ungrateful Countrymen; nor is there one Example of an eminent Citizen in that Commonwealth, who escaped without some notable Mark of their barbarous Envy and Jealousy; which cost many of them even their Lives. But these unnatural and unjust Precautions proved the Ruin of that very Constitution they were designed to preserve; for not to mention the just Vengeance of Heaven attending such Ingratitude, a State formed like theirs could stand upon no other Foundations than the Wisdom and Virtue of particular Persons; who might direct and influence the Resolutions of an ignorant and giddy Multitude; whereas in Athens, those Pillars of the State were always thrown down as soon as they appeared fit to bear it up and support it. For this Reason, their Democracy was of no long Duration; and the same Century that saw its Greatness and Power, beheld its final Ruin.

We are now come to consider the Constitution of Eternal Rome; that immortal Name, the very Sound of which strikes Awe and Veneration. The Government of this State was not formed all at once, like the two Republicks above-mentioned; but in the Time between Romulus and Julius Cæsar admitted of several Variations. For at first, Rome was governed by Kings; till the Violence and Tyranny of one introduced the total Extirpation of that Form of Government. Then the Supreme Power was vested in the Consuls, assisted by the Senate; till the People, finding themselves grievously oppressed by the Nobles, procured a great Alteration in the Government, by introducing the Tribunes to be their Representatives in the Senate, and their Protectors upon all Occasions; which State of Things continued till Corruption introduced a Sovereign Lord. These Changes, and some others of less Importance, though made as it were by Chance, and suited only to particular Emergencies, were yet, by the Designation of Providence, which had appointed that City to be Mistress of the World, so happily brought in, and with such proper Circumstances, that instead of weakening, they added every Time new Strength and Vigour to this growing State, so that she went on, spreading her Conquests from Nation to Nation, till all the Earth submitted to her Empire.

I shall now make two or three Observations on the Roman Commonwealth. And first, it seems to me, that if Rome continued so long without a Master, as it did, it was owing not so much to the Frame of its Constitution, as to that extraordinary Publick Spirit and Virtue among its People, which is every where admired and celebrated. The Fences that guarded her Freedom were so weak, that as soon as the Roman Virtue began to decline, ambitious Men got over them without any Trouble; and when once her Liberty was fallen, it never rose again. This Opinion is confirmed, if not demonstrated, by the following Example. Manlius Capitolinus, and Julius Cæsar, both endeavoured to oppress their Country's Liberties; but the one lost his Life in the Attempt, the other succeeded. The Cause of the different Ends of these two aspiring Men could not be the Difference of the Constitution at those two several Times; for the Form of it was the same in both. Nor was it the Difference of their personal Qualifications; for Manlius was as popular and as brave as Julius Cæsar could possibly be. Yet when the Designs of Manlius broke out, he was immediately abandoned by all; whereas Cæsar found Followers that were ready to assist him to ruine their Country; and powerful and numerous enough to compass it. Therefore the Freedom of Rome would by the Nature of its Constitution, have lasted but for a little while, had not a peculiar Temper and Disposition of the People supplied what was wanting in the Laws. Secondly, There was not only wanting in the Roman Commonwealth, a proper Check and Restraint of ambitious Citizens, but the very Frame of it contained two Principles of Servitude within it. The first was the Division of the People into two separate Classes; the Nobles, or Patricians, and the Commons, or Plebeians. The Consequence of this Division was, that the Nobles, finding themselves advantageously distinguished above the others, grew insolent towards those whom they looked on as their Inferiors; which being naturally resented by the Commons, begat furious Contentions between them.

The P R E F A C E.

These Disputes brought them under the Tyranny of the Decemviri soon after they had recovered their Liberty from the Kings; and they might have remained under that Yoke much longer, but that the Roman Virtue was then alive and vigorous, and being roused by the Lust and Barbarity of Appius towards Virginia, freed itself by one brave Effort. While the same Virtue lasted, they escaped other Dangers of the same kind; but when the Commonwealth became corrupt, these Discords grew so fierce and inveterate, that the Publick Liberty and Quiet were no longer to be reconciled. And in reading carefully the History of this State from the Time of the Slaughter of Caius Gracchus, and the fierce Executions that followed it, we cannot but observe all along that Peace could never enter there again but in the Retinue of an imperious Master; the two contending Parties, the Nobles and Plebeians, being so inflamed against each other, that nothing could possibly still their Animosities but one common Yoke of Bondage. Another Principle of Servitude was, that both their Temper and Constitution disposed them to live in a perpetual State of War; and this obliged them to deliver the Power of the Sword into the Hands of private Citizens; which was at once to tempt and to arm their Ambition. This also proved of little Danger so long as their Publick Spirit lasted; but as soon as that decayed, their great Commanders immediately became Lords and Kings; and turned those Arms into their Country's Bowels, which they were entrusted with for its Defence and Glory.

We shall now look into the Republicks of latter Ages; of which the most ancient is that of Venice, as its Polity has been the most admired. This Republick, after undergoing several Changes, at last about the End of the thirteenth Century, fixed itself to the Model it is now in; the Government being then vested in a particular Body of Citizens and their Descendants, with the Exclusion of all others; who have kept it among themselves ever since. What is admirable in this Republick is, first, a most wise Oeconomy and Polity within themselves; by which the Members of the Commonwealth are preserved in a most wonderful and entire Subordination to the State; an Excellence in which the Roman Constitution was exceedingly defective, and the want of which proved its Ruin. Secondly, a thorough Knowledge and Possession of the most refined Maxims of Policy in their Intercourse with other Powers; of which they have never failed to give Proofs upon all Occasions that have offered. By these Arts they have preserved themselves so long, not only in Safety, but in high Veneration; much beyond what their inward Strength, considered by itself, could entitle them to.

The Defect of this Government is first, that the People in general are unwarlike; which is occasioned by the Policy of the State, which dares not trust them with Arms, lest they should come to turn them against their Masters. Nor are the Nobles, though the Power entirely resides amongst them, much better than the common People in this Respect; a Nobleman of Military Qualifications being too dangerous a Character to be much affected under that jealous Government. And indeed the Maxims of this Republick are entirely pacific; and an Aversion to War is the prevailing Affection among them; their Strength lying another Way. But this unwarlike Disposition is their Weakness, and had not a particular Chance saved them, it had proved their Ruin two hundred Years ago. For Louis XII. of France having defeated their Forces at the Battle of Ghiarra d'Adda, the Loss of that one Battle so frightened them, (which a more valiant Nation would have contemned) that they made no farther Resistance; but suffered him to over-run all their Territory on the Terra Firma without Opposition. And if the City of Venice itself did not share the same Fate, it was owing entirely to its Situation among the Lagunes or shallow Waters that surround it; which make it perhaps the most inaccessible City in Europe. Had it not been for this Incident, which was no Ways owing to their Prudence, the Memory of their Republick had been all that would have been left us by this Time.

But this is not the only Defect in this Institution; there is another much greater. For under the specious Title of a free Republick, they maintain indeed a tyrannical Form of Government. For according to Aristotle's Definition, which is certainly a very true one, Tyranny is a Form or Administration of Government by which the Power and Lust of one Man, or of a few, is promoted in Preference to the general Good of the Whole. Now this is evidently the Case in Venice; the Maxims of their Government respecting in the first Place, the preserving the Authority of the Venetian Nobles over the other Members of the Republick; and the Good of the Whole in the second Place only, and no farther than the same may be consistent with their first and chief chief Intention. Hence it comes to pass that when these two Ends are bound up in each other, they proceed with a Conduct and Wisdom that is highly admirable; but when they come to be inconsistent, they make no Difficulty in chusing which of the two they shall prefer. Of this it may not be amiss to relate the following Example; as it both proves what I just said, and gives a Specimen of the celebrated Venetian Policy. The Province of Friuli, at the Extremity of the Adriatic Gulph, is subject to this Republick. Lionardo Donato, who was afterwards Doge of Venice, was chief Governour, or Podesta, in that Province; where he observed that the Gentlemen of the Country lived together in a perfect Harmony and good Intelligence. Upon this, with a Venetian Circumspection, he began to consider what the Consequences might be of this good Correspondence. He remembred, that the Emperor of Germany was the next Neighbour to this Province, and had some Pretensions upon it; from whence he inferred that perhaps that Prince might some Time or other form an Intelligence with the Inhabitants; which by the Friendship and Kindness reigning there, might be carried on with Ease and Secrecy, and prove dangerous to the State at last. These Suspicions of his he wrote to the Senate of Venice; desiring them to send him Powers in a Form mentioned by him, by which he promised to disturb effectually this good Intelligence. The Senate sent him back an Answer, wherein they praised and thanked him for his great Vigilance and Penetration, together with Powers, as he requested; by which he was enabled to confer the Titles of Marquis and Count upon such of the Gentlemen of the Country, as he should think fitting. This he accordingly did; bestowing them in a Manner quite contrary to what their Births and Fortunes would have directed. Hence those who received these new Titles began to claim Precedency over the others; who scorning to give Way to those who were once their Inferiors, the whole Country was soon filled with implacable Quarrels; and quickly after, according to the Italian Manner, with cutting of Throats; which at once enriched the Treasury with numerous Confiscations of Estates, and so thoroughly rooted out the good Agreement in the Province, that the State was effectually freed from all Dangers and Apprehensions from that Quarter.

The Republick of Switzerland is founded on an Alliance between several independent States; and the Strength of it with respect to its Neighbours arises from the Numbers and warlike Disposition of the People, and their ardent Love of Liberty and of their Country; which joined with their mountainous Situation, make an Invasion of their Liberties by any Power from without, too perillous an Enterprize to be undertaken. Their Security from within is owing to the Simplicity and Plainness of their Humour, and Manner of Living; and to a certain fraternal Temper and Disposition among the several Members of the State, which inclines them, in a Manner almost peculiar to themselves, to compose the most furious Animosities, before they flame out to such a Height, as may prove dangerous to the Publick. This Account of their Strength points out at the same Time their Weakness; for the former depending almost entirely upon the Temper of the People, it follows, that if Luxury should enter their State (and the Approaches of that subtle Mischief are insensible, and therefore hard to be guarded against) Avarice and Corruption will soon follow them, and sap the Foundations by which this Republick is upheld.

The Republick of Holland is of much the same Form with that of Switzerland; being a Confederacy of several independent Towns and Cities for mutual Succour and Defence; the Union of the former being however much more strict and close than that of the latter. The Rise of this Commonwealth came from grievous Oppressions laid on those Countries by the King of Spain, who was their Sovereign; which raised at once a fierce Rebellion, and such an irreconcilable Enmity to the Spanish Government that the People thought nothing too much to do, or to suffer, to keep out of that hated Yoke. This made them betake themselves to Trade and Industry, with an inconceivable Vigour. For they soon found their own People unequal in Force and Discipline to the Power of the Spaniard; which obliged them to make use of mercenary Soldiers; and these required that Wealth to maintain them which was only to be had by Commerce. And though it required a vehement Spirit of Industry and Parsimony to support those Expences, yet their inveterate Hatred to the Spanish Government engaged them to undergo many Things they would otherwise have thought very grievous. And this Temper being directed by wise Men, and seconded by lucky Accidents, brought that State to its Height and Glory.

The P R E F A C E.

The Defects of it are these two. First, that having derived its first Vigour from a most unexampled Laboriousness and Frugality, it cannot subsist but on the same Foundations; which are of too mouldering a Stone to last. For though a vehement Passion will sometimes enable Men to hold on in such a Course for a good while, yet the natural Inclinations to Ease and Pleasure are so strong, as must, by Degrees, cause such a Spirit to slacken and cool. Besides this, the Constitution of the State is so ill contrived, that there is continual Danger of its falling to Pieces upon very slight Occasions; it being so framed, that in any of the Deliberations of this State one Town may put the Negative upon all the rest; whence if Corruption from within, or from without, should get into any one Place, it may put all their Proceedings to a stay. And though hitherto the Inconveniencies arising from this Constitution have not been so notable, as one would have expected; this may be justly attributed to the Dangers with which this Republick has been surrounded almost ever since its Birth. But if it should continue long in a State of Security, it seems hardly possible that it should not feel some great Prejudice from a Constitution so ill set together.

I come in the last Place, to consider our own bounded Monarchy. Every one knows that the Supreme Power of Great Britain consists of the King, the Nobility, and the Representatives of the People. The King has the Execution of the Laws entirely in his Hands; he has also the Power of calling, proroguing, adjourning, and dissolving Parliaments; and when any new Laws are offered to him by the Parliament, he has Power to refuse his Assent, without giving any Reason. Besides this, he has a very ample Revenue; there are severe Laws made for the Guard of his Personal Dignity; and he has the Disposal of a great Number of Offices of Honour and Profit. And to all this is added the sole Prerogative of making War, Peace, and Alliances. But because the whole Supreme Power lodged in his Hands would introduce the Evils of Absolute Monarchy, a Part thereof is given to the two Houses of Parliament; who have some Privileges in common; and others that are peculiar to the several Houses. Both have Power to propose and to pass new Laws, and offer them to the Consideration of the other House of Parliament, and of the King; and both have a Negative Voice in those Cases. Both have Power to offer the King their Representation against any publick Act, which they apprehend may turn to the Prejudice of the State; and both have the most uncontrollable Freedom of Speech in their Debates. The House of Lords is the supreme Court of Judicature, to whose Sentence the greatest Subjects are obnoxious. The House of Commons have the Power of accusing, as the Lords have of trying; and they have also the important Privilege of granting Supplies to the King. With Respect to the general State of the Nation, it is observable that there is a certain Gradation in the several Ranks and Orders of Men amongst us, that is peculiar to our selves. For in other Countries there are two Classes of People, the Gentlemen, and the Commons; whose Ways and Circumstances of Living are so different, that they make as it were two different Nations in one; which like Water and Oyl in the same Vessel, never embody or run into each other, be they ever so intermixed. But now the several Degrees of Men among us slide into each other insensibly; the Descent being imperceptible, as we go down from the greatest Subject to the least. And thus our Nation forms one, and only one, great Body, whose Interest can therefore be but one. As to the particular Members of this Body, their Lives and Liberties and Estates are guarded by such Fences, that no illegal or arbitrary Violence can be offered to the meanest Person by the greatest, but that the Law will be open for his Redress.

The Excellency of this Constitution will best appear if we compare it with those above-mentioned; and we shall find it free from all the Defects we have shewn to be in each of those Forms of Government. The King has Power enough to support the Majesty of the Throne; and may fall with a mighty Weight into any Design for the Publick Good, if he is disposed to use his Influence to that End. But because Kings are Men, and live in the midst of Affluence and Respect, which are apt to intoxicate the Mind, and swell it with Pride; he is so restrained in other Things, that as great as his Power is, he cannot by Law exert it to the Oppression of the meanest of his Subjects. The Nobility have Honours and Privileges peculiar to their Order; such as are proper to excite them to, and assist them in, the Pursuit of those Virtues and Accomplishments that may enable them to do Service to their Country. But the Influence and Power of the rest of the Nation is so great, that it is impossible for them so much as to think of insulting and trampling upon the Commons as has been, and is so notoriously the Case in all Governments where the Body of the People have not so great a Weight. And thus all Quarrels between the Nobles and Commons upon this Account being prevented, a Door at which Slavery has commonly entered in other Countries is for ever shut in our own. And from the great Power and Influence of the King and Peers, it will be easily inferred, that the Commons, being restrained by those Checks, cannot fly out into those turbulent Seditions and that barbarous Ferocity which we find Examples of in the Democracy of Athens, and others of the same Form; while notwithstanding, they enjoy as perfect a Liberty as they could have done, or can do in those States where they are altogether Masters.

Thus by our Constitution every Member of the State is treated in such a Manner as is most rational, most equitable, and most conducive to the publick Good. Hence it comes to pass that it requires no unnatural or unjust Precautions or jealousies to support it, like some of the Republicks above mentioned; but tends to preserve itself as naturally almost as a Stone does to fall to the Ground. It is so far from requiring Art or Violence to support it, that it is not to be disturbed without a great deal of both; and when it is forcibly withheld from its proper Place, it tends to its Centre still; and like Water kept out with Banks, will force its Way some Time or other. For there being nothing in it violent or oppressive, but every Thing founded on the most perfect Reason and Justice, all Men universally become its Guard, because all Men see they cannot possibly have any Interest to make it otherwise. Nor does it require any extraordinary Measure of Publick Virtue to keep it up; for we see, notwithstanding the Complaints for the last hundred Years of Luxury and Corruption amongst us, our Form of Government is still subsisting, and as likely to live as the Uncertainty of Humane Affairs will permit any thing to be. And this Convenience is to be found in no other free Government; as appears from what has been said above.

To all this I know it will be objected, that in spite of our admired Constitution, there have been as grievous Instances of Corruption and Male-Administration found amongst Us, as in any other State. That on some Occasions the Power of the Crown and the Privileges of the Nobility will prove very heavy to particular Persons. That the Court will sometimes have so great an Influence on the Senate, that the Deliberations there shall be mere Matter of Form; and that on the contrary there have been Examples that Faction and Peevishness in the House of Commons may obstruct a Prince in the Prosecution of laudable Designs. But to this the Answer is easy; that it cannot be said that our Constitution prevents all Inconveniences, small or great; such Perfection is not of the Growth of this World. But this is certain, That these Evils are better fenced against, more safely censured when doing, and more easily remedied when done, under our Constitution, than under any other; not to mention that they are fewer in Number, and less in Degree, than any where else.

I had Thoughts of adding some Considerations relating to the Dangers our Constitution is liable to from within and from without, but I found this led me into Disquisitions beyond my Sphere and Capacity. I shall therefore only add the following Remark made upon our Country by the Duke de Rohan, in his Discourse of the Interests of Princes; with which I shall conclude this Discourse and Preface; L'Angleterre est un grand Animal, qui ne peut mourir que par soi-même; England is a great Creature that can never die by any Power, but its own.

REMARKS on the foregoing CATALOGUE; from Bishop Nicholson's English Historical Library.

Nennius a Monk, &c. He flourished more probably about two hundred Years later; though the Age here mentioned is that which is generally ascribed to him.

Afferius Menevensis, &c. A Piece has been published under the Title of Afferius's Annals; but whether it be his genuine Work, is not quite so certain. As to King Alfred's Life, there is no doubt of his having been the Author of it.

Alphredus a Priest, &c. It should have been a Monk. Leland says he saw his entire History, which ended An. 21. Hen. I. So that he lived somewhat later than is here set down.

Sylvester Gyraldus, &c. It is very doubtful whether he ever wrote an English Chronicle.

John of Hagulstad, &c. This Author and his Writings are not mentioned in Bishop Nicholson.

Alfredus Rivalensis, &c. His Name was Ealredus.

Gulielmus Parvus, &c. This is the same with William of Newborough, mentioned above.

Thomas Langford, &c. The Historical Library makes no mention of this Author; any more than of Robertus Montensis, who is named soon after him.

Thomas Spott, &c. Mr. Somner, a very inquisitive and diligent Antiquary, could never light upon this Work of Spott's.

Bartbol. Glanville, &c. He is not mentioned by Bishop Nicholson.

John Trevisa, &c. That Eighth Book is not John Trevisa's, who died near a hundred Years before. The Mistake is however excusable, because so great a Man as Mr. Selden fell into it first.

John Lydgate, &c. He wrote the Praises of St. Edmund, King of the East-Angles, which is all we find of him.

Sir Thomas More, &c. He wrote also the short Life and Reign of Edw. V. but did not complete that of Rich. III.

John Leland, &c. He made a vast store of Collections and Compositions besides these, relating to the History and Antiquities of our Country.

John Rogers, &c. It does not appear who this was, or what he wrote; he being passed over in Silence by the Right Reverend Author from whom these Remarks are borrowed.

Andre du Chesne, &c. He has only published a Body of Historians.

The Beginning, Continuance, and Ending of the REIGNS of the KINGS of England, to the Year 1727, after the Time of the Roman Govern- ment.

1. KING Vortigern a Britain.
2. King Vortimer his Son, a Britain, reigned four Years. Then deposed.
3. King Aurelius Ambrosius, a Roman, reigned thirty two Years.
4. King Uter, began his Reign Anno Christi 497, and reigned eighteen Years.
5. King Arthur his Son, reigned twenty six Years.
6. King Constantine his Cousin, reigned three Years.
7. King Aurelius Conan, Nephew to King Arthur.
8. King Vortiporus reigned four Years.
9. King Malgo Conan reigned six Years.
10. King Careticus reigned three Years.
11. King Cadwan reigned twenty two Years.
12. King Cadwallo his Son, reigned forty eight Years.
13. King Cadwalladar his Son, the last of the British Kings, who died at Rome in the Year 689, after he had reigned three Years. After which, Britain was a Colony of the Saxons; who divided it into seven Kingdoms: But the Saxons, before the Death of King Cadwalladar, took Kent from the British Kings, and had it in their Possession: Which Kingdom of Kent began by Hengist the Saxon, in the Year 455, in the Reign of King Aurelius Ambrosius, before mentioned, and lasted three hundred seventy two Years, during the Reigns of seventeen Kings of Kent. The last of which Kentish Kings was overcome by Egbert King of the West-Saxons, who made Kent a Province to his Kingdom, in the Year 827. The second Kingdom was of the South-Saxons, begun by Ella in 488, in the Reign of the same British King Aurelius Ambrosius, containing Suffex and Surrey, and continued 113 Years, during the Reigns of five Kings only; the last of which Kings were overcome by Ine King of the West-Saxons, and so became a Province to that Kingdom of the West-Saxons, in the Year 601. The third Kingdom was of the West-Saxons, which began by Cerdic in 519, in the Reign of the British King Arthur, containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somerfetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Barkshire, and continued three hundred and one Years, during the Reigns of eighteen Kings; the last of whom, Egbert, became King of the whole Nation. The fourth Kingdom was of the East-Saxons, begun by Erchenwin, in the Year 527, containing Essex and Middlesex, and continued two hundred eighty one Years, during the Reigns of fourteen Kings; the last of which Kings, Egbert, King of the West-Saxons, subdued, and so made the Kingdom of the East-Saxons to be a Province to his own Kingdom. The fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland, begun by Ella and Ida, in the Year 547, containing Yorkshire, Durham, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland and Northumberland, and continued three hundred seventy Years, during the Reigns of twenty three Kings; after the last of which, this Kingdom yielded to the Protection of Egbert King of the West-Saxons. The sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, begun by Crida, in the Year 522, containing Huntingdon, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwickshire, Leicester, Northampton, Derbyshire, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire and Hartfordshire; and continued two hundred twenty Years, during the Reigns of twenty Kings; after which, they were subdued by the West-Saxons. The seventh Kingdom was of the East-Angles, begun by Uffa, in 575, containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, and continued three hundred fifty three Years, during the Reigns of fifteen Kings; and at last was subject to the Kingdom of the West-Saxons: But this Kingdom of the East-Angles was enjoyed by the Danes fifty Years before the West-Saxons had it; so the Kingdom of the East-Angles continued distinct from the rest of the Nation in the whole four hundred and three Years: So it appears that after King Vortigern the first of the Britain Kings in the Year 455, had called in the Saxons out of Germany, to assist him in defending the Kingdom against the Invasions of the Picts and Scots, every Britain King who succeeded him, lost some part or other of it to the Saxons, till at last, in the Year 689, Cadwalladar the last Britain King lost all at his Death; and then the Saxon Kings striving amongst themselves for Sovereignty, they still gained one upon another, till at last, in the Year 818, Egbert, or some under him, reduced them all under his Subjection, who then caused all the South of the Island to be called England; the Dominion whereof continued under him and his Successors, till the Danes in the Year 1017, made the great Interruption.

OF THE Kings of ENGLAND; FROM THE Time of the ROMANS Government, Unto the DEATH of

Of the first known times of this Island.

ALTHOUGH we begin the Æra of our Computation from William, called the Conqueror, as though he was the first of our Kings of England; yet before him were many other excellent Kings, and their Acts perhaps as worthy to be known, if they could be known. But seeing after-Ages can know nothing of former Times, but what is recorded by writing; it hath happened, partly by the Devastation of Libraries, and partly by the scarcity of Copies before Printing came up, that of many Authors, scarce so much is left us, as their very Names: And besides, it hath followed, that as the first Writers were Poets, so the first Writings have been Fictions. And nothing is delivered to Posterity of the most ancient Times, but very Fables; such as the Story of Albina, of whom they say, this Island was called Albion; (though others say, Ab albis rupibus, of the white Cliffs) that she should be the eldest of the two and thirty Daughters of Dioclesian, King of Syria, (such as never was) who being married to two and thirty Kings, in one Night killed all their Husbands: For which Fact, they were put in a Ship themselves alone without a Pilot, so to try their Adventure, and by chance arrived in this Island, of whom Giants were begotten. And if you like not of this, then have you the story of Albion, the Son of Neptune, of whom the Island took his Name. But when these are exploded, there follows another with great Attestation, and yet as very a Fable as these; namely, the story of the Trojan Brute, of whom the Island they say, was called Britain: Brute's Story (though many other Causes are given of the Name:) As likewise the Story of Brute's Cousin Corinæus; of whom they say, the Countrey of Cornwal had its Name; to whom it was given for overcoming the Giant Gogmagog: And that Brute having three Sons, Lochrine, Albanaet, and Camber, he gave at his Death to his eldest Son Lochrine, all the Land on this side Humber, and called it Loegria; to his second Son Albanaet, all the Land beyond Humber, of whom it was called Albania, (now Scotland;) and to his youngest Son Camber, all the Land beyond the River of Severn, of whom it was called Cambria (now Wales); with other such stuff which may please Children, but not riper Judgments, and were first broached by Geoffery, Archdeacon of Monmouth: For which all the Writers of his Time cried Shame upon him, and yet can scarce keep many at this day from giving credit to his Fictions. This Geoffery of Monmouth (afterward made, by the Favour of King Stephen, Bishop of Asaph) lights upon a Book written in Welsh, and brought out of Wales by Walter Arch-Deacon of Exeter, of the British Affairs, and translated by Geoffery, in which, though there were many notable Passages that might give much light to our History; yet so many commentitious Fables were inserted, that they rendered even what Truths he wrote suspected.

And when we are once gotten out of Fables, and come to some Truth; yet that Truth is delivered in such slender Draughts, and such broken pieces, that very small Benefit can be gotten ten by the knowing of it; and was not till the Time of Julius Cæsar, a thousand Years after the Fable of Brute; at which time, the Island was yet but in manner of a Village, being without Walls, as having no shipping, (which are indeed the true Walls of an Island) but only certain small Vessels, made of Boards and Wicker. And as they had no Ships for Defence without, so had they neither any Forts for Defence within: Scarce any Houses but such as were made of stakes and boughs of Trees fastned together. Neither was it yet come to be a Kingdom, but was governed by a number of petty Rulers; so as Kent only had in it (as Cæsar calleth them) four Kings, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax: which Division, as it made the Britains the more easy to be conquered, so it made the Romans the longer in conquering. For if they had been one united body, one or two Battels might have made a Conquest of the whole; whereas being thus divided, there was need to be as many Battels as there were Divisions: So as it was many Years before the Romans could conquer the whole Island; even from the Time of Julius Cæsar, to the Time of the Emperor Domitian; not much less than two hundred Years. It is true, after Cæsar's first coming, the Island grew sensible of this Defect of their Division, and thereupon by consent of a great part made choice of Cassibelan, King of the Trinovants, who had his Seat at Verulam, to be General of their Wars; which made indeed some little stop to the Romans proceedings. But after the loss of a Battel or two, they fell again into a relapse of their former Defect, and thought it better to secure every one his own, by his own means, than by a general power to hazard all at once; whereby it came afterward to be true, Dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur. Yet before the Countrey could be wholly conquered, at first by reason of the Nation's Valour seeking to keep themselves free; and afterward by Reason of the Insolency of the Garrison Soldiers, that fought to make them Slaves, many great Oppositions were made; amongst which the most memorable was that of Voadicia, a certain Queen of the Countrey, who having been by the Roman Soldiers her self abused, and her Daughters ravished, used means to levy an Army of sixscore thousand Men, whom she led her self into the Field, and set upon the Romans in their chief Towns, which were London, Verulam, and Camalodunum (according to some Maldon in Essex, according to others Colchester) of whom she slew above seventy thousand: But then in a second Battel, had fourscore thousand of her own Army slain; after which Defeat, for avoiding of Slavery, she poisoned her self.

The Emperor
Adrian comes into England.

This Island for a long time was so much esteemed of the Romans, that their Emperors sometimes came hither in Person; as first the Emperor Adrian in the Year 124, who re-edified that great Wall between England and Scotland, first made by Agricola, Nero's General in Britain, and Father-in-law to Tacitus the famous Historian. Adrian having set the Countrey in Order, returned. The same Wall was again repaired by Severus the Emperor, in the Year 212. who came over into Britain to repress the Incurfions of the Picts and Scots, by whom in a Battel near York, he was wounded, and thereof died; or as others say, he died of Age and Sicknefs. Afterward in the Year 305. Constantius the Emperor came into Britain, and ended his Life at York, making that City famous for the Death and Burial of two great Emperors; and yet more famous for the Honour done to Constantine the Great, Son of Constantius, who in that City was first saluted Emperor. But notwithstanding the great Estimation the Romans a long Time made of this Island; yet at last, after five hundred Years they had kept it in Subjection, they voluntarily left it: The Charge of keeping it, being greater than the Benefit; for to keep it in Subjection, they maintained no fewer than fourscore thousand Soldiers in pay. And when Wars grew amongst themselves at Home, they could no longer spare so many abroad, but recalled them Home: But then though they left Britain, yet they left not the Britains, but carried them, at least, a great Part of them away with them; of whom the most were slain in their Service, and the rest planted in that Part of France, which of them was afterward, and is to this Day, called Britain. And now one would think, the Island should be in good Case, being freed from them that kept them in Subjection: But it proved to be in worse Case being at Liberty, than it was before in Servitude; for being deprived of their ablest Men, and at the same Time, their King Lucius happening to die without Issue, they were left as a few loose sticks, without the bond of a Governor; which the Picts and Scots observing, thought now was the Time to make the Countrey their own, and thereupon made Invasions upon it with all their Forces. Whereupon the Britains having none left of their native Kings to succeed; and knowing they could ill manage the Body of an Army without a Head, they make choice of Vortigern Earl of Cornwal, one extracted from the British Line, to be their King: And he whether so advised by his Cabinet Counsellor, the propheticall Merlin, or finding his own Strength too weak to make Resistance, implores first Aid of the Romans; and they making Answer, they had Business enough to do of their own, and leaving them to themselves, he then fled to the Saxons for Aid, a warlike People of Germany, and who had greater swarms than their Hives could well hold.

He calls in the Saxons.

And here we may plainly see how dangerous a Thing it is for a Nation to call in Strangers to their Aid, and especially in any great Number; for though they come at first but Mercenaries, yet once admitted, and finding their own strength, they soon grow Masters, as here it proved with the Saxons.

The Saxons were Infidels, and brought in with them Diversity of Idols, after whose Names they gave Appellations to the several ral Days of the Week. Adoring the Sun, they named the first Day Sunday, or Sunday. The second Moonday, from an Idol which ridiculously represented the Moon. Another God, they had called Tuisco, and to him they appointed the third Day, naming it Tuesday. The Tradition is, that this Tuisco was the Son of Ashkenaz, Grandchild to Japhet, and that he conducted their Forefathers out of Asia into Europe, from the unfinished Tower of Babel. The next Idol which they adored for a God, was Woden, representing an armed Man, and they named the fourth Day from him Wodensday, or Wednesday, they honoured him as the God of Battel: He had been a famous and victorious Prince amongst them, and of him lineally descended Hengist and Horfa, their first Leaders into this Island. Not only our Saxons, but all the septentrional Nations adored and sacrificed to Thor, a Statue resembling a crown'd King, his Head encompassed with twelve bright golden Stars, of whom they denominated the fifth Day Thursday. Friday, took the Name of Friga, an Idol representing both Sexes, with a Bow in one Hand, and a Sword in the other: And though the Statue exprest an Hermaphrodite, yet she was generally reputed a Goddess. Then they had a God called Seater, and to him they consecrated Saterday; this Idol was like an old Man, with a long Beard and Hair, Bare-headed and Bare-footed. Such was the Religion of the Saxons; which giveth us Occasion before we treat further of their coming in, to say something of the State of the Christian Church in this Island. First then, it is recorded, that in the Year 63, what Time Arviragus reign'd here, Joseph of Arimathea (who buried the Body of Christ) came into this Island, and laid the Foundation of the Christian Faith in the Western Parts, at a Place called then Thurdet, now Glastenbury, and that there came with him Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martba: And more than this, that Simon Zelotes, one of the Apostles suffered Martyrdom here in Britain: And more than this, that both St. Peter and St. Paul came into this Island, and preached the Gospel; all which, and more to this Purpose, is recorded by Authors of good Account: Though it be hard in believing, that Persons, and specially Women, of so great Age as these must needs be at this Time, should take so long a Journey. But howsoever it was, certain it is, That the Doctrine of Christianity was about this Time planted in this Island, though it made afterward but small Progress, and that with some Persecution; as in which Time St. Alban suffered Martyrdom at Verulam, and at Litchfield shortly after no fewer than a thousand.

Joseph of Arimathea plants the Gospel at Glastenbury.

The Heathenish Temples converted into Bishops Sees at the preaching of Faganus and Damianus.

After this, in the Year 180, what Time Lucius was King of this Island, Elutherius, then Bishop of Rome, sent Faganus and Damianus to him; upon whose preaching, the Temples of the Heathenish Flamins and Arch-Flamins (one and thirty in number) were converted to so many Bishops Sees; whereof London, York, and Caerleon (now St. David's) were made the Metropolitans of the Province. And there is a Table remaining at this Day, in the Parish Church of St. Peter, or Cornhill London, which recordeth, that the Foundation thereof was laid by this King Lucius, and that this Church was the Cathedral to that Archbishop's See. In the Year 359, a Council was holden at Ariminum in Italy, where six hundred Western Bishops were assembled, whereof three went out of Britain; which last were all orthodoxal, and with that Synod determined to give their Voices against the Arian Heresy. After this, about the Year 420, rose up in this Island one Pelagius a Monk, brought up in the Monastery of Bangor in Wales, who spread the Poyson of his Heresy first in this his native Countrey, and afterward all the World over. And these had been the chief Passages in Matters Ecclesiastical within this Island, when the Saxons were called in, about the Year 450.

Pelagius the Heretick riseth up.

And now under the Conduct of two Brothers, Hengist and Horfa, came over nine thousand Saxons, with their Wives and Children, to assist the Britains against the Scots, and were appointed the Isle of Thanet to inhabit. With which Assistance the Britains gave their Enemies Battel, and overcame them; so as they accounted the Saxons as Angels sent from Heaven; and then allow'd them Kent also for their inhabiting. Not long after Hengist obtained of King Vortigern the Property of so much Ground as he could enclose with a Bull's Hide; which cutting into Thongs, he there built the Castle, facti de nomine, called Thong-Castle. And now having built it, he invites Vortigern to a Feast, who there fell in Love with Rowena, the Daughter, or rather the Niece of Hengist; for when Hengist first arrived in Britain he was but 30 Years of Age: Howsoever, Vortigern marrying this fair Lady, put Hengist into such a height of Boldness, that he began to aspire, sending for greater Forces to come over to him; as meaning to transplant himself hither, and to make this Island his Inheritance: Which the British Lords perceiving, and not able to wean the King from his new Wife, and her Father Hengist, they depose him; and in his Place set up his Son Vortimer, a true Lover of his Countrey; who presently in a pitched Battel near unto Aylesford in Kent, set upon the Saxons; where Catigern the Brother of Vortimer, and Horfa, or Hengist, in single Fight Hand to Hand slew each other. In which Place, Catigern was buried, and a Monument in Memory of him erected, the Stones whereof at this Day are standing in a great Plain in the Parish of Aylesford; which instead of Catigern, is corruptly called Kits-Cotyhouse. Another the like Monument was erected for Horfa, though now defaced; remembered only by the Town where it stood, called Horstead. Three other Battels after this were fought between the Britains and the Saxons; one upon Craford, another at Weppedsfleete, the third upon Colmore; in which last, the Britains got so great a Victory, that the Saxons were clean driven out of Kent, and Thanet

net also not suffered to rest: So as shortly after, Hengist with his Saxons departed the Kingdom, as being now out of Hope to make his Fortune in this Island. But while Vortimer was thus intente for his Countrey's Liberty, Rowena the former King's Wife, being Daughter to Hengist, was as intente to bring it into Servitude; which knowing she could not do as long as Vortimer lived, she used means by Poyson, to take away his Life, after he had been King the space of four Years, and then by the Witchcraft of fair Words, so enchanted the British Nobility, that her Husband Vortigern was again established in the Kingdom; which was no sooner done, but Hengist (relying upon his Son Vortigern's Love) with a mighty Army attempts to return again into the Island; when being resisted, he makes a shew as if he desired nothing but to fetch away his Daughter Rowena, and to have a friendly Conference for continuance of Amity; which Motion seeming reasonable, a Place and Time of Conference was appointed; the Time, upon the first of May; the Place, upon the Plain of Ambrii, now called Salisbury, whither the plain-meaning Britains came unarm'd, according to Agreement; but the fraudulent Saxons under their long Cassocks had short Skeynes hidden, with which upon a Watchword given, they set upon the Britains, and of their unarm'd Nobility slew three, some say five hundred, and took the King himself Prisoner, whom they would not release, till they were put in Possession of these four Counties, Kent, Sussex, Suffolk, and Norfolk: Whereupon Vortigern, whether fearing a second Deposing, or whether so advised by his Cabinet-Council, or the propheticall Merlin, betook himself into Wales, and there built him a strong Castle for his Safe-guard; while the Saxons coming daily in great swarms into the Land, had at this Time over-run all, if Aurelius Ambrosius, a Roman born, but affected to the British Nation, had not landed at Totnes in Devonshire, to whom resorted great Troops of Britains. His first Expedition was against Vortigern, (as the first Cause of the Britains Misery) whose Castle he besieged; and whether by Wild-fire, or by fire from Heaven, both he and his Castle; and all that were in it, were burnt to Ashes. To this Ambrosius is ascribed the admirable Monument in Wiltshire, now called Stonehenge*, in the Place where the Britains had been treacherously slaughter'd and interr'd, and of whom the Town of Amberbury bears its Name. After this he set upon the Saxons, and in many Battels discomfited them; till at last falling sick in the City of Winchester, a Saxon, in shew a Britain, and in Habit a Physician, was sent unto him, who instead of Physick, ministred Poyson, whereof he died in the Year 497, after he had reign'd two and thirty Years.

it is at this Day born for the imperial Standard. And he also in many Battels discomfited the Saxons, till after eighteen Years Reign he came to his end by Treachery; dying by Poyson put into a Well, whereof he usually drank; in the Year 515.

After him succeeded his Son Arthur; begotten of the fair Lady Igren, Wife of the Duke of Cornwal, to whose Bed the Art of Merlin brought him in the likeness of her Husband; and he in twelve set Battels discomfited the Saxons; but in one most memorable, in which girding himself with his Sword called Callibourn, he flew upon his Enemies, and with his own Hand slew eight hundred of them; which is but one of his wonderful Deeds, whereof there are so many reported, that he might well be reckon'd amongst the fabulous, if there were not enough true to give them Credit. Amongst other his Acts, he instituted the Order of Knights of the round Table, to the end there might be no Question about Precedence; and to teach heroical Minds not to stand upon Place, but Merit. But this great Prince, for all his great Valour, was at last in Battel wounded, whereof he died in the Year 522, after he had reigned six and twenty Years.

After King Arthur, succeeded his Cousin Constantine, and after his three Years Reign, Aurelius Conan the Nephew of King Arthur; whose Reign is so uncertain, that some say he reigned only two, some three Years, some again thirty, and some three and thirty. After Conan, succeeded Vortiporus, who after many Victories against the Saxons, and four Years Reign, died. After whom succeeded Malgo Conan, and reigned six Years. After him Careticus, who setting upon the Saxons, and being beaten, fled into the Town of Cirencester, whereupon the Saxons catching certain Sparrows, and fastening Fire to their Feet, let them fly into the Town, where lighting upon Straw, and other Matter apt to take Fire, the whole City in short Space was burnt; and thereupon Careticus flying, secured himself among the Mountains of Wales, where he died after he had unprofitably reigned three Years: And from that Time forth the Britains lost their whole Kingdom in the East Part of the Island, and were confined in the West by the Rivers Severn and Dee. After Careticus, succeeded Cadwan, who reigned two and twenty Years. After him his Son Cadwallo, who reigned eight and forty Years, and then died; whose Body was buried in St. Martin's Church near Ludgate, and his Image of Brass placed upon the same Gate, for a Terror to the Saxons. In his Time the Doctrine of Mabomet began to spread it self all the Eastern World over. After Cadwallo, succeeded his Son Cadwalladar; in whose Time so great a Famine, and afterward Mortality happened, continuing eleven Years, that the Land became in a Manner desolate; insomuch, that the King and many of his Lords were driven to forsake their native Countrey, and Cadwalladar himself went to his Cousin Alan, King of Little Britain in France. At which time time the Saxons taking Advantage of his Absence, came over in Swarms, and dispossessed the forlorn Britains of all they had, and divided the Land amongst themselves. Whereupon Cadwalladar, obtaining Assistance from his Cousin Alan, was coming over to restrain their Insolencies; when making Prayers to God for good Success, an Angel appeared to him, or at the least to his seeming he heard a Voice that forbad him the Enterprize, declaring that it was not God's Will the Britains should rule this Land any longer; and therefore bad him hie him to Rome, and receive of Pope Sergius the Habit of Religion, wherein he should dye, and rest in Peace; which accordingly he did: And in him ended the Blood of the British Kings, in the Year 689: So as Britain now was no longer Britain, but a Colony of the Saxons.

And now 'tis time to speak of the Heptarchy of the Saxons, so much spoken of by all Writers, and to shew by what Degrees the Britains lost, and the Saxons got the whole Possession of this Island: For this Heptarchy or Division of this Island into seven Kingdoms, came not in all at once, nor yet in an equal Partition, but some good Distance of Time one after another, and as the Invader had Strength to expel the Natives.

The first Kingdom being of KENT.

THE first Kingdom of the Saxons began by Hengist, in the Year 455, containing all Kent, and continued 372 Years, during the Reigns of seventeen Kings, of whom as many as performed any memorable Act, shall be remember'd; and for the rest, it will be no loss to pass them over in Silence. Of these seventeen Kings, Ethelbert being the fifth, was the first Saxon Christian King of this Island, converted by Austin the Monk, whom Pope Gregory sent hither to that purpose, with forty others, in the Year 596; to whom the King Ethelbert gave his chief City of Canterbury, and his own Royal Palace there, made since the Cathedral of that See; withdrawing himself to Reculver in the Isle of Thanet, where he erected a Palace for himself and his Successors. He gave him also an old Temple, standing without the East Wall of the City, which he honoured with the Name of St. Pancras, and then added a Monastery to it, and dedicated it to St. Peter and St. Paul, appointing it to be the Place of the Kentish Kings Sepulchres. But in regard of Austin the Procurer, both Pancras, Peter and Paul, were soon forgotten; and it was, and is to this Day called St. Austin's; which Abbey St. Austin enriched with divers Reliques, which he brought with him from Rome; amongst which was a part of Christ's seamless Coat, and of Aaron's Rod. This King, after his own Conversion, converted also Sebert King of the East Saxons, and assisted him in the building of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London; as also the Church of St. Peter on the West of London, then called Thorny; and himself at Rochester built the Cathedral Church there, which he dedicated to the Apostle St. Andrew; and dying when he had reigned six and fifty Years, was buried at Canterbury. And thus by his first Saxon Kingdom, was all Kent lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was the first impairing, and this happened in the Reign of Ambrosius before spoken of. The sixth King of Kent was Ethelbald, who, at first an Apostate, was afterwards converted, and built a Chapel within the Monastery of St. Peter and Paul at Canterbury. The seventh King was Ercombert, a virtuous and religious Prince, who first commanded the observing of Lent; and in his Days the Archbishop Honorius divided Kent into Parishes. The eighth King was Egbert, who obtained the Kingdom by murdering his Nephews; whose Sister the Lady Depnena founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent. The eleventh King was Wubred, who founded the Church of St. Martin's in the Town of Dover, and stored it with 22 Canons, which he took out of a Church which had been before erected in the Castle by Edbald the Son of Ethelbert the first Christen'd King of the Saxons. The last was Baldred, who overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, left Kent a Province to that Kingdom, in the Year 827.

Lent first observed. Kent divided into Parishes.

The second Kingdom being of the South SAXONS.

THE second Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the South Saxons, and began by Ella, in the Year 488, containing Sussex and Surrey, and continued 113 Years, during the Reign of five Kings only, of whom Cissa being the second, founded the City of Chichester, and reigned, as some say, threescore and six-teen Years. And then Berthan being the last King, was overcome by Ina King of the West Saxons, and his Countrey became a Province of that Kingdom in the Year 601. And thus, as Kent before, so now Sussex and Surrey were lopped off from the Britains Dominion: And this was a second impairing, which also happened in the Reign of the British King Ambrosius.

The third Kingdom being of the West SAXONS.

THE third Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the West Saxons, and began by Cerdic in the Year 519, containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, and continued 301 Years, during the Reigns of nineteen Kings, of whom this Cerdic was the first; in whose Time Portb, a Saxon, landed in the West, at a Place from him called afterward Portsmouth, and aided Cerdic in his Conquest. And this happened in the Reign of King Arthur: And as Kent, Sussex and Surrey before, so now these seven other Shires were lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was a third impairing. The sixth King of the West Saxons was Kinglis, who was the first Christian King of this Kingdom, converted by Berinus an Italian Divine, to whom he gave the City of C Dorchester,

Dorchester an Dorchester, near to Oxford; who therein erected his Episcopal See. The seventh King was Kenwald, who at first an Apostate, was afterward converted, and founded the Cathedral of Winchester, and the Abbey of Malmesbury; whose Wife Segburg also built a House of Devotion in the Isle of Sheppy, wherein her self became a Nun, and was afterward elected Abbess of Ely. The eleventh King was Ina, who ordained many good Laws, which are yet extant in the Saxon Tongue, and are translated into Latin by the learned Master William Lambard. This King built a College at Wells, bearing the Name of St. Andrew's, which afterward King Kenulf made an Episcopal See. He also, in most stately manner new built the Abbey of Glastenbury; and out of his Devotion to the See of Rome, he enjoined every one of his Subjects that was possessed in his House of any one kind of Goods, to the value of nineteen Pence, to pay yearly upon Lammas-Day, one Penny to the Pope; which at first was contributed under the Name of the King's Alms, but afterward was paid by the Name of Peter-Pence. At last he went to Rome, and there took upon him the Habit of Religion, and therein died. His Wife also became a veiled Nun, and afterwards was made Abbess of Barking, near London. The thirteenth King was Cuthred, who first permitted the Bodies of the Dead to be buried within the Walls of their Cities, which before were used to be buried in the Fields. The fourteenth was Sigebert, who for his Cruelty and Exactions, was by his Subjects forced to flee into the Woods to hide himself, where by a Swine-Herd he was slain. The fifteenth was Kerwolp, who founded the Cathedral Church of St. Andrew's at Wells, and was afterwards slain by Kynoard, whom he had banished. The sixteenth King was Birtbrick, whose Queen Ethelburg having prepared a Poison for another, the King chanced to taste it, and thereof died. In fear of which Chance the Queen fled into France, where Charles the then King, for her excellent Beauty, offered her the Choice of himself or his Son in Marriage: But she out of her lustful Humour chusing the Son, was thereupon debarred of both, and thrust into a Monastery, where committing Adultery, she was driven from thence, and ended her Life in great Misery. For her sake the West Saxons ordained a Law, that no King's Wife should hereafter have the Title or Majesty of a Queen, which for many Years after was severely executed. It is memorable which is recorded of a King in these Parts, named Wazmund, and who was the Founder of Warwick Town: That he had a Son named Offa, tall of Stature, and of good Constitution of Body, but blind till he was seven Years old, and then saw; and dumb till he was thirty Years old, and then spake.

THE fourth Kingdom of the Heptarchy was of the East Saxons, and began by Erchenwyn, in the Year 527, containing Essex and Middlesex, and continued 281 Years, during the Reigns of fourteen Kings; of whom the third was Sebert, who first built the Cathedral of St. Paul, London, which had formerly been the Temple of Diana: He likewise founded the Church of St. Peter in the West of London, at a Place called Thorney, where sometime stood the Temple of Apollo, which being overthrown by an Earthquake, King Lucius new built for the Service of God; and that again being decayed, this King restored to a greater Beauty, and with his Queen Athelgarda was there buried. The ninth King was Sebba, who after thirty Years peaceable Reign relinquished the Crown, and took upon him a religious Habit, and was buried in the Church of St. Paul, London. The twelfth was Offa, famous for the Beauty of his Countenance, who both enlarged with Buildings, and enriched with Lands, the Church of Westminster, and after eight Years Reign went to Rome, and was there shorn a Monk, and in that Habit died.

The fourteenth was Suthred, whom Egbert King of the West Saxons subdued, and made his Kingdom a Province to his own. And thus, besides the former Shires, these two also were lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was a fourth impairing.

The fifth Kingdom being of NORTHUMBERLAND.

THE fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland, (so called because it lay North from the River Humber) and began by Ella and Ida, in the Year 547; containing Yorkshire, Durham, Lancashire, Westmorland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370 Years, during the Reigns of three and twenty Kings; of whom nothing is recorded of the two first, but that they builded the Castle of Bamburg. The second King was Ethelfryd, who at Caerlegion (now Westchester) made a Slaughter of twelve hundred Christian Monks, and was himself afterward slain by Redwald King of the East Angles. The thirteenth King was Ofred, whose Wife Cuthburga, out of a loathing Weariness of Wedlock, sued out a Divorce from her Husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburn in Dorsetshire, where in a Religious Habit she ended her Life. The sixteenth King was Cednulp, who after eight Years Reign, left his Royal Robes, and put on the Habit of a Monk, in the Isle of Lindesfarn, or Holy Island. Unto this King, the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul, at Werimouth near to Durham, dedicated his Work of the English History, which he continued from the first Entrance of the Saxons in this Island, to the Year 731; containing after his own Account 285 Years. The seventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty Years Reign forsook the World also, and shorn himself a Monk; whose Brother being Archbishop of York, erected a notable Library there, and stored it with an infinite Number of learned Books. The last King of Northumberland was Oswald, after whose Death this Kingdom yielded to the Protection of Egbert, King of the West Saxons, who was now in the Year 926, become absolute Monarch of the whole Island. And thus by the Erection of the fifth Kingdom, were the six Northern Shires lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was a fifth impairing.

THE sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, and began in Crida, in the Year 522, containing Huntingdon, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwickshire, Leicester, Northampton, Derby, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire, and continued 220 Years, during the Reigns of twenty Kings, eight of whom in a continued Succession kept the Imperial Crown of the Heptarchy; for tho' others reigned as Kings in their own Territories, yet among them, ever one was the supreme Head of the rest, and was called King of Engleland, till Egbert the West Saxon brought them all into one. The fifth of these Kings of Mercia was Penda, who was the first Christian King of the Mercians, and laid the Foundation of the fair Church at Medeshamstead, now called Peterborough. The seventh King was Ethelred, who reigned thirty Years, and then gave over the Crown, and became a Monk in the Monastery of Bradney in Lincolnshire, where in the Year 716 he died. The eighth King was Kenred, who after four Years Reign went to Rome, where he took upon him the Habit of a Monk, and after other four Years died. The tenth King Ethelbald, who at first was given to much Lasciviousness of Life; but being reprehended for it by Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, was so far converted, that he founded the Monastery of Crowland, driving in mighty Piles of Oak into the Marsh Ground, where he laid a great and goodly Building of Stone; and after two and forty Years Reign, was slain in a Battel by Cuthbert King of the West Saxons. The eleventh King was Offa, who greatly enlarged his Dominions, reigned nine and thirty Years, and founded the Monastery of St. Albans. The thirteenth King was Kenwolph, who reigned two and twenty Years, and founded the Monastery of Winchcomb in the County of Gloucester, where his Body was interred. The eighteenth King was Witblase, who, overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, held his Countrey afterward as his Substitute and Tributary, acknowledging Egbert as now the sole Monarch of this Island. And by Erection of this Mercian Kingdom, were seventeen Shires more lopped off from the Britains Dominions, and this was a sixth, and a great impairing; so as now they were driven into a narrow Room.

THE seventh Kingdom was of the East Angles, and began by Offa in the Year

575, containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge-shire, and the Isle of Ely, and continued 353 Years during the Reign of fifteen Kings, of whom the fifth was Sigebert, who first brought the Light of the Gospel into his Dominions, and built a School for Education of Youth, whether at Oxford, or Cambridge, is left a Quære; and after three Years Reign shored himself a Monk in the Abbey of Cumburg, which himself had built: But being afterward violently drawn from thence by his Subjects the East Angles to resist the Mercian King Penda, and refusing to use any other Weapon but only a white Wand, was in a Battel by him slain. The seventh King was Anna, who after thirteen Years Reign, was also slain by Penda the Mercian King. This King Anna was memorable chiefly for the Holiness of his Children, of whom his Son Erkenwald was Bishop of London, and built the Abbey of Barking, near London. His eldest Daughter Etheldred was twice married, and yet continued a Virgin still, and at last became a Nun, and is remembered to Posterity by the Name of St. Audrie. His second Daughter named Sexburg, his third named Ethelburg, his fourth (a natural Daughter) named Witburg, all entered into Monasteries, and are canonized all for Saints. The fourteenth King was Ethelbert, a learned and religious Prince, who being invited by Offa the Mercian King to marry Elfred his Daughter, came for that Purpose to Offa's Court, then seated at Sutton Walleys in the County of Hereford, and there by him was cruelly murdered: In whose Memorial notwithstanding, he afterward built a fair Church at Hereford, the Cathedral of that See, as tho' he could expiate a Murder of the Living, by a Monument to the Dead, and were not rather a Monument of his own Impiety. The fifteenth King was Edmund, who assaulted by the Danes for his Possessions, was more assaulted for his Profession; for continuing constant in his Christian Faith, those Pagans first beat him with Bats, then scourged him with Whips, and lastly bound him to a Stake, and with their Arrows shot him to death, whose Body was buried at the Town where Sigebert the East Anglian King, one of his Predecessors, had built a Church, and where afterward (in Honour of him) was built another most spacious, of a wonderful Frame of Timber, and the Name of the Town, upon the occasion of his Burial there, called to this Day St. Edmundsbury. This Church and Place, Suenus the Danish King burnt to Ashes: But when his Son Canutus had gotten Possession of the English Crown, terrified with a Vision of the seeming St. Edmund, in a religious Devotion to expiate his Father's Sacrilege, he built it a new most sumptuously, and offered his own Crown upon the Martyr's Tomb. After the Death of this Edmund, the East Angles Countrey was possess'd by the Danes, and so continued the Space of fifty Years, until that Edmund, surnamed the Elder, expelled those Danes, and made that Kingdom a Province to the West Saxons.

pears, by what Degrees the Britains lost, and the Saxons got the whole Possession of this Island. For after that Vortigern, in the Year 455, had called in the Saxons, every Britain King that succeeded him, lost some part or other of it to the Saxons, till at last, in the Year 689, Cadwallader the last Britain King lost all; and then the Saxon Kings striving amongst themselves for Sovereignty, they still gained one upon another, till at last in the Year 818, Egbert King of the West Saxons reduced them all under his Subjection, and then caused all the South of the Island to be called England, according to the Angles of whom himself came: After whom they were no longer properly called Saxon Kings, but Kings of England, and so continued till the Danes, in the Year 1017, made an Interruption; of whose Succession now comes the Time to speak.

When first called England.

Of the Saxons that reigned sole Kings of this Island, and may properly be called English Kings.

Egbert* the eighteenth King of the West Saxons, is now become the first of the Kings of England, in whose Time the Danes began first to infest the Land, as thinking they might do as much against the Saxons, as the Saxons had done against the Britains; but tho' they made divers Invasions, and did great Spoil, yet they were still repelled. This King reigned six and thirty Years, and dying in the Year 836, was buried at Winchester. Of his Issue, his Daughter Edith was made Governess of a Monastery of Ladies, by her planted in a Place which the King her Brother had given her, called Pollefworth, situate in Arden, in the north Part of the Countrey of Warwick, where she died and was buried, and the Place in Memory of her, call'd St. Edith's of Pollefworth.

The Danes begin to infest England.

St. Edith's of Pollefworth, why so called.

To Egbert succeeded his Son Ethelwolp, who in his Youth was so addicted to a religious Life, that he was first made Deacon, and after Bishop of Winchester; but his Father dying, he was intreated by his People to take upon him the Crown, and by Pope Gregory the Fourth was to that end absolved of his Vow. His Reign was infested with many and great Invasions of the Danes, to whom notwithstanding he gave incredible Overthrows. In the Time of his Reign, remembering his former religious Profession, he ordained, That Riches and Lands due to the Holy Church, should be free from all Tribute or regal Services, and in great Devotion went himself to Rome, where he lived a Year: confirmed the Grant of Peter-Pence, and agreed besides to pay yearly to Rome three hundred Marks. Returning home through France, and being a Widower, he there married Judith, the beautiful Daughter of Charles the Bald, then Emperor; in Honour of whom, in his own Court, he ever placed her in a Chair of State, with all other majestic Complements of a Queen, contrary to the Law of the West Saxons formerly made, which so much displeased his Lords, that for it they were ready to depose him: But howsoever he lived not long after, having reigned one and twenty Years. His youngest Son Neote was much addicted to Learning, and was one of the Divinity Readers in the University of Oxford, and founded a Monastery in Cornwal, which of him was called Neotestock; and being dead his Body was interred in the Countrey of Huntington, at a Place then called Arnulphsbury; and afterward, in regard of his Interment, S. Neote's, and now S. Nede's. This King was famous for having four Sons, all of them were Kings of this Land successively.

St. Nede's in Huntingdonshire, why so called.

First after him reigned his eldest Son Ethelbald in the Year 857, who to his eternal Shame, took to Wife Judith his Father's Widow, reigned about two Years, and dying, was buried at Sbirborn in Dorsetshire, at that time the Episcopal See. From this Judith, married afterward to the Earl of Flanders, after divers Descents, came Maude the Wife of William the Conqueror, from whom are descended all our Kings every since.

King Ethelbald marries his Father's Widow.

Next to the eldest reigned his second Son Ethelbert; all whose Reign, which was only five Years, was perpetually disquieted with Invasions of the Danes, which yet were at last repelled. He died in the Year 866, and was buried at Sbirborn in Dorsetshire.

The Danes invade England again.

Next to the second reigned his third Son Ethelred, whose Reign was more disquieted with the Danes than any other before: For they invaded the Land, under the Leading of Hungar and Hubba, spoiled all the Countrey as they went, not sparing religious Places; amongst other, the goodly Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Huntington, they laid level with the Ground: The Monks and Nuns they murdered or ravished: At which time a rare Example of Chastity and Fortitude was seen in the Nuns of Coldingham: For to avoid the barbarous Pollutions of these Pagans, they deformed themselves by cutting off their upper Lips and Noses: Nine Battels in one Year this King fought with the Danes, in most of them victorious; but at last received a Wound whereof he died, and was buried in the Church at Winborn in Dorsetshire.

The Nuns of Coldingham, their Chastity.

Next to the third reigned his fourth Son Alfred, in whose Time came over greater Swarms of Danes than ever before, and had now got Footing in the North, the West, and South Parts of this Island, leaving this King nothing of all his great Monarchy, but only Somerset, Hampshire, and Wiltshire, and not these neither altogether free; so that he was forced sometimes to fly into the Fens and Marsh Grounds to secure himself; where he lived by Fishing and Fowling, and hunting of wild Beasts, till at last learning Policy from Adversity, and gathering Courage from Misery, he ventured in the Habit of a common Minstrel to enter the Danes Camp; where having viewed the Manner of their encamping, and observed their Security, he returned back, shewing his Lords in what Condition he found them. Whereupon setting upon them at unawares, he not only made of them a great Slaughter, but brought upon them a greater Terror; for presently upon this the Danes sue for Peace, and deliver Hostages for Performance of these Conditions: That their King should receive Baptism, and their great Army depart quietly out of the Land. But though upon this Agreement they departed for the present into France, yet the Year following they returned with greater Forces, foraging all parts of the Countrey in most cruel manner, though still encountered by this valorous Prince, till he ended his Life in the Year 901, after he had reigned nine and twenty Years. The Virtues of this King, if they were not incredible, they were at least admirable, whereof these may be Instances. The Day and Night containing 24 Hours, he designed equally for three special Uses, observing them by the burning of a Taper set in his Chapel (there being at that time no other way of distinguishing them). Eight Hours he spent in Contemplation, Reading, and Prayers: Eight in Provision for himself, his Health and Recreation; and the other eight in the Affairs of the Commonwealth and State. His Kingdom likewise he divided into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings: Ordained that no Man might remove out of his Hundred without Security: By which course he so suppressed Thieves and Robbers, which had formerly increased by the long Wars, that it is said a Boy or a Girl might openly carry a Bag of Gold or Silver, and carry it safely all the Countrey over: Besides his great Piety, he was also learned, and as far as it might be a Commendation in a Prince, a skilful Musician, and excellent Poet. All former Laws he caused to be surveyed, and made Choice of the best, which he translated into the English Tongue; as also the Pastoral of St. Gregory, the History of Bede, and Boëtius his Consolation of Philosophy; the Psalms of David likewise he began to translate, but died before he could finish it. And so great a Love he had to Learning, that he made a Law, that all Freemen of the Kingdom possessing two Hides of Land, should bring up their Sons in Learning, till they were fifteen Years of Age at least, that so they might be trained to know God, to be men of Understanding, and to live happily. His Buildings were many, both for God's Service, and other publick Use: As at Edlensy a Monastery, at Winchester a new Minster, and at Shaftesbury a House of Nuns; whereof he made his Daughter Ethelgeda the Abbess. But his Foundation of the University of Oxford exceeded all the rest: Which he began in the Year 895, and to furnish it with able Scholars, drew thither out of France, Grimbaldus and Scotus, and out of Wales, Affer, (who wrote his Life) whose Lectures he honoured often with his own Presence: And for a Stock of Frugality, he made a Survey of the Kingdom, and had all the Particulars of his Estate registred in a Book, which he kept in his Treasury at Winchester. He reigned seven and twenty Years, and dying was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Peter at Winchester, though removed afterwards into the Church of the new Monastery, without the North Gate of the City called Hyde. His Wife Elfewith founded a Monastery of Nuns at Winchester, and was there buried. Their second Daughter Ethelgeda, took upon her the Vow of Virginity; and by her Father's appointment was made a Nun of Shaftesbury, in the County of Dorset, Shaftesbury, in the Monastery founded there by him, who is also accounted the Founder of the Town it self.

King Alfred being deceased, his Son Edward (called Edward the Elder) succeeded: Not so learned as his Father; but in Valour his equal, and superior in Fortune; for first he overcame his Cousin Ethelwald, who aspir'd to the Crown; then the Danes, whose chief Leader he slew in Battel; lastly the Welsh, but these last more by Humility shewed to their Prince Leolyn, than by force of Arms. But yet he must not have all the Glory of his Time: Some must be imparted to his Sister Elfede; who being married to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, had by him a Daughter, but with so grievous Pains in her Travel, that ever after she refused the Nuptial Bed of her Husband, saying, it was a foolish Pleasure that brought with it so excessive Pains: And thereupon after her Husband's Death, Elfede forsook the Wars; assisting her Brother both against the Welsh, and against the Danes, whom she brought to be at her disposing. Dying, she was buried at Glocester, in the Monastery of St. Peter, which her Husband and her self had built. King Edward himself, after four and twenty Years Reign, deceased at Foringdon in Barkshire, in the Year 924, and was buried at the new Monastery of Winchester, which his Father and himself wholly finished: Having had by his three Wives, six Sons and nine Daughters, of whom his eldest Son Athelstan succeeded him in the Kingdom, whom his Grandfather King Alfred had with his own Hands knighted in an extraordinary manner, putting upon him a purple Robe, and girding him with a Girdle wrought with Pearl. His second Son Elfred he so loved, that he caused him to be crowned King with himself, which yet he enjoyed but a short time, being taken away by death. His third Son Elfeward, presently upon his Father's Death died himself also. His fourth Son Edwyn, was by his Brother Athelstan, out of Jealousie of State, put into a little Pinnace, without either Tackle or Oars, accompanied only with one Page; with grief whereof, the young Prince leaped into the Sea, and drowned himself. His fifth and his sixth Sons, Edmund and Edred, came in Succession to be Kings of England. Of his Daughters, the eldest Editba, was married to Sithricke the Danish King of Northumberland; and he deceasing, she entered into a Monastery which she began at Tamworth in Warwickshire, and there died. His second Daughter Elfede took upon her the Vow of Virginity, in the Monastery of Ramsay, in the County of Southampton, where she died and was interred. His third Daughter Eugina, was first married to Charles the Simple, King of France; and after his Decease, to Herbert Earl of Vermansdois.

His fifth Daughter Edbold, was married to Hugh, surnamed the Great Earl of Paris, and Constable of France. And Edgith his sixth Daughter to Otbo, the Emperor of the West, surnamed the Great. His seventh Daughter Elgina was married to a Duke of Italy. After the Death of King Edward, his eldest Son Athelstan succeeded, and was crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, in the County of Surrey by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 924. The Beginning of whose Reign was molested with the Treason of one Elfred a Nobleman; who being apprehended and sent to Rome to purge himself, and there denying the Act upon his Oath, fell suddenly down, and within three Days died, to the eternal Terror of all perjured Persons. Presently upon this, another Disaster befel King Athelstan for having caused his Brother Edwyn's Death, (as before is shewed) chiefly procured by his Cup-bearer's Suggestions; it happened not long after, that his Cup-bearer in his Service at a Festival, stumbled with one Foot, and recovering himself with the other, and saying merrily, See how one Brother helps another; his Words put the King in Remembrance of his Brother, whose Death he had caused, and with Remorse thereof not only caused his Cup-bearer to be put to Death, but did also seven Years Penance; and built the two Monasteries of Middleton and Michelnefs, in the County of Dorset, in Expiation of his Offence. This King ordained many good Laws, and those to bind as well the Clergy as the Laity; amongst which, one was the Attachment of Felons that stole above twelve Pence, and were above twelve Years old. Of this King there is one Act related that may seem ridiculous; another that may seem miraculous: For what more ridiculous than that going to visit the Tomb of St. John of Beverly, and having nothing else of worth to offer, he offered his Knife in Devotion to the Saint! Yet the miraculous is more apparent; for going to encounter the Danes, and praying to God for good Success, he prayed withal that God would shew some Sign of his rightful Cause; and thereupon striking with his Sword, he struck it an Ell deep into a hard Stone, which stood so cloven a long time after. But whether this be true or no, this certainly is true, that he obtained many great Victories against the Danes, against the Scots, against the Irish, and against the Welsh, whose Princes he brought to be his Tributaries, entering Covenant at Hereford to pay him yearly twenty Pound Weight of Gold, three hundred of Silver, and five and twenty hundred Head of Cattle; besides a certain Number of Hawks and Hounds. Lastly he joyned Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and enlarged his Dominions beyond any of his Predecessors: Which made all neighbouring Princes to seek his Friendship, and to gratify him with rare Presents, as Hugh King of France sent him the Sword of Constantine the Great, in the Hilt whereof was one of the Nails which fastened Christ to his Cross: He sent him also the Holy Reliques sent to King Athelstan. Spear of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same that pierced Christ's Side; as also part of the Cross whereon Christ suffered, and a piece of the thorny Crown put upon his Head. Likewise Otbo the Emperor, who had married his Sister, sent him a Vessel of precious Stones, artificially made, wherein were seen Landscips with Vines, Corn and Men, all of them seeming so artificially to move as they were growing and alive. Likewise the King of Norway sent him a goodly Ship with a gilt Stern, purple Sails, and the Deck garnished all with Gold. Of these accounted holy Reliques, King Athelstan gave part to the Abbey of Saint Swithin in Winchester, and the rest to the Monastery of Malmesbury, whereof Adelm was the Founder, and his tutelar Saint. He new built the Monasteries of Winton, Michelnefs, and Middelton; Founded Saint Germans in Cornwal, Saint Petrus at Bodmyn, and the Priory of Pilton; new walled and beautified the City of Exeter, and enriched either with Jewels or Lands every special Abbey of the Land. But the chiefest of his Works for the Service of God and Good of his Subjects, was the Translation of The Bible into the Saxon Tongue, which was translated into the Saxon Tongue. then the Mother Tongue of the Land. He reigned fifteen Years, died at Glocester, and was buried at Malmesbury in the Year 940, having never been married.

After the Death of Athelstan, his Brother Edmund, the fifth Son of his Father, succeeded, and was crowned at Kingston upon Thames: but no sooner was the Crown set upon his Head, but the Danes were upon his Back, and in Northumberland made Insurrections; whom yet he not only repressed in that part, but took from them the Towns of Lincoln, Leicester, Darby, Stafford, and Nottingham; compelling them withal to receive Baptism, and to become his Subjects, so as the Countrey was wholly his as far as Humber. Cumberland also, which had been an entire Kingdom of it self, and was now aided by Leolyn King of South-wales, he utterly wasted, and gave it Malcolm King of the Scots to hold of him by Fealty. His good Laws. After his returning home, he set himself to ordain Laws for the Good of his People, which Master Lambert hath since translated into Latin. But after all his noble Acts, both in War and Peace, he came at last to a lamentable End; for at his Manour of Pucklekerks in the County of Glocester, interposing himself to part a Fray between two of his Servants, he was thrust through the Body, and so wounded that he died; or as the Saxon Annals relate, was slain by one Leof a noted Thief, whom meeting at a Feast among his Nobles after he had banish'd him the Court, he fell upon in great rage. He was buried at Glastenbury after he had reigned five Years and seven Months; leaving behind him two young Sons, Edwyn and Edgar. His unfortuthe Minority of his Nephews was crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 946; not as Protector, (it seems that kind of Authority was not yet come in use) but as King himself, tho' with purpose to resign when the right Heir should come of Age, which at this time needed not; for while the right Heir was scarce yet fourteen Years old, he resigned to him the Kingdom, by resigning his Life to Nature after he had twice repressed the rebelling Northumbrians, and twice forgiven their rebelling, which yet was not a simple Rebellion: For they had sent for Anlaf the Dane out of Ireland, and made him their King; which Place for four Years he held; and then weary of his Government, they thrust him out, and took one Henricus to be their King, whom not long after they put down also; and then partly allured by the Lenity of King Edred, and partly forced by his Arms, they submit themselves to him, and ask Forgiveness; to whom he, as a merciful Prince, grants an Act of Oblivion, and received them again into Protection. The Prince was so devout and humble, that he submitted his Body to be chastised at the Will of Dunstan Abbot of Glastenbury, and committed all his Treasure and Jewels to his Custody. The stately Abbey of Mich at Abington near Oxford, built by King Ina, but destroyed by the Danes, he newly re-edified, endowing it with Revenues and Lands, the Charters whereof he confirmed with Seals of Gold. He ordained Saint German in Cornwal to be a Bishop's See, which there continued, till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopal See of Kyrton in Devonshire; both which Sees were afterward by K. Edward the Confessor translated to the City of Exeter. He left behind him two Sons, Elfred and Bertferd, and was buried in the old Minster, without the City of Winchester, whose Bones with other Kings are to this Day preserved in a gilt Coffer, fixed upon the Wall, in the South Side of the Quire.

King Edred's Devotion.

Exeter made the Episcopal See.

After Edred, not any of his Sons, but his Nephew Edwyn, the eldest Son of King Edmund, succeeded, and was anointed and crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 955. This Prince, tho' scarce fourteen Years old, and in Age but a Child, yet was able to commit Sin as a Man; for upon the very Day of his Coronation, and in Sight of his Lords, as they sat in Council, he shamefully abused a Lady of great Estate, and his near Kinswoman; and to mend the matter, shortly after slew her Husband, the more freely to enjoy his incestuous Pleasure. And whether for this infamous Fact, or for thrusting the Monks out of the Monasteries of Malmesbury and Glastenbury, and placing married Priests in their room, as also for banishing Dunstan the holy Abbot of Glastenbury out of the Realm, a great part of his Subjects Hearts was so turned against him, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and swore Fealty to his younger Brother Edgar; with Grief whereof, after four Years Reign, he ended his Life, and was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hyde at Winchester.

King Edwyn's shameful Fact at his Coronation.

After Edwyn, succeeded his younger Brother Edgar, at the Age of sixteen Years; but his Coronation, when and where, and by whom, is so uncertain, that some say he was crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the first Year of his Reign; others say not till the twelfth, and William of Malmesbury not till the thirtieth. Another Chronicle saith, in his eleventh Year; and that in the City of Bath, by the Hands of Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury. This King, by reason of the Tranquillity of his Reign, was surnamed the Peaceable; for as he was something inclined to the Danes, so the Danes never offered to stir in all his time; and as for the Saxons, they acknowledged him their sole Sovereign, without Division of Provinces or Titles. His Acts were some virtuous, some politick, some just, some pious; and yet all these not without some mixture of Vice.

King Edgar, called the Peaceable.

To repress Drunkenness, which the Danes had brought in, he made a Law, ordaining a Size, by certain Pins in the Pot, with Penalty to any that should presume to drink deeper than the Mark. It was a politick Device which he used for the Destruction of Wolves that in his Days did great Annoyance to the Land: For the Tribute imposed on the Princes of Wales, by King Atbelstan, he wholly remitted, appointing in lieu thereof a certain Number of Wolves yearly to be paid; whereof the Prince of North Wales for his part was to pay three hundred, which continued for three Years space: And in the fourth Year, there was not a Wolf to be found; and so the Tribute ceased. He had in his Navy Royal three thousand and six hundred Ships, which he divided into three Parts, appointing every one of them to a several Quarter, to scour the Seas, and to secure the Coasts from Pirates: and lest his Officers might be careless, or corrupted, he would himself in Person sail about all the Coasts of his Kingdom every Summer. It was a notable Act of Justice, that in all his Circuits and Progresses thro' the Countrey, he would take special Account of the Demeanour of his Lords, and specially of his Judges, whom he severely punished, if he found them Delinquents. Wars he had none in all his Reign, only towards his End the Welshmen moved some Rebellion, against whom he went with a mighty Army, and chastised the Authors: But when his Soldiers had gotten great Spoils, and made Prey upon the innocent Countrey People, he commanded them to restore it all back again; which, if it made some few English angry, it made the whole Countrey of the Welsh well pleased, and sound forth his Praises. His pious Acts were, that he built and prepared seven and forty Monasteries, and meant to have made them up fifty, but was prevented by Death. But now his Mixture of Vice marred all; especially being a Vice opposite to all those Virtues, which was Lasciviousness. For first, he de-flower'd a sacred Nun, called Wolfsbilde; on whom yet he begot a Saint, the chaste Edyth. After her another Virgin, called Etbelfleda, for her excellent Beauty surnamed the White, on whom he begot his eldest Son Edward; for for which Faſt he did ſeven Years Penance, enjoined him by the Archbiſhop Dunſtan. After this he chanced to hear of a Virgin, Daughter to a Weſtern Duke, exceedingly praiſed for her Beauty; and coming to Andover, commanded her to his Bed. But the Mother, tender of her Daughter's Honour, brought in the dark her Maid to him; who in the Morning making haſte to riſe, and the King not ſuffering her to depart, ſhe told him what great Work ſhe had to do, and how ſhe ſhould incur her Lady's Diſpleaſure if it were not done; by which Words the King perceiving the Deceit, turned it to a Jeſt: But ſo well liked her Company, that he kept himſelf true to her ever after, till he married. But now his Marriage itſelf happen'd by a greater Vice than any of theſe; for hearing of the admirable Beauty of Elfrida, the only Daughter of Ordangus Duke of Devonſhire, Founder of Taveſtock Abbey in that Countrey, he ſent his great Favourite E. Ethelwold, (who could well judge of Beauty) to try the truth thereof; with Commiſſion, that if he found her ſuch as Fame reported, he ſhould ſeiſe her for him, and he would make her his Queen. The young Earl upon Sight of the Lady, was ſo ſurprized with her Love, that he began to woo for himſelf, and got her Father's good Will, ſo as the King would give his Conſent. Hereupon the Earl poſted to the King, relating to him that the Maid was fair indeed, but nothing answerable to the Fame that went of her; yet deſired the King that he might marry her, as being her Father's Heir, thereby to raiſe his Fortunes. The King conſented, and the Marriage was ſolemnized. Soon after the Fame of her Beauty began to ſpread more than before; ſo as the King much doubting that he had been abuſed, meant to try the Truth himſelf, and thereupon taking occaſion of hunting in the Duke's Park, came to his Houſe; whoſe coming Ethelwold ſuſpecting, acquainted his Wife with the Wrong he had done both her and the King; and therefore to prevent the King's Diſpleaſure, intreated her by all the Perſuaſions he could uſe, to cloath her ſelf in ſuch Attire, as might be leaſt fit to ſet her forth: But ſhe conſidering that now was the time to make the moſt of her Beauty, and longing to be a Queen, would not be acceſſory to her own Wrong, but decked her ſelf in her richeſt Ornaments, which ſo improved her Beauty, that the King at the firſt Sight was ſtruck with Admiration, and meant to be revenged of his perfidious Favourite; yet diſſembling his Paſſion, till he could take him at Advantage, he then with a Javelin ran him through; and having thereby made fair Elfrida a Widow, took her to be his Wife. This King founded the Monastery of Ramſey in Hampſhire, reigned ſixteen Years, lived ſeven and thirty, and with great funeral Pomp was buried in the Abbey of Glaſtenbury. He had Children by his firſt Wife Ethelfreda, one Son named Edward, and by his ſecond Wife Elfrid two Sons, one named Edmund, who died young, the other Ethelred. He had alſo one natural Daughter

This Edgyth built the Monastery and Church of Saint Dennis at Wilton, and was there buried.

After the Death of King Edgar ſucceeds his Son Edward, but not without ſome Oppoſition; for Queen Elfrid combined with divers of the Lords to make her Son Ethelred King, ſaying, that Prince Edward was illegitimate; on the other ſide, the Archbiſhop Dunſtan, and the Monks ſtood for Edward, abetting his Title as being lawfully born; but while the Council was aſſembled to argue their Rights, the Archbiſhop came in with his Banner and Croſs, and not ſtaying for debating de Jure, de Faſto preſented Prince Edward for their lawful King; and the Aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy-men, drew the Approbation of the reſt; and thereupon Prince Edward was admitted, being but twelve Years of Age, and was crowned King at Kingſton upon Thames by Archbiſhop Dunſtan, in the Year 975. In the Beginning of his Reign, it fell into Debate whether married Priests were to be allowed to live in Monasteries upon the Revenues of the Church. The Mercian Duke Alferus, favouring the Cauſe of the married Priests, deſtroyed the Monasteries in his Province, caſt out the Monks, and reſtored again the ancient Revenues to the Priests and their Wives. On the other ſide, Edelwyn Duke of the Eaſt Angles, and Brynoth Earl of Suffex, who ſtood for the Monks, caſt married Priests out of their Provinces. The Matter being debated in a Council at Weſtmiſter, the Monks Cauſe was like to have the Foil, till he had referred to the Rood, placed on the reſectory Wall where the Council ſate: For to this great Oracle Saint Dunſtan deſired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent Ear for an Answer; when ſuddenly a Voice was heard to ſay, God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo. This was thought Authority ſufficient to ſuppreſs the Priests, till they perſuaded the People, that this was but a cunning Practice of the Monks, in placing behind the Wall a Man of their own, who thro' a Trunk uttered theſe Words in the Mouth of the Rood. Whereupon another Aſſembly was appointed at Cleve in Wiltſhire, whither repaired the Prelates, with moſt of all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom. The Synod being ſet, and the Matter at the Height of diſcuſſing, it happened that the Joists of the Room where the Synod was held ſuddenly brake, and the Floor with all the People thereon fell down, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlain; only the Archbiſhop Dunſtan, then Preſident, and Mouth for the Monks, remained unhurt; which whether it were done by Practice, or were miraculous, it ſerved the Monks turn for juſtifying their Cauſe, and married Priests were thereupon diſcarded. It were infinite, and indeed ridiculous, to ſpeak of all the Miracles reported to be done by this St. Dunſtan, which may may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.

But now a most lamentable Disaster comes to be remembred: For King Edward, hunting one time in the Island of Purbeck, not far from Corfe Castle, where his Mother-in-law Queen Elfrid, with his Brother Prince Ethelred, were then residing, he, out of his Love to both, would needs himself alone go visit them; where the cruel Woman, out of Ambition to bring her own Son to the Crown, caused one to run him into the Back with a Knife, as he was drinking a Cup of Wine on Horseback at his departing; who feeling himself hurt, set Spurs to his Horse, thinking thereby to get to his Company; but the Wound being mortal, and he fainting thro' loss of much Blood, fell from his Horse; but one Foot being entangled in the Stirrup, he was thereby rufully dragged up and down through Woods and Lands; and lastly, left dead at Corfe's Gate: For which untimely Death, he was ever after called by the Name of Edward the Martyr. He reigned only three Years and six Months and was buried, first at Winchester without all Funeral Pomp, but after three Years, by Duke Alferus removed, and with great Solemnity interred in the Minster of Shaftsbury. Queen Elfrid, to expiate this her bloody Fact, built the two Monasteries of Almesbury and Worwel, in the Counties of Wiltshire and Southampton, in which latter, with great Repentance, she lived till her Death.

After the Death of Edward the Martyr, dying at the Age of sixteen Years, his half Brother Ethelred, at the Age of twelve Years, in the Year 979, was crowned King at Kingston upon Thames, by Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, though much against his Will; which King, by reason of his Backwardness in Action, was commonly called the Unready. At the Coronation of this Prince, St. Dunstan in a prophetick Spirit denounced on him and the Kingdom, the Wrath and Indignation of Almighty God in these Words following; Because (saith he) thou hast aspired to the Crown by the Death of thy Brother whom thy Mother hath murdered; therefore hear the Word of the Lord: The Sword shall not depart from thy House, but furiously rage all the Days of thy Life, killing of thy Seed, till such time as thy Kingdom shall be given to a People whose Customs and Language the Nation thou now governeest know not. Neither shall thy Sin, the Sin of thy Mother, and the Sin of those Men who were Partakers of her Counsels, and Executors of her wicked Designs, be expiated, but by a long and most severe Vengeance. Which Prediction of the holy Archbishop was seconded by Prodigies, and by the disastrous Calamities which fell on him and his House, and the whole confirmed for Truth. Besides this, most remarkable are the Prophecies of a holy Man in the Time of this King Ethelred. Before whose Time for two and twenty Years past the Danes had lived as quiet Inmates with the English: But whether weary of so long doing nothing, or finding now Opportunity of doing something, in the second Year of this King, they began to stir, and inviting from home, Forces who in seven Ships arrived upon the Coast of Kent, they spoiled all the Countrey, specially the Isle of Thanet, and continued this Course of forraging the Kingdom, sometimes in one Part, and sometimes in another, for eleven Years together: Till at last, in the Year 991, the King, by advice of his Lords, of whom Siricius the now Archbishop of Canterbury was chief, was contented to pay them ten thousand Pounds, upon Condition they should quietly depart the Realm. This served the Turn for the present, but was so far from satisfying them, that it did but give them the greater Appetite; for the Year following they came again, and that with a greater Fleet than before, against whom the King prepared a competent Navy, and committed it to Elfrick Earl of Mercia; but he proving treacherous (as indeed all other for the most part did whom the King employed against the Danes, as with whom they were allied in Blood) the Danes so prevailed, that for the next Composition they had sixteen thousand Pounds given them, and a Year after twenty thousand; and so every Year more and more, till it came at last to forty thousand: By which means, the Land was emptied of all Coin, and the English were brought so low, that they were fain to till, and ear the Ground, whilst the Danes sate idle, and eat the Fruit of their Labours, abusing the Wives and Daughters of their Hosts, where they lay, and yet in every Place for very Fear, were called Lord Danes; (which afterward became a Word of derision when one would signify a lazy Lubbard). In this distressed State, the King at last bethought himself of a Course. He sent forth a secret Commission into every City within his Dominions, that at an appointed Time they should massacre all the Danes that were amongst them: The Day was the thirteenth of November, being the Festival of St. Bricius, in the Year 1002. His Command was accordingly performed, and with such Rigour, that in Oxford the Danes for Refuge took into the Church of St. Fridefwide, as into a Sanctuary, when the English neither regarding Place nor Person, set the Church on fire, wherein many of the Danes were burnt, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. And who would not now think, but that England by this Fact had clean shaken off the Danish Yoke for ever? Yet it proved clean otherwise: For the News of this Massacre, adding a new Edge of Revenge, to the old Edge of Ambition, made the Danes sharper set against the English than ever they had been before; so as the Year following, their King Sweyne, with a mighty Navy entered the Countrey, raised and levelled with the Ground the City of Exeter, all along from the East Gate to the West: Against whom the King levied an Army, and made General over it the Earl Edrick, his great Favorite, whom he had created Duke of Mercia, and given him his Daughter Edgith in Marriage: Yet all this great Favour could not keep him from being treacherous; for being sent Ambassador to the Danes to medi-ate for Peace he revealed to them the Weakness of the Land, and treacherously dissuaded them from consenting to any Truce. Upon this King Ethelred gave Order, that every three hundred and ten Hides of Land should build a Ship, and every eight Hides find a compleat Armour furnished; yet all this great Preparation came to nothing, but only to make a Show. After this, the King seeing no End of their Invasions, nor promise kept upon any Composition; (for three Danish Princes, with a great Fleet were now newly arrived) he intended to adventure once for all, and to commit his Cause to God, by the Fortune of a Battle. To which End he secretly gathered a mighty Power, and coming unlooked for, when the Enemy was unprepared he had certainly given an End to the Quarrel, if the wicked Edrick had not dissuaded them from fighting, and put him into a causeless Fear, by forged Tales. After this the Danes foraged many Countries, burnt Oxford, Thetford, and Cambridge; and lastly entered Wiltshire, which was the seventh shire in number they had laid waste like a Wilderness. The Year after they make a new Expedition, and besiege Canterbury; which by Treason of a Church-man they won, took Alphegus the Archbishop, and slew nine hundred Monks, and Men of Religion, besides many Citizens, without all Mercy; for they tythed the People, slaying all by nines, and only reserving the tenth to live; so that of all the Monks in the Town there were but four saved, and of the Lay-people, four thousand eight hundred; by which account Master Lambert collecteth, that there died in this Massacre three and forty thousand, and two hundred Persons. The Archbishop Alphegus, for that he refused to charge his Tenant with three thousand Pounds to pay for his Ransom, they most cruelly stoned to Death at Greenwich. Turkillus the Leader of these Murtherers, took into his Possession all Norfolk and Suffolk, over whom he tyrannized in most savage manner; the rest compounding with the English for eight thousand Pounds, quietly for a while sojourned among them. The Year following came King Sweyne again, and with a great Navy arrived in the Mouth of Humber, and landed at Gainsborough, to whom the Northumbrians, and the People of Lindsey yielded themselves; so that now over all the North, from Watling-street, he reigned sole King, and exacted Pledges of them for their further Obedience. From the North he passed into the South, subduing all before him till he came to London, where he was so valiantly encountred by the Londoners, that he was glad to retire, in which retiring notwithstanding he entred Bathe, where Ethelmore Earl of Devonshire, with his Western People, submitted himself to him. Yet after this, between him and the English was struck a fierce Battle, which had been with good Success, if the Treachery of some in turning to the Danes had not hindered it. After this the Danes proceeded on victoriously, and had gotten most part of the Land, and even London also by Submission: Whereupon the unfortunate King Ethelred, sending his Wife Emma, with her two Sons, Edward and Alfred, to her Brother Duke of Normandy, himself also the Winter following passed thither, leaving the Danes Lording it in his Realm. Sweyne now as an absolute King extorted from the English both Victuals and Pay for his Soldiers; and demanding such a Composition for preserving of St. Edmund's Monastery in Suffolk, as the Inhabitants were not able, and therefore refused to pay: He thereupon threatned Spoil, both to the Place, and to the Martyr's bones that were there interred; when suddenly in the midst of his jollity (saith Hoveden) he cried out that he was struck by Saint Edmund with a Sword, being then in the midst of his Lords, and no Man seeing from whose Hand it came; and so with great Horror and Torment, three Days after, upon the third of February, he ended his Life at Thetford, or (as others say) at Gainsborough. And now who would not think but this was a fair Opportunity offered to the English, to free themselves wholly from the Danish Yoke? But when all was done, either crossed by Treachery, or frustrated by Misfortune, nothing prospered. It is true, upon this occasion of Sweyne's Death, K. Ethelred returned out of Normandy; but at his coming Canutus the Son of Sweyne, had gotten the People of Lindsey to be at his Devotion, and to find him both Horse and Men, against their own King; so as Ethelred was now to encounter as well with his own Subjects as Danes, which he did so valiantly, that he made Canutus glad to return into Denmark, as utterly hopeless of any good to be done in England. And now one would certainly think the Danes had been removed Root and Branch out of England, and never like to trouble the Land any more; and indeed there was all the Appearance of Probability for it that could be. But it is a true Saying, That which will be, shall be, let all be done that can be. For now Turkil the Dane, who had before revolted to King Ethelred, growing sensible of his Fault, which was this, or no way, to be redeemed; and tender of his Countrey-mens case, which was now or never to be helpt; with nine of his Ships failed into Denmark; and first excusing himself to Canutus for his former Defection, as though he had done it of purpose, to learn all Advantages against the English, which now he could discover to him: He so prevailed with Canutus once again to try his Fortune, that with a Navy of two hundred Ships he set sail for England, and landed at Sandwich, where he gave the English a great Overthrow, and passed victoriously through the Counties of Dorset, Somerset, and Wilts. When (Ethelred lying dangerously sick at Cossam) the managing of the War was committed to Prince Edmund his Son, who preparing to give the Danes Battle, had suddenly Notice given him, that his Brother-in-Law Edrick meant to betray him into his Enemies hands, which made him suspend his Proceeding: And Edrick perceiving his Design to be discovered, cast off the Masque, and with forty of the King's Ships fled openly to the Enemy:

Enemy: And thereupon all the West Countries submitted themselves unto Canutus. By this Time K. Ethelred having recovered his Sickness, prepared to go on with the Battel which his Son Edmund had intended; but his Forces being assembled, he likewise had suddenly notice given him, that his Subjects meant to betray him to the Danes. Hereupon he withdrew himself to London, as the Place in which he most confided; where falling into a Relapse of his former Sickness, he ended his unfortunate Days in the Year 1016, when he had reigned 37 Years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, whose Bones as yet remain in the North wall of the Chancel, in a Chest of grey Marble, adjoining to that of Sebba, King of the East Saxons. He had by his two Wives eight Sons, and four Daughters; of whom his youngest named Goda, was married to one Walter de Maigne, a Nobleman of Normandy, by whom she had a Son named Rodolph, which Rodolph had a Son named Harold, created afterward by K. William the Conqueror Baron of Sudley in the County of Glocester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that Place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudley, now being.

Edmund Ironside crowned King.

Ethelred being dead, his third Son Edmund, called Ironside (of his Ability in enduring Labour) but the eldest living at his Father's Death, succeeded, and was crowned at Kingston upon Thames, by Levingus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 1016. A great part of the English both feared and favoured, and indeed out of Fear favoured Canutus; especially the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, and swore Fealty to him: But the Londoners stood firm to Prince Edmund, and were the principal Authors of his Election. Canutus before the Death of K. Ethelred, had besieged the City, and now with a large Trench encompassed it: But the new King Edmund coming on, raised the siege, and made Canutus fly to the Isle of Sheppey; where having staid the Winter, the Spring following he assailed the West of England, and at Penbam in Dorsetshire a Battle was fought, and the Danes discomfited. After this, in Worcestershire, at a Place called Sherostan, another Battel was fought, where the Danes were like again to be discomfited: But the traitorous Edrick perceiving it, he cut off the Head of a Soldier like unto King Edmund both in Hair and Countenance, and shaking his bloody Sword, with the gasping Head, crying out to the Army of the English, Fly ye, Wretches, fly, and get away, for your King is slain; behold, here is his Head. But King Edmund having notice of his treacherous Stratagem, hastened to shew himself where he might best be seen; whose Sight so encouraged his Men, that they had gotten that Day a final Victory, if Night had not prevented them. Duke Edrick excuses his Fact, as being mistaken in the Countenance of the Man, and desirous to save the Blood of the English; upon which false Colour he was received into Favour again. After this, Canutus secretly in the Night brake up his Camp, and marched towards London, which in a sort was still besieged by the Danish Ships: But King Edmund hearing of his Departure, followed him, and with small ado removed the Siege, and in triumphant manner entered the City. After this, near unto Oxford in Kent was another great Battel fought, in which Canutus lost 4500 Men, and K. Edmund only 600; the rest of the Danes saving themselves by Flight: Whom if King Edmund had pursued, it is thought that Day had ended the Wars between these two Nations for ever. But the ever-traiterous Edrick, kept K. Edmund from pursuing them, by telling him of Ambushes and other Dangers: So as Canutus had leisure to pass over into Essex; but thither also K. Edmund followed him; where at Ashdon, three Miles from Saffron-Walden, another Battel was fought, in which the Danes being at the Point to be overthrown, the traitorous Edrick with all his Forces revolted to their Side; by which Treachery the English lost the Day. There died of K. Edmund's Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Godwyn, Duke Athelwald, Duke Athelwyn, Earl Urcbil, Codnot Bishop of Lincoln, Wolsey Abbot of Ramsay, with many others. The Remembrance of which Battel is retained to this Day, by certain small Hills there remaining, whence have been digged the Bones of Men, Armour, and Horse-bridles. After this at Dereberst, near to the River Severn, another Battel was ready to be fought; when suddenly a certain Captain steps forth, and for saving of Blood, used great Persuasions, that either they should try the Battel by single Combat, or else divide the Kingdom betwixt them: Upon this the Combat is agreed on, and the two Princes entering into a small Island called Alney, adjoining to the City of Glocester, in compleat Armour assailed each other, at first on Horseback, and after on Foot: When Canutus having received a dangerous Wound, and finding himself overmatched in Strength, desired a Compromise, and with a loud Voice used these Words, What Necessity should move us, most valiant Prince, for obtaining of a Title to endanger our Lives? Were it not better to lay Malice aside, and condescend to a loving Agreement? Let us therefore become sworn Brothers, and divide the Kingdom between us. This Motion was by King Edmund accepted; and thus was the Kingdom divided between these two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part which lies upon the Coast of France, and Canutus the rest. But now Duke Edrick hath his last and greatest Act of Treachery to play; for King Edmund being retired to a Place for Nature's Necessity, he thrust from under the Draught a sharp Spear into his Body, and then cutting off his Head, presented it to Canutus with these fawning Words, All hail, thou sole Monarch now of England; for here behold the Head of thy Copartner, which for thy sake I have adventured to cut off. Canutus, tho' ambitious enough for Sovereignty, yet abashed at so disloyal a Fact, replied and vowed, that in reward of that Service, his own Head should be advanced above all the Peers of his Kingdom: Which soon after he performed; for by his Command the false Edrick's Head was cut off, and placed upon the highest Gate of London. Matthew of Westminster and Huntington, relate this Murther to have been been acted by Edrick's own Son at the Commandment of his Father: William Malmesbury writes, that the King was killed by two Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber, hired by the same disloyal Edrick; notwithstanding Roger Hoveden reports that he died a natural Death at London. The Death of this King in this manner, some say was acted at Oxford; others, that he died of a natural Sickness in London. But howsoever he came to his Death, his Reign was but only seven Months, and his Body was buried at Glastenbury, near to his Grandfather K. Edgar. This King Edmund had by his Wife Algyth two Sons; the eldest named Edward, surnamed the Out-law, because he lived out of England in Hungary, as a banished Man for fear of King Canutus: But when his Uncle K. Edward the Confessor had obtained the Crown, he was recalled, and honourably entertained till he died. He married Agatha, Sister to Queen Sophia, Wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and Daughter to the Emperor Henry the Second; by whom he had Edgar, surnamed Atbeling, the right Heir of the English Crown, tho' he never enjoy'd it. The second Son of Ironside was called, after his Father's Name, Edmund. King Edmund had also two Daughters, Margaret and Christian, of whom the younger became a veiled Nun at Ramsay in Hampshire; the elder Margaret, after sole Heir to the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolm the third King of Scotland, from which princely Bed in a lineal Descent, King James the First united the British, Saxon, Norman, and Scotish Imperial Crowns in one.

Of the first DANISH King in ENGLAND.

Canutus possessed of the whole Kingdom.

Canutus being possessed of half the Kingdom by Composition with King Edward, now after his Death seized upon the whole, and to prevent all farther Question, he call'd a Council of the English Nobility, wherein it was propounded, whether in the Agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any Claim of Title to the Crown had been reserved for King Edmund's Brethren or Sons; to which (not daring to say otherwise) they absolutely answered no, and thereupon took all of them the Oath of Allegiance to Canutus. Being thus cleared of all his Opposites, he prepared with great Solemnity for his Coronation, which was performed at London by the Hands of Levingus, surnamed Elstane, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 1017, being the first Dane that reigned Monarch of England. But Canutus not thinking himself sufficiently safe, as long as any that might pretend were in the People's Eye, caused first Edwin the Son of K. Ethelred, and Brother of Edmund, to abjure the Realm, who was yet afterwards recalled, and treacherously murdered by his own Men, and his Body buried at Tavestock in Devonshire. Next were the two Sons of Edmund Ironside, Edward and Edmund, whom, to the end People might not see him shed the Blood of Innocents, he sent to his half Brother K. of Sweden to be made away; but the K. of Sweden more compassionate and noble than this jealous and cruel Dane, sent the young Princes into Hungary, to Salomon (the King thereof) in whose Court they were brought up and preferred, as we have before mention'd. Then remained Edward and Alfred, the Sons of K. Ethelred, and then their Mother Q. Emma, He marries Q. Emma. had sent away before to her Brother the Duke of Normandy, there to be in Safety. So as none of the royal Blood was now left in the Land, to give to Canutus any Fear of Competition. After this he took to Wife the virtuous Lady Emma, the Relict of K. Ethelred, by which Match he procured to himself three great Benefits: One, that he won the Love of the People, by marrying a Lady whom they so entirely loved; another, that he got the Alliance of the Duke of Normandy, a neighbouring Prince of great Power; the third, that by marrying the Mother, he secured himself against the Sons: As likewise Q. Emma was not unwillingly persuaded to the Match, upon Agreement to make her Issue, if he had any by her, to inherit the Crown of England. And to win the Love of the People yet more, he now set himself to the making of good Laws, He makes in a grand Convention of his Nobles which good Laws. he held at Oxford; whereof for a Pattern of those Times, some that concern Religion may not unfitly be here related. First, for the Celebration of divine Service, it was ordained, that all Ceremonies tending to the Increase of Reverence and Devotion should be used as need required. Secondly, that upon The Sabbath the Sabbath-day, all publick Fairs, Markets, Synods, Huntings, and all secular Actions should be forborn, unless some urgent Necessity should require it. Thirdly, that every Christian should thrice in the Year receive the Blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The Communion to be received thrice a Year. Fourthly, that if a Minister of an Altar killed a Man, or committed any notorious Crime, he should be deprived both of his Order and Dignity. Fifthly, that a married Woman convicted of Adultery should have her Nose and Ears cut off. Sixthly, that a Widow marrying within a twelve-month after her Husband's Decease, should lose her Jointure. A married Woman convicted of Adultery to have her Nose and Ears cut off. These and many other good Laws were made, whereby the Kingdom remained, during all his time, in a most peaceable State and Government. In the third Year of his Reign he heard how the Vandals taking Advantage of his Absence, had entred Denmark, and annoyed his Subjects; whereupon with a great Army of English he passed over the Seas, and gave them Battel, but with ill Success the first Day; when preparing for the next Day's Battel, the Earl Godwyn, who was the General of the English, secretly in the dead of the Night set upon the Vandals Camp, and with a great Slaughter of their Soldiers, made their two Princes, Ulfus and Anlave, to fly the Field. In the Morning it was told Canutus that the English were fled, for that their Station was left, and not a Man of them to be found, which did not a little trouble his Patience: But he going in Person to see the Truth, found the great Overthrow the English had given, for which Service ever after he held the English,

English, and especially the Earl Godwyn, in great Estimation. After this, returning home, he made a prosperous Expedition against Malcolme King of Scots; and at last, in the fifteenth Year of his Reign, wearied with the honourable Troubles of the World, and out of Devotion, he took a Journey to Rome, to visit the Sepulchre of St. Peter and Paul, from whence he writ to the Bishops and Nobility of England, that they should carefully administer Justice, and never seek to advance his Profit by any undue Ways, or with the detriment of any Man. At his Return from Rome, he built in Essex the Church of Ashdon, where he got the Victory against K. Edmund; in Norfolk, the Abbey of St. Benet's, which Saint he greatly revered; and in Suffolk the Monastery of St. Edmund, which Saint he deadly feared. To the Church of Winchester he gave many rich Jewels, whereof one was a Cross, valued to be worth as much as the whole Revenue of England amounted to in one Year. To Coventry he gave the Arm of the great St. Austen, which he bought at Pavia in his return from Rome, for which he paid 100 Talents of Silver, and one of Gold. One strange Act is recorded, which he did for convincing his fawning Flatterers; who used to tell him that his Powers were more than humane; for being one time at Southampton, he commanded that his Chair of State should be set on shore when the Sea began to flow, and then sitting down there in the Presence of his many Attendants, he spake thus to that Element: I charge thee that thou presume not to enter my Land, nor wet these Robes of thy Lord that are about me. But the Sea giving no heed to his Command, but keeping on his usual course of Tide, first wet his Skirts, and after his Thighs; whereupon suddenly arising, he thus spake in the Hearing of them all: Let all the World's Inhabitants know, that vain and weak is the Power of their Kings; and that none is worthy of the Name of King, but he that keeps both Heaven and Earth, and Sea in Obedience. After which time he would never suffer the Crown to be set upon his Head: But presently crowned therewith the Picture of Christ on the Cross at Winchester; from which Example arose perhaps the Custom, to hang up the Armour of worthy Men in Churches; as Offerings consecrated to him who is the Lord of Battel. When he had reigned nineteen Years, he deceased at Shaftsbury in the County of Dorset, the twelfth of November, in the Year 1035, and was buried in the Church of the old Monastery of Winchester: Which being after new built, his Bones, with many other English Saxon Kings, were taken up, and are preserved in gilt Coffers, fixed upon the Walls of the Quire in that Cathedral Church. He had by his two Wives three Sons, Sweyne and Harold by his first Wife Alfgive; and Hardiknute by his second Wife Q. Emma; and two Daughters, of whom the eldest called Guinbilda, was married to the Roman Emperor Henry the Third; who being accused of Adultery, and none found to defend her Cause, at last an English Page, a very Boy and Dwarf, who for the Littleness of his Stature, was generally, and jestingly furnamed Mimecan, adventured to maintain her Innocency against a mighty Giant-like Combatant; who in Fight, at one Blow, cutting the Sinews of his Adversary's Leg, with another he felled him to the Ground, and then with his Sword, taking his Head from his Shoulders, redeemed both the Empress's Life and Honour. But the Empress after this hard Usage forsook her Husband's Bed, and took upon her the Veil of a Nun, in the Town of Bruges in Flanders, where she devoutly spent the rest of her Life.

Of the second DANISH King in ENGLAND.

KING Canutus dying, left his Kingdom of Norway to his eldest Son Sweyne, and his Kingdom of England to his youngest Son Hardiknute, whom he had by his Wife Emma; but he being at the time of his Father's Death in Denmark, Harold his elder Brother by a former Wife, taking Advantage of his Absence, lays claim to the Crown. For determining of which Right, the Lords assembled at Oxford, where Queen Emma pleaded for her Son Hardiknute, urging the Covenant of Canutus at their Marriage, and his Last Will at his Death; as also Earl Godwyn of Kent did the like, being left Guardian of her Children, and Keeper of his last Will. But Harold's Presence, together with the Favour of the Londoners, Danes, and Northumbrians, so wrought with the Lords, that the absent Hardiknute was neglected, and Harold was proclaimed and crowned King at Oxford, by Elnothus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Year 1036.

Harold having now attained the Crown, was not so jealous of his Brother Hardiknute, as of his Mother-in-law Queen Emma, and her Sons by K. Ethelred, who were beyond Sea; and therefore now to secure himself against these was his first Care: For effecting whereof he framed a Letter, as written by Q. Emma to her two Sons Edward and Alfred; instigating them to attempt the Crown usurped by Harold against their Right: To which Letter coming first to the Hands of Alfred, he suspecting no Fraud, returned answer, That he would shortly come over and follow her Counsel. And thereupon with a small Fleet, and some few Soldiers lent him by Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, he took the Sea for England, where coming to Shore, Earl Godwyn met him, and bound himself by Oath to be his Guide to his Mother Q. Emma; but being wrought firm for Harold, he led him and his company a contrary way, and lodged them at Gilford, making known to K. Harold what he had done; who presently committed them all to Slaughter, sparing only every tenth Man for service of Sale. Prince Alfred himself he sent Prisoner to the Ile of Ely, where having his Eyes inhumanly put out, in Grief and Torment he ended his Life. Some add a more horrible kind of Cruelty, as that his Belly was opened, and one end of his Bowels drawn out and fastened to a Stake, his Body pricked with Needles, or Poignards, and forced about till all his Entrails were extracted. This done then he set upon Q. Emma, confiscating her Goods, and banished her the Realm. And now further to secure himself, he kept the Seas with sixteen Danish Ships, to the Maintenance whereof he charged the English with great Payments, by which, if he procured the Safety of his Person, he certainly procured the Hatred of his Subjects. This King for his Swiftness in Running was called Harefoot; but tho' by his Swiftness he out-run his Brother for the Kingdom, yet could not he run so fast, but that Death quickly overtook him: For having reigned only four Years and some Months, he died at Oxford, and was buried at Westminster, having never had Wife or Children.

Of the third and last DANISH King in ENGLAND.

Hardiknute succeedeth Harold.

KING Harold being dead, the Lords to make amends for their former Neglect, sent now for Hardiknute, and offered him their Allegiance; who accepteth their offer, and thereupon taking Sea, arrived upon the Coast of Kent, the sixth Day after he had set Sail out of Denmark; and with great Pomp conveyed to London, was there crowned King by Elnothus Archbishop of Canterbury in the Year 1040. His first Act was to be revenged of the deceased Brother Harold, whose Body he caused to be digged up and thrown into the Thames, where it remained till a Fisherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of St. Clement without Temple-Bar, commonly called St. Clement Danes, because it was the Burying-place of the Danes, as some write. But towards his Mother and half Brother Prince Edward, he shewed true natural Affection, inviting them both to return into England, where he received them with all the Honour, that from a Son or Brother could be expected.

St. Clement Danes, why so called.

His Intemperance in Diet.

But now as the King Harold, for his Swiftness in running, was surnamed Harefoot; so this King, for his Intemperance in Diet, might have been surnamed Swinesmouth, or Bocca di Porco; for his Tables were spread every Day four times, and furnished with all kinds of curious Dishes, as delighting in nothing but gormandizing and swilling; and as for managing the State he committed it wholly to his Mother Q. Emma, and to the polittick Earl of Kent, Godwyn; who finding this Weakness in the King, began to think himself of aspiring; and to make the better way for it, he sought by all means to alien the Subjects Hearts from the Prince. Amongst other Courses he caused to lay heavy Taxes upon them, only for Shipmony to pay his Danes, amounting to 32000 Pounds: which was so offensive to the People, that the Citizens of Worcester slew two of his Officers, Thurstan and Feudax, that came to collect it. But this King had soon the reward of his Intemperance; for in a solemn Assembly and Banquet at Lambeth, revelling and carousing, he suddenly fell down without Speech or Breath, after he had reigned only two Years, and was buried at Winchester. His Death was so welcome to his Subjects, that the Day of his Death was commonly celebrated with open Pastimes in the Street, and called

He imposeth Ship-money upon his Subjects.

He dies suddenly.

A Day called Hocks-tide, and why.

Hocks-tide, signifying Scorn or Contempt which fell upon the Danes by his Death. For with him ended the Reign of the Danes in England, after they had miserably afflicted the Kingdom for the space of 240 Years; tho' in regal Government but only six and twenty.

Of ENGLISH Kings again; and first of EDWARD the Confessor.

KING Hardiknute, dying without Issue, as Edward the Confessor succeedeth Hardiknute.

having never been married, and the Danish Line clean extinguished, Edward for his Piety called the Confessor, half Brother to the deceased Hardiknute, and Son to K. Ethelred by his Wife Q. Emma, was by a general consent admitted King of England, and was crowned at Winchester by Edsine Archbishop of Canterbury, on Easter-Day in the Year 1042, being then of the Age of 40 Years. He was born at Islip near to Oxford, and after his Father's Death, for Safety sent into France, to the Duke of Normandy his Mother's Brother, from whence he now came to take upon him the Crown of England. His Acts for gaining the People's Love, were first, the remitting the yearly Tribute of 40000 Pounds, gathered by the Name of Dane-gilt, which had been imposed by his Father, and for forty Years together paid out of all Mens Lands, but only the Clergy; and then from the divers Laws of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one Body certain, and written in Latin, being in a sort the Fountain of those which at this Day we term the Common Laws, tho' the Forms of Pleading and Process therein, were afterwards brought in by the Conqueror.

He remits Dane-gilt.

He ordained the Common Laws.

The Reign of this King was very peaceable, only in the sixth Year the Danish Pirates entered the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-coasts of Essex they spoiled, and then in Flanders made Merchandize of their Prey. As likewise the Irish, with thirty Ships entered Severn, and with the Assistance of Griffith King of South-wales, burnt or slew all in their way, till at last Reese the Brother of Griffith was slain at Bulenden, and his Head presented to K. Edward at Glocester. His domestical Troubles were only by Earl Godwyn and his Sons, who yet after many Contestations and Affronts were reconciled, and Godwyn received again into as great Favour as before. But altho' K. Edward forgave his Treason, yet the Divine Providence did not; for soon after as he sat at Table with the King on Easter-Monday, he was suddenly stricken with Death, and on Thursday following died, and was buried at Winchester. Some make his Death more exemplar, as that justifying himself for Prince Alfred's Death, he should pray to God, That if he were any way guilty of it, he might never swallow down one Morsel of Bread; and thereupon by the just Judgment of God was choaked by the first Morsel he offered to eat.

Earl Godwyn punished by the Divine Hand.

In this King's Time such abundance of Snow fell in January, continuing till the middle of March following, that almost all Cattel and Fowl perished, and therewith an excessive Dearth followed.

Two Acts are related of this King, that seem nothing correspondent to the general Opinion had of his Virtue, one concerning his Mother, the other touching his Wife; that concerning his his Mother Q. Emma, was this, That because after K. Ethelred's Death, she married the Danish K. Canutus, and seemed to favour her Issue by him, more than her Issue by K. Ethelred, therefore he dispossest her of all her Goods, and committed her to Custody in the Abbey of Worwel; and more than this, so far hearkned to an Aspersion cast upon her of unchast Familiarity with Alwyne Bishop of Winchester, that for her Purgation, she was fain to pass the Trial of Fire Ordeal, which was in this manner: Nine Plow-shares red hot were laid in unequal distance, which she must pass bare-foot and blind-fold; and if she passed them unhurt, then she was judged innocent; if otherwise, guilty. And this Trial she passed and came off fairly, to the great Astonishment of all Beholders. The other touching his Wife was this; he had married Editba the beautiful and indeed virtuous Daughter of Earl Godwyn; and because he had taken Displeasure against the Father, he would shew no Kindness to the Daughter; he had made her his Wife, but conversed not with her as a Wife, only at Board, but not at Bed; or if at Bed, no otherwise than David with Abishag: And yet was content to hear her accused of Incontinency, whereof if she were guilty, he could not be innocent. So as what the Virtues were, for which after his Death he should be reputed a Saint, doth not easily appear. It seems he was chaste, but not without Injury to his Wife: Pious, but not without Ungratefulness to his Mother: Just in his present Government, but not without neglect of Posterity; for thro' his want of Providence in that Point he left the Crown to so doubtful Succession, that soon after his Decease it was translated out of English into French, and the Kingdom made servile to a fourth foreign Nation. One Ability he had which raised him above the Pitch of ordinary Kings, and yet at this Day is ordinary with Kings, That by his only touching and laying his Hand upon it, he cured a Disease, which from his curing is called the King's-Evil. His Mother Q. Emma, in memory of the nine Plow-shares she had passed in her Trial, gave nine Manors to the Minster of Winchester; and himself remembring the Wrong he had done her, bestowed on the same place, the Island of Portland in Dorsetshire, being about seven Miles in compass. He made also of a little Monastery in the West of London, by the River of Thames, a most beautiful Church, (called of the place Westminster) where he provided for his own Sepulchre; and another dedicated to St. Margaret, standing without the Abbey. This of Westminster he endowed with many rich Revenues, and confirmed his Charters under his Broad Seal, being the first of the Kings of England, who used that large and stately Impression in their Charters and Patents. He founded also the Colledge of St. Mary Ottery in Devonshire, and gave unto it the Village of Ottery, and removed the Bishop's See from Cridington to Exeter, as a place of far more Dignity. And when he had reigned the space of three and twenty Years and six Months, he ended his life the fourth of January, in that Room of his Palace at Westminster, which is now called the Painted Chamber in the Year 1066, and was buried in the Church at Westminster which he had builded.

Of HAROLD the second ENGLISH King
after the DANES.

KING Edward the Confessor being himself without Issue, had in his Life-time sent into Hungary for his Nephew Edward, called the Out-law, the Son of Edmund Ironside, with a purpose to design him his Successor in the Crown, but he dying soon after his coming into England, K. Edward then gave his Son Edgar the Name of Atheling; as to say, Prince Edgar meaning to design him for his Successor; but being prevented by Death before the Successor was fully established, and Edgar Atheling, tho' he had Right, yet being young, and not of Power to make good his Right, Harold the Son of Earl Godwyn steps into the Throne, and never standing upon Ceremonies, set himself the Crown upon his own Head; wherein, tho' as a Violator of holy Rites, he offended the Clergy, yet not any either Clergy or Laity durst oppose him, as being at that time the most Martial Man in the Kingdom; and such a one as the State of the Realm stood at that time in need of; and besides his own Worthiness, had the assistance of Edwyn and Marcher, the two great Earls of Yorkshire and Cheshire, whose Sister Algyth he had married. It is true withal, That K. Edward had appointed the Crown after his own Decease, sometimes to William Duke of Normandy, sometimes to Edgar Atheling, and sometimes to this Harold, so as he was crown'd by Aldred Archbishop of York, as not coming in by Intrusion or Wrong, but by the Appointment of K. Edward; tho' that Appointment of K. Edward was rather to make him Regent during the Minority of Edgar, than to make him absolute King: But howsoever being once in the Throne, he was then able to make his own Title; and to make Prince Edgar some amends, he created him Earl of Oxford, which was indeed to use him like a Child, take away a Jewel, and please him with an Apple. Yet Harold having once gotten into the Throne, he carried himself with great Valour and Justice for the Time he sat in it, which was but very short (only nine Months) as being indeed but tottering from the very Beginning, and that chiefly by means of his own Brother Toustayne, who by diverting his Forces to suppress a Rebellion, made him of less Force to resist an Invasion. But now that we have shewed how Harold entered the Throne, we must forbear to shew how he was cast out, till we come to him that cast him out; who because he was not only of another Family, but of another Nation, we must necessarily take the Beginning from a deeper Root: And indeed, seeing in him we shall join our Island to the Continent which is a larger World, our Kings hereafter will afford a larger Extent for matter of Discourse, than heretofore they have done.

His Parentage and Descent:

The Race of the Dukes of Normandy.

THERE were six Dukes of Normandy in France, in a direct Line succeeding from Father to Son. The first was Rollo, who of a private Man in Denmark, coming forth with the Exuberancy of his Nation, wrested by Force of Arms from Charles the Simple King of France, to be made Duke of Normandy. The second was William his Son, call'd Long-Espée, or Long-Sword. The third was Richard his Son, call'd the Hardy, who had Richard, and a Daughter called Emma, married to Ethelred King of England, Father of Edward the Confessor. The fourth was Richard the Second his Son, called the Good. The fifth was Richard the Third his Son, who by a first Wife had three Sons, Richard, Robert, and William; and by a second two other Sons, William Earl of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Roan. So as Richard his eldest Son by his first Wife, succeeded him by the Name of Richard the Fourth, and dying without Issue, the Dukedom descended to Robert his second Son by his first Wife: Which Robert was Father to our William the Conqueror, of whom it is thus recorded: That riding one time abroad, he happen'd to pass by a Company of Country Maids that were a dancing, where staying a while to look upon them, he was so taken with the handsomness and graceful Carriage of one of them, whose Name was Arlotte, a Skinner's Daughter (from whence as some think our Word Harlot comes) that Affection commanding him, and Authority her, he caused her that Night to be brought to his Bed, where being together, what was done or said between them, is no matter for History to record, tho' some Historians have recorded both, making her not so modest as was fit for a Maid; only ten Months after it appeared, that at this time our Duke William was begotten; who proving a Man of extraordinary Spirit, we may attribute it to the Heat of Affection in which he was begotten. Neither did there want before, and at his Birth, fore-running Tokens which presaged his future Greatness: For his Mother Arlotte being great with him, had a Dream like that of Mandane the Mother of Cyrus, the first Persian Monarch; namely, that her Bowels were extended and dilated over all Normandy and England. Also as soon as he was born, being laid on the Chamber-Floor, with both his Hands he took up Rushes, and shutting his little Fists, held them very fast; which gave occasion to the gossiping Wives to congratulate Arlotte in the Birth of such a Boy, and the Midwife cry'd out, the Child would prove a King.

IT appears by many Examples, that Bastardy in those Days was no Bar to Succession, till a Law was afterward made to make it a Bar. It brought some Disgrace where the Mother was mean, but no Impediment where the Father was noble; and even his Bastardy seemed to have some Allay, if it be true (as some write) that his Father took the said Arlotte afterward to be his Wife: and yet perhaps he had not the Dukedom so much by Succession as by Gift. For when he was about nine Years old, his Father calling his Nobility together, caused them to swear Allegiance to this base Son of his, and to take him for their liege Lord after his Decease. Neither was this in those Days unfrequent, for Princes to confer their Principalities after their own Deceases upon whom they pleased, counting it as lawful to appoint Successors after them, as Substitutes under them; even in our Time and Kingdom the Duke of Northumberland prevailed with K. Edward the Sixth to exclude his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to appoint the Lady Jane Grey, Daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him.

His Education and Tuition in his Minority.

HIS Father having declared and appointed him to be his Successor, went soon after (whether out of Devotion, or to do Penance for procuring his Brother's Death, whereof he was suspected) into the Holy Land, in which Journey he died, having left the Tuition of his young Son to his two Brothers, and the Guardianship to the King of France, in whose Court for a time he was brought up. A strange Confidence to commit the Tuition of a Son that was base, to Pretenders that were legitimate, and to a King of France who aimed at nothing more than to reannex this this Dukedom to his Crown. But it seems his Confidence was grounded upon the Proximity of Blood in his Brothers, and upon the Merits of his own Service formerly done to the King of France; which tho' it proved well enough with him, yet is not to be taken into Example to follow.

FIRST Roger de Tresney, who derived his Pedigree from Rollo, and had won much Honour by his Valour in the Wars, (notwithstanding the Oath of Allegiance he had formerly taken) takes Exception to his Bastardy, and invites Complices to assist him in recovering the Dukedom to a legitimate Race: A fair Pretext, if the Fate of Duke William had not been against it; who tho' he were himself but young, and could not do much in his own Person, yet the divine Providence raised him up Friends that supplied him with Assistance, and particularly Roger de Beaumont, by whose Valour this Roger de Tresney with his two Brothers was defeated and slain. After Roger de Tresney, William de Arques his Uncle lays Claim to the Duchy, and assisted by the King of France comes to a Battel, but by the Valour of Count Gifford, the Duke's General, was likewise defeated; and these were Troubles before he arrived to seventeen Years of Age. After this, one Guy Earl of Burgoigne, Grandchild to Richard the Second Duke of Normandy, grew sensible of his Right to the Dukedom, and joining with Viscount Neele, and the Earl of Bessin, two powerful Normans, conspired Duke William's Death, and had effected it, if a certain Fool about him had not stolen away in the Night to the Place where the Duke was, and never left knocking and crying at the Gate till he was admitted to his Presence, willing him to fly for his Life instantly, or he would be murdered. The Duke considering that being related by a Fool, it was like to be the more palpable, and that there might be Danger in staying, none in going, rode instantly away all alone toward Falaise his principal Castle; but missing his way, he happen'd to pass where a Gentleman was standing at his Door, of whom he asked the way, and was by him, as knowing him, directed; which he had no sooner done, but the Conspirators came presently, enquiring if such a one had not passed that way; which the Gentleman affirmed, and undertook to be their Guide to overtake him; but leading them of purpose a contrary way, the Duke by this means came safely to Falaise, and from thence journeys to the King of France, complaining of his Injuries, and imploring his Aid, as one that was his Homager, and committed to his Care by his Servant his Father. The King of France moved with his Distress, and Remembrance of his Father's Merits, though he wished he was less than he was, yet so aided him, that he made him greater than he was; for himself in Person suffered much in the Battel which procured him the Victory. By which we may see that Folly and Fortune, and even Enemies themselves, are all Assistants to the Destinies; or to say better indeed, to the Divine Providence. Many other Affronts were offered him, some by meaner Princes, some afterward by the K. of France himself, who was now grown jealous of his Greatness; all which he encounter'd with such Dexterity, that made his Bastardy as it were become legitimate, and Virtue her self grow proud of his Person.

His Carriage afterwards in Peace.

BY this time he was come to the Age of 22 Years; and whereas all this while he had shewed himself a valiant General in War, he now began to shew himself a provident Governour in Peace, composing and ordering his State; wherein he so carried himself, that as his Subjects did both fear and love him, so his neighbouring Princes did both fear and hate him; or if not hate him, at least emulate him.

His Incitements for invading of England.

DUKE William had Incitements to invade England, and some Shew of a Title. To understand this more fully, we will reflect upon some Passages transacted betwixt the two former Kings, Edward the Confessor, and Harold the Son of Earl Godwyn. And this Recapitulation will give some Light, and is very pertinent to our intended Purpose.

Earl Godwyn falling out with K. Edward, the Business was carried with such Heat on both Sides, that the Earl and all his Allies were in a manner banished the Realm. Godwyn makes his Refuge to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Harold his Son into Ireland. Emma the King's Mother deceasing, they both return with a great Navy and strong Army. The Nobility fearing a Civil War, labour for a Reconciliation betwixt the King and the Exiles; but Edward, jealous of Godwyn's Arts and Treachery, would by no means hearken unto it. At last, upon Conditions they are restored to the King's Favour and their Countrey, Hostages are deliver'd, Walnoth the Son of Godwyn, and Harun his Grandchild, whom the King for more Security sends into Normandy, there to be detained by Duke William his Kinsman. After the Death of Godwyn, Harold succeeds him Earl of Kent, who craves leave of the King to go to Normandy, and bring back his Brother and Kinsman: The King in this manner answers him, Harold, you may do your Pleasure, and I may permit, tho' I will not consent; for I do foresee, that if you undertake this Journey, it will prove to the Ruin of the Kingdom, and your own Confusion. Harold, notwithstanding obstinate in his Resolution, after a tempestuous Voyage, arrives in France, where he is taken Prisoner by the Lord of Pontive, and at the Command and Threats of Duke William dismiss'd; and tho' first robb'd of his Treasures and choicest Things he transported, at last sent into Normandy; where relating the Cause of his Journey, he was honourably entertained, and fairly promised, unless himself were the Obstacle, all things should succeed as he wished. After some time, the Duke taking his Opportunity, enter'd into private Discourse with him, and told him, That King Edward being brought up in his Youth together with him, had faithfully fully promised him, that if ever he came to be King of England, he would make him his Heir, and settle the Kingdom on him. Wherefore Harold (quoth the Duke) if you will assist me in gaining that Crown, when I come over into England, you shall have your Brother and Nephew; and to make our Tie of Friendship the stronger, you shall promise to take one of my Daughters for Wife, and send your Sister hither, whom I will bestow on one of my chief Lords: You shall also promise me to secure the Castle of Dover for my Service: And I promise you, that when I am King of England, I will deny you nothing which in reason you shall demand. Harold having heard the Duke, was much perplexed: But seeing himself in such Straits, that he must either venture on a Promise, or hazard an Imprisonment, condescends to all the Duke demanded; and for more Security, with a solemn Oath confirms his Agreement: and returning into England, acquaints Edward with all these Passages, who replied, Did not I know William's Disposition, and foretel thee how much Mischief this Journey would bring upon England? Duke William having the Word of Edward, and the Oath of Harold, had sufficient Obligations to expect the Kingdom: But hearing of the Death of Edward, and that Harold was crowned King, he thought himself not more forgotten by Edward, than wronged by Harold; and therefore sent a Messenger to put him in mind of King Edward's Promise, and his own Oath. Harold returns Answer, That he could not send his Sister over, because she was dead; but if William would have her Carcass, he should. Secondly, That he could neither promise, nor dispose of a Kingdom which was none of his own. Lastly, He should be injurious to his own Nobility, if he should without their Consent and Advice take a Stranger for Wife. William having heard his Answer, was as yet patient; and again, sending to Harold mildly, demands of him at last to take his Daughter for his Wife and Queen; otherwise by Force of Arms he would recover that Kingdom, which was his own by the Promise of K. Edward. To this Harold peremptorily replies, that as he feared not the one, so by no means would he do the other. Duke William thus slighted by Harold, endeavours to make him honest by Force, and assured himself he should find him a weak Enemy, who had proved so perjured a Friend. These were the Incitements which caused William in his declining Age to undertake this Expedition; but who can think himself too old for a Kingdom, when Galba above 73 Years of Age, buckled on an Armour on his unwieldy Limbs for the attaining of a Roman Empire?

The Reasons that facilitated his Conquest of England.

DUKE William incensed with Harold's Answers, acquaints the Nobility with his Purpose, who with some ado consented to aid him, as likewise many other great Lords of France, but specially Baldwin Earl of Flanders, whose Daughter he had married; and who being at that time Guardian of the young King of France, procured Aid from him also; and to make the Enterprize the more successful, Pope Alexander the Second sent him a Banner, with an Agnus of Gold, and one of the Hairs of St. Peter. So as the Preparation of the Duke both by Sea and Land was very great, having 300 Sail of Ships, and as some write 890, and as one Norman, above 1000; and as Gemeticensis, 3000; and tho' Harold had likewise provided a Warlike Fleet to encounter him, yet it was at that time unfortunately diverted another way. For Toustayne his Brother being then in Rebellion in the North, and Harold Hartfager King of Norway at the same time invading those Parts, and perhaps upon a bruit, That the Duke's Fleet was not yet ready to come forth, removed both his Fleet and Army thither; where tho' he got the Victory at Stamford, with the Death both of his Brother Toustayne, and of the King of Norway, yet it made way for the Duke to land quietly, and he enter'd the Kingdom as easily as one may enter a House when the Doors are all left open. By this means K. Harold's Shipping (the best Wall of Defence to an Island) was utterly frustrate; and as for his Land Forces, they were by his Battel at Stamford, exceedingly both weakened and impaired; yet hearing that Duke William was landed at Pevensey, not far from Hastings in Sussex, he repaired thither with all speed, and gathering together his broken Forces, and increasing them by all the means he could, made himself ready to give the Duke Battel. Duke William in the mean time, as soon as he had landed his Men, sent his Ships presently away, that there might be no thinking of any thing, but either Death or Victory: And then going himself on Land, it is said his Foot slipped, and he fell down; which some that stood by taking for an evil Sign, No, (saith he) I have by this taken Possession of this Land. And indeed Presages are but as animus ejus qui præsagit, as in this Duke's Fall it afterwards fell out. The like Confidence of Spirit shewed he not long after, when the Armies were ready to join; for he that put on the Duke's Armour, whether out of haste, or out of Perturbation of Mind, putting the fore-part behind, and the back-part before, the Duke seeing it, merrily said, I see now by this Inversion of my Armour, that my Dukedom will be turned into a Kingdom; taking that for a good Omen, which some other of weaker Spirits would have taken for a bad. Many Ways of Composition between Duke William and K. Harold were propounded, yet Harold would hearken to none, as nothing doubting of Success, and perhaps thinking it a Disgrace to capitulate for that which was now his own; and when one of his Brothers, called Gyrth, being less interested, and therefore clearer sighted, intreated him to consider what a fearful thing it was to break an Oath which he so solemnly had sworn, Harold seemed to conceive, that nothing which he did, being a private Man, could be of force to bind him, now being a Prince. And so on the 14th Day of October, being Saturday, in the Year 1066, (which Day he liked the better, because it was his Birth-day, Duke William's Number of Ships to invade England.

K. Harold prepares to resist Duke William.

Duke William at his Landing takes a Fall.

A.D. 1066. Birth-day, hoping that the Day of his Birth would not so much degenerate to prove the Day of his Death, tho' this also even bred no good Blood to the Action; for the Soldiers of Harold, thinking thereby to honour their King's Birth-day, spent the Night before in revelling and drinking, where the Soldiers of the Duke, out of Consideration of their next Day's Work, spent the Night in Quietness and Devotion) they joined Battel, (the Kentish-men being placed in the fore Front, as by an ancient Custom is their Due, and K. Harold with his Londoners, leading the main Battel) where tho' their Armies were not much unequal in Number, (for they were each of them near about 60000 Men) yet there was great Odds in the Expertness of their Soldiers, and more in the Advantage of their Weapons: For the Duke had with him all the Flower of France and Flanders, whereas K. Harold had lost his best Men in his late Battel; and for Advantage of Weapons, the Normans had long Bows and Arrows, which among the English at that time were not at all in use. What marvel that the Normans got the Victory, tho' K. Harold losing his Life, yet lost no Reputation; and tho' the English Soldiers shewed no less Valour in being conquered, than the Normans did in conquering? One Circumstance may not be omitted, that King Harold, as an expert General, had order'd his Men in so firm a Body, that no Force of the Normans could disorder their Ranks, till

Duke William useth a Stratagem.

K. Harold is slain.

Duke William used a Stratagem, commanding his Men to retire, and to counterfeit Flight; by which he drew the English on upon a hollow Ground cover'd with Earth, whereinto many of them fell and perished; and besides into an Ambush of his Horsemen, which unexpectedly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. Withal, there seems one great Error to have been committed (at least, if it were an Error, and not rather a Necessity) that there was not a supplemental Army provided, (as his Brother Gryth would have had it) which might have come on if the first had failed; and would have been of great Advantage against a wearied Army. But when, sic visum est superis, all human Force is weak, and cannot withstand, all human Providence is unprovided, and cannot prevent. It is true, Duke William that Day fought so valiantly, that he had three Horses killed under him; but K. Harold shewed no less Valour in killing many Normans with his own Hands; so as the Fight continued doubtful a long time: Till at last K. Harold being struck into the Brains with an Arrow, fell down dead; upon whose falling, a base Norman Soldier cut off one of his Thighs, while he was yet breathing; which Duke William hearing, was so much offended, that he caused the Soldier to be disarmed, and with Shame cashiered. The Body of K. Harold his Mother Thyra offered a great Sum to have it delivered to her; but the Duke, out of the Nobleness of his Mind, would take no Money, but deliver'd it freely, and then it was buried in Waltham Abbey, which himself had begun to build, at least to repair. But here Gyraldus Cambrensis tells a strange Story, That Harold was not slain in the Battel, but only wounded and lost his left Eye, and then escaped by Flight to Chester, where he afterwards led a holy Anchorite's Life, in the Cell of S. James's, fast by St. John's Church.

How Duke William proceeded after his Victory at Hastings.

AS his Valour won him the Victory, so his Victory won him a Crown; that now of an old Duke, he was suddenly become a young King: And indeed, nothing so much renews Life, and makes the Years in a manner young again, as Addition of Honour, especially when it is the Fruit of Merit. First therefore, having given publick Thanks to God for his happy Success, he led his Army towards London, not the direct way (perhaps doubting of some new Encounter) but coasting about thro' part of Kent, thro' Sussex, Surry, Hampshire, and Barkshire, where at Wallingford he passed over the Thames; and then thro' Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hertfordshire, until he came to Barkhamsted, where there came unto him Aldred Archbishop of York, Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, Wilfere Bishop of Hereford, and many other Prelates accompanied with Edgar Atheling, with Earl Edwyn and Marchar, Brothers, and Men of the greatest Sway in the Kingdom, and many others of the Nobility. It is true, upon the Defeat at Hastings, Earl Edwyn and Marchar had a purpose to set up Edgar Atheling, as next Heir of the Royal Blood, and Grandchild to Edmund Ironside, and so beloved of the People, that he was called their Darling: But considering his young Years, and other Inabilities, but especially finding the Minds of the Bishops, (who at that time bare all the Sway) to be otherwise inclined, they desisted from that Course. And thus the Duke, without any opposition coming to London, was received by Bishops and Lords and all, with great Joy, tho' small Gladness; and if he had not their Hearts, yet he had their Knees; for in most humble manner they submitted themselves to him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign Lord; and upon Christmas Day after, he was crowned at Westminster by Aldred Archbishop of York, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Stigand, not being admitted to do that Office, for some Defect in his Investiture; and perhaps for some Asperion in his Manners.

A.D. 1067.

Duke William is crowned King of England.

How he rewarded his Followers.

THO' he hath had the Name of Conqueror, yet he used not the Kingdom as gotten by Conquest; for he took no Man's Living from him, nor dispossest any of their Goods, but such only whose Demerit made them unworthy to hold them; as appears by his Act to one Warren a Norman, to whom he had given the Castle of Sbarnborne in Norfolk. For when Sbarnborne, who was Owner of it, acquainted the King, That the Castle was his, and that he had never born Arms against him, he presently commanded Warren to deliver it quietly up unto him. Only Vacancies of Offices, and filling up the Places of those who were slain or fled, were the Present means he made use of, for preferring his Followers.

One

A.D. 1067. One special Preferment we cannot omit, That whereas one Herlowyn, a Nobleman in Normandy, had married his Mother Arlotte, and had by her a Son named Hugh Lupus; he gave to the said Hugh the Earldom of Chester, to hold of him as freely by his Sword, as himself held England by his Crown; by virtue of which Grant the said Hugh ordained under him four Barons; Nigel, he made Baron of Halton; Malbank, Baron of Nantwich; Eustace, Baron of Maupas; and Vernon, Baron of Shipbrook: Such an Honour, as no Subject before or since ever enjoyed the like. Also he gave to his Nephew Alane Earl of Britain, all the Lands which sometimes belonged to Earl Edwyn. And this Earl of Britain, the better to secure the King's Gift, built him a strong Castle near to his Mannor of Gillingham, and named it Richmont: from which Castle the Earls of Richmont bear their Titles of Honour.

What Means be used for securing himself in the Kingdom.

BESIDES the Oath of Fealty, which he took of all his Lords both Spiritual and Temporal at his Coronation; in Lent following, going into Normandy, he took along with him the greatest part of the great Men of the Kingdom, of whom Edwyn and Marchar, the two Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, Edgar Atheling, Waltheof Son to Syward formerly Earl of Northumberland, and Agelnothus Abbot of Glastenbury, were the chief; leaving the Care of the Kingdom in his Absence to Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Brother by the Mother, and to William Fitz-Osborn, whom he had made Earl of Hereford. And to abate the Greatness of the Prelates, which at that time was grown in a manner unlimited, he ordained that from thenceforth they should not command with any temporal Authority whatsoever. And because the common People are no less to be feared for their Number, than the Nobility for their Greatness, he first took from them all their Armour, to the end, that leaving them without Stings, they might afterwards be but Drones. And because there is seldom any Danger from singular Numbers, but all the Danger ariseth from Plurality, therefore to prevent Conspiracies and Combinations, which are commonly contrived in the Night, he commanded that in all Towns and Villages a Bell should be rung at eight a Clock in the Evening, and that in every House they should then put out their Fire and Lights, (which was called Couvre-feu) and go to bed. And for more Security, he erected Castles in the most doubtful Places of the Kingdom, one at York, another at Lincoln, a third at Nottingham, (at that time called Snottingham) and a fourth at Hastings, where he first landed. By these means the Kingdom was quiet all the time of his being away at Normandy, saving only that Edrick the Forester in the County of Hereford, calling in to his Aid the Kings of Wales, made some small disturbance. And indeed all the States of the Kingdom might in this very Person find something to make them apt to tolerate his Government. For

He takes from the Clergy all temporal Authority.

He takes from the People all their Armour.

He ordains Couvre feu at eight a Clock.

first, the People might think themselves in a fort advanced, being now made Members of a great Body, when the Dukedom of Normandy should come to be annexed to the Kingdom of England; and by experience of his good Government being a Duke, they might well hope, he would not govern worse being made a King. And the Nobility might be well content, as having a King of their former King's chusing; and though a Stranger, yet no Alien, as having in him many Veins of the same Blood, and therefore likely also to have some Veins of the same Goodness of their good K. Edward. But specially the Clergy could not chuse but be content, as having a King who came commended to them, by a Commending as strong as a Commanding, the Pope's Benediction.

BUT the Body of a State being more obnoxious to Crudities and Ill-humors, than the State of a natural Body, it is impossible to continue long without Distempers; notwithstanding any Preservatives that can be applied. And therefore in the second Year of his Reign, brake forth the Discontentment of Edgar Atheling, justly the first, as having most cause, being the next of the late Royal Blood, and therefore the most apt to be sensible of Servitude; who taking along with him his Mother Agatha and his two Sisters, Margaret and Christine, stole secretly away to Sea, with intention to pass into Hungary, the Countrey where he was born; but by contrary Winds was cast upon the Coasts of Scotland, where the King Malcolme, not only most kindly entertained him, but for a stricter bond of Kindness took his Sister Margaret to Wife, by whom he had many Children, out of which, in the second Generation after, a Match was found, by which in the Person of K. Henry the Second, the Saxon and Norman Blood were conjoined, the Union whereof continues in the Race of our Kings of England to this Day. Not long after to Edgar in Scotland, came the two great Earls, Edwyn and Marchar, Brothers to Agatha the late K. Harold's Wife; also Hereward, Gospatrik, and Syward, with many other Lords; and shortly after Stigand and Aldred Archbishops, with divers of the Clergy. And these Lords being together in Scotland, did but watch opportunity to recover that, which for want of taking opportunity they had lost: And assisted by the Scots, they invade the North Parts, spoiling the Countrey, and killing many for the Fault they had themselves committed; but all they could do, was but to forage the Countrey, and so return.

After this, in the third Year of his Reign, A.D. 1069. the two Sons of Sweyne King of Denmark, Harold and Canutus, with a Fleet of 240 Ships entered Humber, and invaded the North Parts; with whom the English Lords in Scotland joined, and foraged all the Countrey, till they came near to York. When the Normans that were in the Town, to save the City, set fire on the Suburbs; but the Fire not so contented, by assistance of a violent Wind, took hold of

K. William hearing hereof was so much incensed, that with all speed he raised an Army, and entred Northumberland, waisting the Countrey that already lay waste; and yet for all this great Rage, was contented with a great Sum of Money to purchase the Danes departure. By these Devastations in many Shires of the Kingdom, especially in Northumberland, so great a Dearth and Famine followed, that Men were glad to eat Horses and Dogs, Cats and Rats, and what else is most abhorrent to Nature; and between York and Durham, the space of 60 Miles for nine Years together, there was so utter Desolation, as that neither any House was left standing, nor any Ground tilled.

A.D. 1076. Many other Insurrections there were in his Reign, as at Exeter, at Oxford, in the Isle of Ely, and many times by the Scots in the Northern Parts. The most dangerous of all the Conspiracies, and most distasteful of him, was that of Roger Fitz. Aubrey Earl of Hereford, Ralph Waler Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, Waltbeoff Earl of Northumberland, with Eustace Earl of Bologne, (sent purposely, as it was thought, by the King of France into England, to incite and join with the Conspirators.) Ralph Waler married the Sister of Roger the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the express Commandment of K. William: At the Solemnization of the Marriage, these Lords conspire to keep the King now in Normandy, and dispossess him of his Sovereignty; which to perform, they agreed to join theirs with the Danish Forces, whom they intended to call in. This was the most dangerous Combination of all, it happening when he was out of England, at the Siege of Dole, a Castle in Britain belonging to Ralph Waler, and defended against him by the King of France; and at such a time as almost all Christendom had declared their Jealousies of him, and ill Affections towards him; the King of Scotland, and Princes of Wales, ready to assist the Rebels at home; Swaine King of Denmark invading England with a Navy of 200 Sail, to which Drone King of Ireland added 65 Ships. How much such an Action did distaste and offend him, may be conjectured, in that most of these great Noblemen were either his Kinsmen, or in Affinity nearly allied to him: But William's Fortune secures him as well at home against Traitors, as in the Field against his Enemies. This grand Conspiracy is discovered by Waltbeoff to Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, who persuades the Earl to go over to K. William, and inform him in what Danger he was. Notwithstanding this Discovery, Roger and Ralph persist in their intentions, raise Forces to prosecute their Designs: But by the Diligence of Odo the King's Brother, Bishop of Bayeux, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Abbot of Evesham, were so prevented, that they could never unite their Forces; Ralph flies into France; Roger Earl of Hereford is taken, put in Prison, and, as some report, to death; Waltbeoff, of all lamented, beheaded. A.D. 1076. But all these were easily suppress'd, for they were but scattered Forces, Et dum singuli pugnant universi vincuntur; whereas, if they had united themselves into an Army, they might perhaps have made it a War, which now were little more than Routs and Riots. Yet some write, That K. William granted Cumberland to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold from him, conditionally, that the Scots should not attempt any thing prejudicial to the Crown of England, for which Grant K. Malcolme did him Homage.

The greatest and last was an Insurrection raised in Normandy by his Son Robert, the more dangerous, because unnatural; for by the Instigation and Assistance of Philip King of France, (emulous now of K. William's Greatness) he entred Normandy, and claimed it in his own Right. His Father indeed had made him a Promise of it long before; but Robert impatient of Delay, as counting so long staying to be little better than disinheriting, endeavoured by strong Hand to wrest it from his Father. But his Father K. William hearing hereof, with a strong Army passeth over into Normandy, where in a Battel meeting Hand to Hand with his Son, he was by him unhorsed, and hurt in the Arm: But his Son perceiving him by his Voice to be his Father, suddenly leaps off his Horse, takes up his Father, cast himself down at his Feet, and humbly intreats his Pardon; which as a Father he easily grants, embraceth his Son, and ever after, the Son from the Father had fatherly Love, and the Father from the Son a filial Obedience. But tho' his Father did thus pardon him, yet it seems there is a Nemesis, or to say better, a Divine Providence that did not pardon him; for after this, it is observed he never prospered in any thing he undertook. It cannot perhaps be discovered, whether the King's Severity begat his Subjects Insurrections; or his Subjects Insurrections the King's Severity: But which of them soever was the Mother, it is certain they were Nurses each of them to other. Yet after this, K. William so far trusted his Son Robert, that he sent him with an Army against Malcolme King of Scotland, who had invaded Northumberland, but at the coming of Duke Robert retired. At which time Duke Robert began the Foundation of a Castle upon the River of Tyne; whereof the Town of New-Castle did after take both Beginning and Name, which before this time was called Moncafter. In his twentieth Year in Whitfun-week, he honoured his Son Henry with the Order of Knighthood, wherein what Ceremony he used is not certainly known: but it is worth observing, that before his Time, the Custom among the Saxons was, first, he who should receive the Order of Knighthood, confessed himself in the Evening to a Priest; then he continued all that Night in the Church, watching and applying himself to his private Devotion: the next Morning he heard Mass, and offered his Sword upon the Altar. After the Gospel was read, the Sword was hallowed, and with a Benediction put about his Neck. Lastly, he communicated the Mysteries of the Blessed

A.D. 1076. Body of Christ; and from that time remained a perfect Knight. But this Custom of consecrating Knights, the Normans abhorred.

His Aptness to forget Injuries.

CERTAINLY there is no such Goodness of Nature, as Aptness to be reconciled; of which Virtue it seems K. William had a large Proportion, for he seldom remembered Injuries after Submission. Edrick the first that rebelled against him, he placed in Office near about him. Gospatrick, who had been a factious Man, and a Plotter of Conspiracies against him, he made Earl of Gloucester, and trusted him with managing a War against Malcolme King of Scots. Eustace Earl of Boloigne, who in the King's Absence in Normandy, attempted to seize upon Dover Castle, he received afterward into great Favour and Respect. The Earls Marchar and Syward, with Wolnoth the Brother of Harold, a little before his Death, he released out of Prison. Edgar, who was next Heir to the Saxon Kings, and had often attempted by Arms to recover his Right, he not only after twice Defection pardoned, but gave him also Allowance as a Prince: It is said twenty Shillings a Day, or rather a Pound Weight of Silver, and other large Livings besides; so as Edgar finding the Sweetness of Safety, and the Pleasures of a Countrey Life, spent the rest of his Days (which were many) retired from Court, neither envying nor being envied. Only Walthoeff, Earl of Northumberland and Northampton, of all the English Nobility, was put to Death in all the time of this King's Reign; and not he neither, till he had twice falsified his Oath of Allegiance.

Of new Acquests to this Kingdom, by this King's means.

A.D. 1079. IN the thirteenth Year of his Reign, he subdued Wales, and made it tributary to him, as before in the seventh Year of his Reign he brought Malcolme King of Scots to do him Homage, and thereupon to give him Hostages; that if England made him greater than he was before, a King of a Duke, he no less made England greater than it was before, three Kingdoms in one.

An. Reg. 13.

Of his Exactions and Courses for raising of Money.

AS his Taxations were many in Number, so they were various in Kind, not always bringing in Money directly, but sometimes obliquely saving it: The first Tax he laid upon his Subjects was in the first Year of his Reign, after his return out of Normandy; a grievous Tax all Writers say, but none what it was. In the third Year of his Reign, he ransacked all Monasteries, and all the Gold and Silver of either Chalices or Shrines, he took to his own Use. Moreover, whereas many of the more principal, and richer Persons of the Realm, fearing K. William's Cruelty, and insatiable Desire of Monies, deposited their Treasures, Jewels, and chiefest Commodities in the Monasteries and Abbies, as in sure Sanctuaries to be safely kept for their own Uses; the King violently seized on all for himself, neither regarding the Sanctity of the Places, nor what Injustice he did to his own Subjects, but as a conquering Tyrant made their Poverty his own Security. Likewise he seized all Bishops and Abbots what Number of Soldiers they should find to serve him in his Wars: Also the Strangers which he maintained in Pay, he dispersed into religious Houses, and some also among the Nobility to be maintained at their Charge. Many other Taxations he made, but last of all in the eighteenth Year of his Reign, by the Advice of Roger Earl of Hertford, he caused the whole Realm to be described in a censual Roll (whereof he took a Precedent from K. Alfred;) so there was not one Hyde of Land, but both the yearly Rent, and the Owner thereof was therein set down: How many Plough-Lands, what Pastures, Fens or Marshes, what Woods, Farms and Tenements were in every Shire, and what every one was worth: Also how many Villains every Man had; what Beasts, what Cattel, what Fees, what other Goods, what Rent or Commodity his Possessions did yield. This Book was called the Roll of Winton, because it was kept in the City of Winchester. By the English it was called Doms-day Book, either by the reason of the generality thereof, or else corruptly, instead of Domus Dei Book, for that it was laid in the Church of Winchester, in a place called Domus Dei. According to this Roll Taxations were imposed, sometimes two Shillings, and at this time six Shillings upon every Hyde of Land (a Hyde containing, as Master Lambert proveth, a hundred Acres.) In all those Lands which he gave to any Man, he reserved Dominion in chief to himself, as also a yearly Rent, and likewise a Fine whensoever the Tenant did alien or die. These were bound to him by Oath of Fealty and Homage; and if any died, his Heir being within Age, the King received the Profit of his Lands, and had the Custody and disposing of the Heir's Body, until his Age of one and twenty Years. To be short, his Greediness of Mony was so great, that he spared not his own Brother Odo, but found Accusations against him, to the end he might seize upon his Treasure, which was infinite great, and which he had gathered in hope to buy the Papacy. Only one kind of Profit he forbore to meddle with, that is Vacancies of Abbies and Bishopricks, which he always reserved for the Successors: But then he took another course of far greater Profit, for he compelled all Men to make new Fines at his Pleasure, for Confirmation of any Grant or Privileges formerly granted by any Prince of the Realm; by which Device he got into his Possession the greatest part of all the Riches of the Land, as well of the Clergy, as of the Laity. And one Particular may not be omitted that is reported of him, which was this: The Monks of Ely, to purchase their Peace, agreed to give him 700 Marks, when coming to pay it, they wanted a Groat in the Weight, (for in those Days greater Sums were not paid by Taile, but by Weight) which the King understanding, denied them all composition for Peace, until with much Suit he was intreated to accept of a thousand Marks more.

Of

A.D. 1079. Of his Laws and Ordinances, and Courts of Justice erected by him.

He brings in the Laws of Normandy, and causeth them to be written in French.

He brought in the trial by Verdict of twelve Men.

He ordained the four Terms of Law.

He ordained Sheriffs and Justices of Peace.

He ordained the Court of Chancery and Exchequer.

His Tenants pay their Rents in Corn and other Victuals.

ALTHO' at his Coronation he had taken an Oath to observe the Laws of K. Edward then in Use; yet afterwards (perhaps counting his Coronation Oath but a matter of course) he abrogated many, and in their stead brought in the Laws of Normandy; commanding them to be written in French; and also that all Causes should be pleaded, and all Matters of Forms dispatched in French; upon a Pretence to dignify the French tongue, but with a purpose to intrap Men thro' Ignorance of the Language, as indeed it did: or perhaps to make the Normans Language predominant in the Kingdom, as he had made their Persons; which yet was so far from effecting, that there is not so much as any Footsteps remaining of the Norman Language in the English Tongue. Forms of Judgment, and Trials by Fire and Water, called Ordeal, formerly used, were in short time after the Conquest disused, and in the end utterly abrogated by the Pope, as derived from Paganism. That of Combat continued longer, but of no ordinary Use. And all Actions both criminal and real, began now to be wholly adjudged by the Verdict of twelve Men, according to the Custom of Normandy, where the like Form is used, and called by the Name of Enquest, with the same Cautions for the Jurors, as it is here continued to this Day; tho' by the Laws of Ethelred it appears, that the Trial by twelve Men was in use long before his time. And whereas before the Bishop and the Aldermen were the absolute Judges to determine all Business in every Shire, and the Bishop in many Cases shared in the Benefit of the Mulcts with the King; now he confined the Clergy within the Province of their own Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, to deal only in Business concerning Rule of Souls, according to the Canons and Laws Episcopal. And where the Causes of the Kingdom were before determined in every Shire, and by a Law of K. Edward, all Matters in Question were upon special Penalty decided in their Gemote, which was a little Court held monthly in every Hundred: Now he ordained that four times in the Year, for certain Days the same Businesses should be determined in such Places as he would appoint, where he constituted Judges to attend for that purpose. Also he decreed there should be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Justices of Peace for Punishment of Malefactors. Finally, he ordained his Council of State, his Chancery, his Exchequer, (Scaccarium, corruptly called so, of the Word Statarium, or rather of the Board or Table where the Officers sate;) also his Courts of Justice, which always removed with his Court. These Places he furnished with Officers, and assigned four Terms in the Year for determining Controversies among the People. The Place of these Courts was Westminster, where King William Rufus afterwards built a stately Palace. Now for his provisionary Revenues, the King's Tenants who held the Lands of the Crown, paid him no Money at all, but only Corn and other

Victuals; and a just Note of the Quality and Quantity of every Man's ratement, was taken throughout all the Shires of the Kingdom, and levied ever certain, for Maintenance of the King's House. Only the Kentish-men procured the Continuance of their ancient Laws by a Trick: For K. William riding towards Dover, at Swanscombe, two Miles from GraveSEND, the Kentish-men met him, but in the Form of a moving Wood, by reason of the great Boughs they had cut, and carried in their Hands; and compassing the King about, they only made Suit for the Continuance of their Laws and Customs; of which one special was, That the Tenure of their Lands was Gavelkind by which they descended not to the eldest alone, as in other Countries, but were partable between all the Sons; and the Privileges which the Owners of such Lands enjoyed were chiefly these: Not to forfeit them for Felony: Not to be subject to Services before the Justices: Not to be challenged for Villains. So the Conqueror considering that he might as well allow them, as other Kings had done before him, easily condescended to their Request. But see the Levity of these Kentish-men, to hazard themselves more for the preserving a simple Custom, than for preserving the Liberty of themselves and their Countrey: But such is Violence of Conceit, till it be mastered by Time; or rather so very a Changeling is human Reason, that what they then cut down great Woods to defend, they have since been content to be abolished, without cutting down so much as a Twig. But one Law especially he made, extremely distasteful to all the Gentry of the Land: For where before they might at their Pleasure hunt and take Deer which they found abroad in the Woods; now it was ordained under a great Penalty, no less than putting out their Eyes, that none should presume to kill, or take any of them, as reserving them only for his own Delight. And indeed so great Delight he took in that kind of Sport, that he depopulated a great part of Hampshire, the space of thirty Miles, where there had been (saith Caxton) six and twenty Towns, and fourscore Religious Houses, and made it a Habitation for such kind of Beasts; which was then, and to this Day is called the New Forest. But the lamentable Disasters that have happened to this King's Issue, do plainly shew, that there is a Power that observes all our Actions, and which we may know to be memorem Fandi atque Nefandi. But in the first Year of this King's Reign, he granted to the City of London their first Charter and Liberties in as large Form as they enjoyed them in the time of K. Edward the Confessor, which he granted at the Suit of William a Norman, Bishop of London; in grateful Remembrance whereof, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, upon the solemn Days of their Resort to Paul's, do still use to walk to the Gravestone where this Bishop lies interred. Also this King was the first that brought the Jews to inhabit here in England: As likewise he made a Law that whosoever forced a Woman, should lose his Genitals: And in his time long Bows came first

This King also appointed a Constable of Dover Castle, and a Lord Warden of the Cinque-ports, with Immunities as they are at this Day. And to be short, this King ordained so good Laws, and had them so well executed, that it is said a Girl might carry a bag of Money all the Country over without Danger of robbing; and in his time, the setting Seals to Bonds and Writings was first used, where before they were only Witnesses to Deeds.

Affairs of the Church in his Reign.

IN his Time, Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was for divers Causes deprived of his Dignity, and kept private all his Life after in the Castle of Winchester: after whom succeeded Lanfrank, an Italian, in that See: who in the twelfth Year of this King's Reign, held a Synod at London, where amongst other things he removed the Bishops Sees from small Towns to great Cities; as from Silliway to Chichester, from Kyrton to Exeter, from Wells to Bathe, from Shirborn to Salisbury, from Dorchester to Lincoln, and from Lichfield to Chester, and from thence again to Coventry; and not long before, the Bishoprick of Lindisfern, otherwise called Holy Land, upon the River Twede, had been translated to Durham. In the sixth Year of his Reign, a Controversy arising between the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, they appealed to Rome, and the Pope remitted it to the King and Bishops of England. Hereupon a Synod is holden at Windsor, where Sentence was given on Lanfrank, then Archbishop of Canterbury's Side; that in Matters of Religion, the Archbishop of York should ever be subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury: Only at Rome it was decreed for matter of Title, That the See of York should be styled Primas Angliæ, and the See of Canterbury Primas totius Angliæ, as it is at this Day. And as the Archbishop of Canterbury, so all the Bishops of Scotland owe Obedience to the Archbishop of York, as to the Primate of Scotland. It shall not be amiss here to write the Journey of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury to Rome; who in the fifth Year of K. William's Reign made Bishop of Canterbury, went to Rome to obtain the Pall due to Archbishops, taking for his Companions Thomas Archbishop of York, and Remigius Bishop of Lincoln; arrived at Rome, and admitted to the Pope's Prefence, Pope Alexander rose from his Seat, and gently saluting him, faith withal, This Honour I do not give, as due to your Archbishoprick, but as due to my Master; to whose Labour I must acknowledge to be due what Learning I have. The next Day having Audience, he accused the two Companions of his Journey.

But as this King took down the Prelates in Temporalities, for he ordained they should exercise no temporal Authority at all: So in Spiritualities he rather raised them, as may be seen by a Passage between Aldred Archbishop of York, and the King; for at a time, upon the Repulse of a certain Suit, the Archbishop in great Discontentment offered to depart, when the King in awe of his Displeasure, stayed him, fell down at his Feet, desired Pardon, and promised to grant his Suit. The King all this while being down at the Archbishop's Feet, the Noblemen that were present, put him in mind that he should cause the King to rise: Nay (saith the Archbishop) let him alone, let him find what it is to anger Saint Peter. And as by this Story we see the insulting Pride of a Prelate in those Days; so by another, we may see the equivocating Falsehood of a Prelate at that time: For Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury would often swear, He had not one penny upon the Earth, when under the Earth it was afterwards found he had hidden great Treasure. Also it is memorable, but scarce credible of another Bishop, who being accused of Simony, and denying it, the Cardinal before whom he was to answer, told him, That a Bishoprick was the gift of the Holy Ghost, and therefore to buy a Bishoprick was against the Holy Ghost, and thereupon bid him say, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; which the Bishop beginning, and oft assaying, could never say, (and to the Holy Ghost,) but said it plainly when he was put out of his Bishoprick. And yet was not the Church in that Age so barren of Virtue, but that it afforded some good Bishops, as William Bishop of Durham, Founder of University-Colledge in Oxford; but especially Bishop Wolston, whom, upon Lanfrank's reporting to be insufficient for the Place for want of Learning, the King commanded to put off his pontifical Robes, and to leave his Bishoprick: When suddenly out of a Divine Inspiration, Wolston answered, A better than you, O King, bestowed these Robes upon me, and to him I will restore them. And therewithal going to St. Edward's Shrine, who had made him a Bishop, and putting off his Robes, he struck his Staff upon St. Edward's Monument, which stuck so fast in the stone of it, that by no strength it could be drawn forth, till he drew it forth himself: which so terrified both Lanfrank and the King that they intreated him to take his Robes again, and keep his Bishoprick. Also Osmund Bishop of Salisbury, who devised a Form of Prayers to be daily used in his Church, and was used afterwards in other Churches, from whence proceeded the common saying of secundum usum Sarum. In this King's Time was Berengarius, who denied the true Body of Christ to be in the Sacrament: Also in his Time, Pope Gregory the Seventh removed married Priests from executing Divine Service, whereof great Troubles arose in England: Also in his Time was instituted the Feast of the Conception of the Virgin Mary: Also in his Time, Pope Gregory the Seventh, in a Synod holden at Rome, ordained that none should be called Pope but only the Bishop of Rome, where before all Bishops were called Popes.

A.D. 1079. Works of Piety, by him and others, in his Time.

THIS King founded the Abbey of Battel in Suffex, where he overcame Harold, as a Monument in Memory of his Victory; (but there succeeded a greater Monument in Memory of this Battel, if it be true which Neubrigenfis saith, that after every small Rain the Grasse where the Battel was fought, shews to be of the colour of Blood, and had continued to do so to his Days, who lived in the Time of King Stephen, almost 100 Years after the Battel was fought;) the Abbey of Selby in Yorkshire; and a third near London, called St. Saviour's. He founded also the Priory of St. Nicholas at Exeter, and gave great Privileges to St. Martin's le Grand in London; which Church was founded before the Conquest, by Ingelricus and Emardus his Brother, Cousins to King Edward the Confessor. He also builded the Tower of London: Namely, the great white and square Tower there. These were this King's Works of Piety in England; but in Normandy he founded also an Abbey at Caen, where his Wife Maude built also a Monastery of Nuns. He gave also to the Church of St. Stephen's in Caen, two Mannors in Dorsetshire, one Mannor in Devonshire, another in Essex, much Land in Berkshire, some in Norfolk, a Mansion in Woodstreet, London; with many Advowsons of Churches: And even he gave his Crown and Regal Ornaments to the said Church, being of his own Foundation: for the Redemption whereof, his Son Henry gave the Mannor of Brydleton in Dorsetshire. In this King's Time Robert, Son to Hildebert Lacies founded the Priory of Pontefract: Henry Earl Ferrers founded a Priory within his Castle at Tutbury; Alwyn Childe, a Citizen of London, founded the Monastery of S. Saviour's at Bermondsey in Southwark, and gave the Monks there divers Rents in London. Also in this King's Time, Maurice Bishop of London, after the firing of the former Church of St. Paul in London, began the Foundation of the New Church, a Work so admirable, that many thought it would never have been finished. Towards the Building of the East End whereof, the King gave the choice Stones of his Castle at the West End of the City, upon the Bank of the River Thames; which Castle having been at that Time fired, in place thereof Edward Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury did afterwards found a Monastery of Black-Fryers. The King also gave the Mannor of Starford to the same Maurice, and to his Successors in that See; after whose Decease, Richard his next Successor bestowed all the Rents of his Bishoprick to advance the Building of this Church, maintaining himself by his private Patrimony; and yet all he could do, made no great Shew, but the finishing of the Work was left to many other succeeding Bishops. In the fourteenth Year of this King's Reign, Roger de Montgomery Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury founded the Abbey of Shrewsbury. He also built another at Wenlock. In the fifteenth Year of this King's Reign, William Bishop of Durham founded University-College in Oxford; Also one Gilbert a Norman Lord founded the Abbey of Merton in Surrey, seven miles from London; and Thomas Archbishop of York, first builded the Minster of York. In this King's sixteenth Year, his Brother Duke Robert being sent against the Scots, builded a Fort, where at this Day standeth New-Castle upon Tyne: but the Town and Walls were builded afterward by K. John. Also in this King's Time, Ledes Castle in Kent was builded by Creveken, and the Castle of Oxford by Robert d'Oylie, two Noblemen that came into England with him. Osmund Bishop of Salisbury built the New Church there.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN the twentieth Year of his Reign, so great a Fire happened in London, that from the West Gate to the East Gate, it consumed Houses and Churches all the way, and amongst the rest the Church of St. Paul; the most grievous Fire that ever happened in this City. Also this Year, by reason of Distemperature of Weather, Thunders and Lightenings, by which many Men perished, there ensued a Famine, and afterwards a miserable Mortality of Men and Cattel; and which is very strange, Hens, Peacocks, Geese, and Ducks, bred in and accustomed to Houses, forsook their wonted Hives, and turned wild. (Mat. West. Anno Dom. 1087.) Also this Year in the Province of Wales, upon the Sea-shore, was found the Body of Gawen, Sister's Son to Arthur, the great King of the Britains, reported to be fourteen Foot in Length. Also in this King's Time, a great Lord sitting at a Feast, was set upon by Mice; and tho' he were removed from Land to Sea, and from Sea again to Land; yet the Mice still followed him, and at last devoured him.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE had to Wife, and her only, Matbilde, or Maude, Daughter to Baldwyn Earl of Flanders. She was crowned Queen of England the second Year of his Reign; the seventeenth Year of his Reign she died. A Woman only memorable for this, that nothing memorable is recorded of her, but that she built a Nunnery at Caen in Normandy, where she lies buried. By her he had four Sons and five Daughters. His Sons were, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry: of whom Robert, the eldest called Court-cuyse, of his short Thighs; or Court-hose, of his short Breeches; or Courtois, of his courteous Behaviour, (for so many are the Comments upon his Name) succeeded his Father in the Duchy of Normandy. Richard his second Son was kill'd by Misfortune, hunting in the New-Forest. William his third Son, called Rufus, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England. Henry his youngest Son, called Beauclerk, for his Learning, had by his Father's Will 5000 Pounds in Money, and the Inheritance also of his Mother. His Daughters were Cecile, Constance, Adela, Margaret and Elenor, of whom Cecile was Abbess of Caen in Normandy. Constance was married to Allen Earl of Britain. Adela to Stephen Earl of Blois. Margaret affianced to Harold King of England, but never married,

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was but mean of Stature, yet big of Body, and therewithal so strong, that few were able to draw his Bow: Growing in Years he was bald before; his Beard always shaven after the manner of the Normans; and in his younger Time he was much given to that Infirmary of Youth, which grows out of Strength of Youth, Incontinency. After he was once married, whether out of Satiety, or out of Grace, he was never known to offend in that kind. Of so perfect Health, that he was never sick till that sickness whereof he died. Of a stern Countenance, yet of an affable nature: In War, as expert as valiant: In Peace, as provident as prudent: and in all his Enterprizes as fortunate, as bold and hardy. Much given to Hunting and Feasting, where he was no less pleasant than magnificent. He made no great Proficiency in Learning, as having had his Education in the Licentiousness of the French Court: yet he favoured learned Men, and drew out of Italy, Lanfrank, Anselm, Durand, Terberne, and divers others, famous at that Time for Learning and great Piety. Very devout he was, and always held the Clergy in exceeding great Reverence. And this is one special Honour attributed unto him, That from him we begin the Computation of our Kings of England.

His Places of Residence.

HIS Christmas he commonly kept at Glo- cester, his Easter at Winchester, and his Whitsuntide at Westminster, and once in the Year at one of these Places would be new crowned; as tho' by often putting on his Crown, he thought to make it fit the easier upon his Head. And for the Houses which the Kings of England had in those Days in London; I find that at Westminster was a Palace, the ancient Habitation of the Kings of England, from the Time of Edward the Confessor; which in the Reign of K. Henry the Eighth, was by casual Fire burnt down to the Ground. A very large and stately Palace this was, and in that Age for Building incomparable. The Remains whereof are the Chamber of assembling the High Court of Parliament, and the next unto it; wherein anciently they were wont to begin the Parliament, called St. Edward's Painted Chamber; because the Tradition holdeth, that the said K. Edward died in it. Adjoining unto this, is the White-Hall, wherein at this Day the Court of Requests is kept. Beneath this, is the great Hall, where Courts of Justice are now kept. This Hall, which we now have, was built by K. Richard the Second out of the Ground; as appeareth by his Arms engraven in the Stone-work, (when he had plucked down the old Hall, built before by William Rufus) and made it his own Habitation. But the aforefaid Palace, after it was

K. Henry the Eighth shortly after translated the King's Seat to a House not far off, built by Cardinal Wolsey, and is called White-Hall. White-Hall, The Tower of London was anciently used by when made the Kings of England to lodge in. Other the King's Houses they anciently had; one where Bride- well now standeth; out of the Ruins whereof, the now Bridewell was built. Another called the Tower-Royal, now the King's Wardrobe.
 Another in Bucklersbury, called Sernes Tower.
 Another where now the Popes-Head Tavern is, over-against the Old Exchange, thought to have been the Kings House; also another in Limestreet, called the King's Artrice; also another in the Old-Jury; and oft-times they made use of Baynard's Castle. But these are all long since demolished, that we may see Palaces and Places have their Fates and Periods as well as Men.

His Death and Burial.

TOWARDS the End of his Reign, he appointed his two Sons, Robert and Henry, with joint Authority, Governors of Normandy. These went together to visit the King of France lying at Constance; where entertaining the Time with Variety of Sports,
Henry played with Lewis the Heir of France
 at Chesse, and winning much Money of him,
Lewis grew so cholerick, that he threw the Chesse-men at Henry's Face, calling him the Son of a Bastard; and thereupon Henry struck
Lewis with the Chesse Board, and had presently slain him, if his Brother Robert had not stepp'd in and stayed him. Upon this the King of France invades Normandy, and draws Robert, K. William's eldest Son, to join with him against his Father: But K. William coming presently over with an Army, was soon reconciled to his Son; yet being corpulent and in Years, was by this means much distempered in Body, and so retired to Roan, where he stayed, as not being well in Health. The French King hearing of his Sickness, scoffingly said, That he lay in Child-bed of his great Belly. Which so incensed K. William, that he swore by God's Resurrection and his Brightness, (his usual Oath) that as soon as he should be church'd of that Child, he would offer a thousand Lights in France: And indeed he performed it; for he entered France in Arms, and set many Towns and Cornfields on Fire, in which he was so violent, that by reason of his Travel, and the unreasonable Heat, being in the Month of August, it brought upon him a Relapse of his Sickness, and withal, leaping on Horseback over a Ditch, his fat Belly did bear so hard upon the Pummel of his Saddle, that he took a Rupture in his inner Parts; whereupon returning to Roan, his Sickness so increased, that in short time he died. And that which is scarce credible, yet recorded for certain, the very same Day he died at Roan, his Death A.D. 1087.
 was known at Rome, a thousand miles off; which if it be true, it seems there are certain invisible Intelligencers, that can make such Speed: Whereof Froissard tells us a strange Story; and for the Strangeness not unworthy to be here related. There was (saith he) in

A.D. 1087. the Time of K. Edward the Third, a Knight in France called Corasse, who could tell any thing that was done all the World over, the very Day it was done, or within a Day or two; how far soever it were off; and this he did by such an invisable Intelligencer. For he had gotten a familiar Spirit, called Ortbone; who brought him the News continually, and held on this course with him divers Years, till at last he lost him by this Occasion. He had only heard the Voice of his Spirit Ortbone, and now had great Longing to see his Shape; whereupon the Spirit seeing his earnestness, Well then (saith he) to Morrow Morning when you rise out of your Bed, the first thing you see shall be I. So the Knight rising in the Morning looked out, but could see nothing: Whereupon he blamed his Spirit Ortbone, for not keeping his Promise with him. Ortbone answered, He had kept his Promise: For, saith he, bethink your self, what it was you first saw after your rising. Then the Knight bethinking himself, remembered he saw two Straws upon the Ground, tumbling upon one another: Why, saith Ortbone, that was I. Then the Knight desired he might see him in such a Shape, as that he might take notice of him. Well then, said Ortbone, to Morrow Morning, when you arise, the first thing you see, that shall be I. So the next Morning, the Knight rising, and looking out of his Chamber Window, the first thing he saw was a Sow, so lean and deformed, that he could not abide to see it; and thereupon caused his Men to set Dogs upon it, to drive it away; which being done, the Sow vanished away. After this his Spirit Ortbone never came to him any more. And this Relation Froissard had from the Knight's own Mouth: And by such a like means, it might perhaps be, that the Death of K. William was known at Rome the very Day he died at Roan, tho' a thousand Miles asunder. And now to go on with the Story, William the Conqueror in all the time of his Sickness retained to the very last his Memory and Speech; and shewed many Demonstrations of his Devotion, and true Contrition, specially for his Severity used towards the English. And thus he who was a Conquerour of Men, was conquered himself by Death, the ninth Day of September, when he had reigned twenty Years, and near eleven Months, in the threescore and fourth Year of his Age; Malmesbury saith in the fifty ninth. I may well say, he was conquered by Death, seeing Death used him more despitefully than ever he living used any whom he had conquered: For no sooner was the Breath out of his Body, but his Attendants purloining what they could lay Hands on, forsook him and fled, leaving his Body almost naked upon the Ground. Afterwards, William Archbishop of Roan, commanded his Body should be conveyed to Caen, but his command was little regarded: till at last, one Herlewyne, a Countrey Knight, at his own Charges caused his Body to be embalmed, and conveyed thither; where the Abbot and Monks meeting the Corps, suddenly in the midst of their Solemnities, a violent Fire brake out in the Town, with the Fright whereof, every man left the Place; and thus was his Body the second time left forlorn. In the end a few Monks returned, and accompanied the Hearse to the Abbey Church; but when the Divine Office was ended, and the Body ready to be laid in the Grave, one Anselm Fitz Arthur stood up and claimed that ground to have been the Floor of his Father's House, which K. William had violently wrested from him, and thereupon charged them, as they would answer it before the dreadful Face of God, not to cover his Body with the Earth of his Inheritance. Whereupon after some Pause, Agreement was made with him, and three Pound was paid in Hand for the Ground broken up, and an hundred Pounds more afterwards for the Ground it self, paid him by Henry the King's youngest Son, who only of all his Sons was present at the Funeral. And yet this was not all, but when his Body was to be put in the Earth, it happened that the Sepulchre of Stone which stood with the Grave, was hewen somewhat too strait for his fat Belly, so as they were fain to press it down with some Violence, with which, whether his Bowels burst, or whether some Excrements were forced out of their natural Passage, such an intolerable Stink proceeded from him, that none were able to endure it, but made all the haste they could to be gone. And yet neither was this the last of his Miseries; for in the Year 1562, when the Admiral Coligny took the City of Caen, certain dissolute Soldiers opened his Tomb, and not finding the Treasure they expected, threw forth his Bones with great Derision: Whereof some were afterward brought into England. So that if we consider his many Troubles in his Life and after his Death, we may well think, that notwithstanding all his Greatness, a very mean Man would hardly be persuaded to change Fortunes with him. He bore the same Arms as peculiar to the Crown of England, which all succeeding Princes have used: namely, Three Lions passant Gold in a Field Gules: For as for the Three Flower-de-luces, they were added by K. Edward the Third, upon his Claim of the Crown of France.

The Arms born by King William.

Men of Note in his Time.

MEN of Learning in his Time were but rare in this Island, yet some there were, particularly Marianus Scotus, an Historiographer, and * Aluredus a Monk of Beverly, a Writer also of historical Argument. And as for the Men of Valour, they are not to be expected in a Time of Servitude, but as if all the English Valour were now remaining in the Kentish Men, they only made Resistance, when all other Countries had submitted. Yet it is memorable in this Time, what a private Norwegian Soldier did, who himself alone upon a Bridge resisted the whole Army of the English, slew forty of them, and maintained the Place for divers Hours together, till one getting under the Bridge, found Means to thrust up a Spear into his Body, and killed him.

* He lived a long time after, his History being written about K. Stephen's Time. Ingulphus, Abbot of Crowland, should have been mentioned instead of him.

King William the Second.

A.D. 1087.
William Rufus
is crowned.

KING William the Second, called Rufus, third Son to William the Conqueror, appointed Successor by his Father's Will, was upon the fifth of October, in the Year 1087, by Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, crowned at Westminster King of England. Wherein his Father seems to have followed the Example of Jacob, who gave to his younger Son Joseph, the Land which he had taken with his Sword and his Bow: For with his Sword and Bow had King William gotten the Land of England, and therefore might justly bestow it on which of his Sons he pleased. And besides, there was Cause enough, why he should shew this Son of his some extraordinary Favour, seeing in the Rebellion of his Brother Robert, yet he stood firmly for his Father; and in his Quarrel incurred no small Hazard of his Life, as wherein he received divers Wounds: And perhaps also, his Father thought the rough Disposition of this Son fitter to bridle the Insurrections of the English, than the softly Disposition of his Son Robert.

His Brother is incited to claim the Crown.

He is compounded with for 3000
Marks a Year.

But though he had thus quietly gotten the Crown, he must not look to hold it so; and indeed at his very Beginning is assaulted with two Troubles in one; for both his Brother Robert prepares to recover it from him, and the Lords of the Kingdom combine with Robert to assist him in it. The first Mover of this Trouble was Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Uncle, who finding himself not to bear the Sway he expected, and specially for an old Grudge he bore to Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, and by whose means, in the former King's Time he had been imprisoned, the Archbishop telling him, That though he might not imprison a Bishop, yet he might imprison an Earl of Kent, (as this Odo was made not long before) he draws many other Bishops and temporal Lords to join with him, in Behalf of Duke Robert against the King: But tho' the Storm were violent for a while, yet it soon passed over; that indeed of his Lords, with more Difficulty; but that of his Brother Robert with more Cost: For it was at last agreed, That Rufus should pay him 3000 Marks a Year during his Life, and leave him the Kingdom after his own Decease. But there was Difficulty in repressing his rebel Lords by reason of their spreading themselves abroad in many Quarters. For A.D. 1087. Odo fortified himself in Kent; Roger Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire; Hugh de Grandmenil, in Leicestershire and Northamptonshire; Robert Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, possessed himself of Bristol; William Bishop of Durham, of the North Parts of the Realm; and divers other of the Clergy and Nobility, fortify themselves in Herefordshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and all the Countries adjoining to Wales, thinking by this means to distract the King, that he should not know where to begin, nor whither to turn him. But this course, as it made it hard to repress them suddenly, so it made it easy to repress them at leisure; for being thus divided, they were but as single Sticks, that are easily broken; whereas if they had united themselves, as into a Faggot, they might have made a Strength of far greater Resistance. But the King having Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, and Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, firm of his side; partly by their Authority and Love amongst the People; but chiefly by his own Promises, to restore their ancient Laws, and to allow them Liberty of hunting in his Forests, he so firmly wone the Hearts of all unto him, that some of the rebel Lords he reconciled with fair Words; as Robert Montgomery (a principal Sinew of the Faction;) some again he master'd by strong Hand; and Odo, the chief Engineer of all the Work, he besieged in the Castle of Rochester, took him Prisoner, and forced him to abjure the Realm. And thus this great Rebellion was suppressed: In which it is observable, that tho' so many hot Bloods were up, yet there was but little Blood spilt. A happy Rebellion for the English; for the rebel Lords and Bishops being all Normans, the King had none to trust to but the English, whom for their Faithfulness to him in this Service, he ever after respected more than he had done before.

The Rebel Lords are

The English
firmer to K.
William than the Normans.

This Year died Lanfrank, after he had been Archbishop of Canterbury eighteen Years, who had brought the Monks to some good Order, that before his Time follow'd Hunting and Hawking, Dicing and Carding, to the great Discredit of their Profession.

After this Storm was over in the South, there ariseth another in the North; for now
Malcolme

A.D. 1090. Malcolme King of Scots, thinking it a fit time to do some Feats when King William was troubled at home, invades Northumberland, and having burnt and spoiled the Countrey, returns home laden with Booties: Which King William hearing, he takes his Brother Robert along with him, and with a mighty Army enters Scotland, brings Malcolme to acknowledge his ancient Homage; and upon Faith given, returns to London. After this, Duke Robert finding his Brother K. William not to keep his Promise, in paying his Pension, complains to the King of France, and with his Aid, assaults and takes some Towns, which he before had delivered in Pawn for Money to his Brother K. William; who hearing of it, hastens into Normandy with an Army, and by the Mediation of Money, takes off the King of France, and makes his Brother, being left destitute of Assistance, to ask him Pardon; a wise and merciful Course in K. William; for to buy his Peace with the King of France, did cost him but Money; where to have purchased it by War, must, besides Money, have cost the Lives of many.

A.D. 1093. After this, Malcolme King of Scots, came in Kindness to visit K. William at Glocester; but the King not vouchsafing so much as to see him, put him in so great an Indignation, that returning home, he makes ready an Army, invades Northumberland, making great Spoil, and getting great Spoils; but by Robert Mowbray, the King's Lieutenant there, was taken in Ambush, and together with his eldest Son Edward, defeated and slain. This King Malcolme was a most valiant Prince, as may appear by an Act of his of an extraordinary Strain. For hearing of a Conspiracy plotted to murder him, whereof one was Author, whose Name is not recorded, he dissembled the knowing of it, till being abroad one Day a hunting, he took the Fellow apart from the Company, and being alone, said unto him, Here now is a fit Time and Place to do that manfully, which you have intended to do treacherously; draw your Weapon, and if you kill me, none being present, you can incur no Danger. With which Speech of the King, the Fellow was so daunted, that presently he fell down at his Feet, confessed his Fault, humbly asked Forgiveness, and that being granted him, was ever after serviceable and faithful to him. The Death of King Malcolme and his Son was so grievous, and so grievously taken of Margaret his Queen, the Sister of Edgar Atheling, that she made it her Prayer, and had it granted, not to overlive them, and so within three Days after died. A Woman as full of Virtues all her Life, as at this Time of Sorrows, whom yet I should not break Order to mention, but for one pious Act of hers, in causing a most barbarous Custom of Scotland to be abrogated, that when a Man married, his Lord should lie the first Night with his Bride: which Custom by her Endeavour was altered to a Payment in Money.

With Grief of whose Death his Queen Margaret dieth within three Days.

A barbarous Custom in Scotland abrogated by her Means.

After these Troubles were ended in the North, a new Trouble ariseth in the West; for now the Welshmen hearing of K. William's A.D. 1098. Distractions, enter upon the English Borders, making Spoil and Havock of Men and Towns; whom K. William went with an Army to encounter, but could do no Good upon them, till he was fain to return to London, and provide himself a stronger Army. About this Time also Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, by whom Malcolme King of Scots was in K. William's Service formerly slain, finding his Service not rewarded as he expected, enters into Conspiracy against the King: But the King being informed of the Practice, seizeth suddenly upon many of his Complices; and himself, after many Devices and Shifts for Flight, is taken and put in Prison, in the Castle of Windfor. After this, K. William, to take a farther Revenge of the Welsh, and to make an absolute Conquest of that unquiet People, with a far greater Army than ever before, enters Wales, and thinks with new Devices of Castles and Forts, utterly to subdue them; but they defending themselves with their Woods and mountainous Passages, tire and weary out the King and his Army, so as he leaves the Business to two Hughs, one Earl of Salop, the other of Chester, who first invaded and took Anglesey, (their Island of Refuge) where they used all kind of Cruelty, pulling out of Eyes, and cutting off Hands and Noses: In prosecuting of which Business, Hugh Earl of Salop was slain, but Hugh Earl of Chester entered Wales, and in the end with the Slaughter of Rees the last King of Wales, made an absolute Conquest of the Countrey: For after this, tho' they often rebelled, yet they were in a true Subjection. And these for the most part were all the Troubles of his Reign: Where we may observe, that none of them did overtake him, but still he met them; and from none of them he ever fled, but still was the Pursuer; and yet so many as might have well taken away all the Comfort of a Crown, and have made him willing to change his Diadem for a Pair of Beads; but that Ambition, tho' sometimes weary, yet never tires.

IN the second Year of his Reign, Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury died, who had kept the Kingdom and King in some good Order; but as soon as he was dead, the King, as tho' he were then got loose, ranged without Reins, in all Licentiousness, preying especially upon the Clergy, as amongst whom he found the richest Booties. When Bishopricks or Abbies were vacant, it was familiar with him to seize them into his own Hands, as this of Lanfrank's he kept to his own use for four Years together, and longer would have kept it, if a Sickness of his Body had not healed this Disease of his Mind: For finding himself in some Hazard of Death, he then conferred the Archbishoprick of Canterbury upon Anselm, and the Bishoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet, two eminent Men of that Time: But as soon as he was well again, it repented him of that he had done,

A.D. 1098. and he was not quiet till he had drawn from the said Bloet five thousand Pounds, and from Anselm also good Sums of Money. For he repented not more in Time of Sicknes for the Evil he had done in Health, than being in Health he repented of the Good he had done in Sicknes; that it may in a manner be said, there was nothing made him sick but Health, and nothing made him be in Health but Sicknes. But this preying upon the Clergy was grown into such a Custom with him, that he kept in his Hands at one time three Bishopricks, Canterbury, Winchester and Salisbury, and twelve Abbies; all which he let out to farm, and received the Profits; and from this King the Use is said to have risen first in England, that the Kings succeeding had the Temporalities of Bishops Sees, as long as they remained void. Having agreed to pay the King of France a great Sum of Money, he raised it in this manner: He caused twenty thousand Men to be levied, under pretence for his Wars in Normandy; but when they were ready to be shipp'd, it was signified to them from the King, that whosoever would pay ten Shillings towards the levying of Soldiers in Normandy, should be excused from going, and stay at home, which was so plausible an Offer to the Army, that scarce a Man was found that accepted not that Condition. When Duke Robert went into the Holy Land, he pawned his Duchy of Normandy to his Brother K. William for 6666 Pounds, or as some write, for 12600, which Money K. William took up, part by a grievous Imposition; so that Bishops melted their Plate, and the temporal Lords spoiled their Tenants for the Payment thereof, and part by Loan, but chiefly of religious Persons. He sold the Abbey of Glastenbury to Thurstan for five hundred Pounds; and when he built Westminster-Hall, he made that an Occasion to lay a heavy Tax upon the People, who grudged at it as done on purpose. He usually sold all spiritual Preferments to them who would give most, and took Fines of Priests for Fornication; as also he took Money of Jews, to cause such of them as were converted, to renounce Christianity, and return to Judaism, as making more Benefit by their Unbelief, than by their Conversion. He caused divers of the Nobility to pay grievous Fines for transgressing his Laws, tho' the Fault were never so small. He set forth a Proclamation that none should go out of the Realm without his Licence, by which he drew much Money from many; for either they must tarry at home and live discontented, or else content him for giving them leave to go abroad. And from thence the Custom or Law of Ne exeat Regno, seems to have taken its Beginning: For Precedents of Servitude are sure to live, where Precedents of Liberty are commonly still-born. These were his Ways for raising of Money, wherein Promoters and Informers were his darling Servants; and the most officious of all was Ralph Bishop of Durham, of whom he would often say, there was not such a Man in the World to serve a King's Turn. And yet he was not so greedy of A.D. 1098. Lucre, but that he did some Acts that may serve for Examples; as one time, an Abbey being vacant, two Monks of the Convent came Suiters to him for the Place, offering great Sums, and each of them out-bidding the other; whereupon the King looking about, and espying another Monk standing not far off, asked him what he would give for the Place? Who answering, he neither had any thing to give, nor would give any thing if he had it. Well (said the King) thou hast spoken honestly, thou art fitter to be Abbot than either of these; and so bestowed the Place upon him gratis.

Of his Magnanimity.

WORD was brought him as he fate at Dinner, that his City of Mans in Normandy was besieged, and in great Danger to be taken, if not presently relieved: Whereupon the King asked which way Mans lay, and then caused Masons presently to take down the Wall, to make him Passage the next way, and so rode instantly towards the Sea. His Lords about him, advising him to stay till his People were ready, No (saith he) such as love me, I know will follow me. And being come on Shipboard, and the Weather growing very tempestuous, he was advised by the Master of the Ship to stay for some calmer Season: No (saith he) fear nothing, I never yet heard of any King that was drowned. And thereby coming to Mans unexpected, presently dispersed the Besiegers, and took Helias, Count de la Flesche, who had been Author of the Tumult, Prisoner; who vaunting to the King, and saying, Now indeed you have taken me by a Wile; but if I were at Liberty again, you should find me to do other kind of Feats. At which the King laughing, Well then (saith he) go your ways and do your worst, and let us see what Feats you will do. Being reconciled to his Brother Robert, he assisted him to recover the Fort of Mount St. Michael, which their Brother Henry did formerly hold in Normandy: During which Siege, straggling one time alone upon the Shore, he was set upon by three Horsemen, who assaulted him so fiercely, that they drove him from his Saddle, and his Saddle from his Horse; but he taking up his Saddle, and withal drawing out his Sword, defended himself till Rescue came; and being afterward blamed for being so obstinate to save his Saddle, he answered, it would have angered me at the very Heart, that the Knaves should have bragged they had wone the Saddle from me.

In what he was just in keeping his Word, in what he was failing.

THIS Virtue especially was commended in him, and he would often say, That even God himself was obliged by his Word. But if we observe the Course of his Life, we shall find, that howsoever he might keep his Word in small Matters, yet certainly not in great: For he kept not his Word with his Brother Robert, to whom he promised to leave

A.D. 1098. leave his Kingdom of England after his Decease, but performed it not. He kept not his Word with his Subjects; for in the Rebellion of the Norman Lords, he promised the English, if they would now stick to him, they should have their ancient Laws restored, and be allowed Liberty to hunt in his Forests; which Promise he kept not at all, or at least soon brake. Lastly, he kept not his Word with God himself; for being sick at Glocester, and in some Hazard of his Life, he made a solemn Vow, that if he recovered he would lead a new Life, and give over all his disorderly Courses: But being recovered, he grew more disorderly than he was before: That if Denomination be made from the greatest Action, it cannot be truly said, that he was just to his Word. But such is the Privilege of Princes over their Subjects, that if they make a Promise, it must be believed; and if they break it, it must not be questioned.

MUCH is spoken of his lascivious Life in general, but nothing in particular; for neither is mentioned any Violence he ever offer'd to any, nor is any Woman named to have been his Concubine; and Princes Concubines are seldom concealed. It is true, he was never married, and of a strong Constitution of Body, and so probably he might be inclined to that Vice: But Probabilities are not always concluding; and therefore whether it be a true Accusation, or but a Slander, it may well be doubted; one base Son is spoken of, called Bertrannus, whom he advanced in Honour, and matched in a noble Family. But why should we look more for Particulars of his Incontinency, than of his Prodigality? For he was taxed no less for being prodigal, than for being incontinent; and yet for his Prodigality there is not so much as one Instance recorded, unless we take this for an Instance, that when his Chamberlain brought him a Pair of Hofs, which because they were new, he asked what they cost; and being told they cost three Shillings, in a great Chafe he threw them away; asking him if he thought a Pair of Hofs of three Shillings to be fit for a King to wear! Get thee gone (saith he) and let me have a Pair of a Mark. His Chamberlain went, and bringing him another Pair scarce so good as the former, and telling him they cost a Mark; I marry, (saith the King) these are something like, and was better satisfied with hearing what they cost, than with seeing what they were worth: And yet was this no Imputation to his Wisdom, for to say the truth, it is no Defect of Wisdom in a King to be ignorant what his Clothes are worth.

HE appointed a Disputation to be held between Christians and Jews, and before the Day came, the Jews brought the King a Present, to the end they might have an indifferent Hearing: The King took the Present, encouraging them to quit themselves like Men; and swore by St. Luke's Face (his usual Oath) that if they prevailed by Disputation, he would himself turn Jew, and be of their Religion. A young Jew on a time was converted to the Christian Faith, whose Father being much troubled at it, presented the King sixty Marks, intreating him to make his Son to return to his Judaism; whereupon the King sent for his Son, commanding him without more ado to return to the Religion of his Nation: But the young Man answer'd, he wonder'd his Majesty would use such Words: For being a Christian, he should rather persuade him to Christianity: With which Answer the King was so confounded, that he commanded the young Man to get him out of his Sight. But his Father finding the King could do no good upon his Son, required his Money again: Nay, saith the King, I have taken Pains enough for it; and yet that thou mayest see how kindly I will deal, you shall have one half, and the other half you cannot in Conscience deny me. There were fifty Gentlemen accused for hunting and killing the King's Deer, which they denied, and were therefore condemn'd to the Trial of Fire, which by God's merciful Judgment they passed through untouch'd; the King hearing it, and deceived of the Confiscation expected, is said in a great Chafe to say, How happens this? Is God a just Judge in suffering it? Now a murrain take him that believes it. It seems also he doubted in many Points of Religion then in credit: For he would often protest, that he believed not that Saints could profit any Man in God's Sight, and therefore neither would he, nor any other that were wise, (as he affirmed) make Intercession either to Peter, or to any other, for Help.

THE King claimed the Investiture of Bishops to be his Right, and forbade Appeals and Intercourse to Rome: For Appeals had been seldom used, till Anselm in this King's Reign appealed to the Pope; upon whose Complaint the Pope was about to excommunicate the King; but having a little before excommunicated the Emperor Henry the Fourth, he forbore at that time to do it; lest by making Excommunication common, he should make it be slighted. At this Time great Contention arose between the King and Archbishop Anselm; and Anselm not yielding to the King in any Point prejudicial to the Pope's Authority, nor the King yielding to Anselm in any Point prejudicial to his own Prerogative, (which were Points indeed incompatible) the Contention continued long and hot, and the hotter, because there were at that time two Popes on foot at once; one elected by the Conclave, called Urbanus the Second; another set up by the Emperor, called Clement the Third: For Anselm held with Urban, the King with Clement: And thus not agreeing in a third, it was impossible they should agree between themselves.

A.D. 1098. selves. And this Contention, tho' palliated with Pretensions, sometimes of one side, sometimes of another; yet brake out again, and was renewed both in this King's Time, and in the Time of many Kings after. Anselm often threatening his going to Rome, the King told him plainly he would not thrust him out of the Realm, but if he would go without his Leave, he would then keep him out during his Pleasure; and besides, he should carry nothing out of the Realm with him. Yet Anselm ventured it, and the King performed it; for William Warlewast was sent to riste him in his Passage at Sea of all he had, neither suffered to return as long as the King lived; during all which time, the King took the Profits of his Archbishoprick to his own Use. It may not be amiss to shew a Passage here concerning the first Cause of Contention between the King and Anselm, which some say was this: The King required a thousand Marks of him for having preferred him to that See; which Anselm refused to give, as judging it no less Simony to give after the Preferment, than before: But yet afterward offering five hundred Pounds, the King refused to accept it, as being worth (he said) five times as much; whereupon Anselm told him, Your Grace may have me and all that is mine, to serve your Turn in a friendly manner; but in the way of Servitude and Bondage, you shall neither have me nor mine. Which Words so angered the King, that they could never after be reconciled. In this King's Reign Pope Urban exhorted all Christian Princes to join together for Recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land: And by the soliciting of Peter an Hermite, they assembled for that Enterprize, under the Conduct of Godfrey of Bulloigne, to the Number of three hundred thousand Men; amongst whom was Robert Duke of Normandy, who so valiantly carried himself in the Action, that after Jerusalem was won, the Kingdom of it (as some write) was offered to him: But he looking more after the Kingdom of England, and therefore refusing it, it is observed he never prospered all his Life after. In this King's Reign, altho' he had no Command in Ireland, yet their Bishop of Dublin was sent over to Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, to be consecrated by him; and the Citizens of Waterford also desiring to have a Bishop, procured Mercherdach King of Ireland, to write to Anselm, to give his Consent. Also in this King's Days the Pope forbade the Marriage of Priests.

THE King gave the Monks of Southwark the Church of St. Saviour of Bermonsey, and Bermonsey itself: He also founded at York the Hospital of St. Leonard's: He gave the Church of St. Peter in the City of Bathe to be a Bishop's See. Hugh Earl of Chester, in this King's Days, builded the Abbey of Chester: Oswald Bishop of Salisbury, founded the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, to the end his Bishoprick might be removed to Lincoln, began to build A.D. 1098. the Cathedral Church of Lincoln; and Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury builded two Hospitals without the City; the one of St. John, the other at Harbaldown; repaired Christ's Church, and caused five and twenty Manors to be restored to that See, which had unjustly been withholden. He repaired also the Abbey of St. Albans, and the Church of Rocheſter, where for four secular Priests he placed to the Number of fifty Monks. In the sixth Year of this King's Reign, William Warren the first Earl of Surrey, (who came with Duke William into England) and Gundred his Wife, founded the Abbey of Lewis in Suffex. In his twelfth Year, Robert Loſaunge Bishop of Thetford, removed his See from Thetford to Norwich, and founded there a fair Monastery.

THIS King enlarged the Tower of London, and compassed it with new Walls: He also built the great Hall at Westminster, being 270 Foot in length, and 74 in breadth; but thinking it too little, he intended to have built another Hall which should have stretched from the Thames to the King's-street. He repaired the City and Castle of Carlisle, which had been waſted by the Danes two hundred Years before; and because it had but few Inhabitants, he brought a Colony thither out of the Southern Parts. He finished New-Castle upon Tyne, and many other Castles erected or repaired upon the Borders of Scotland; many also upon the Frontiers, and within the very Breast of Wales.

Casualties happening in his Reign.

IN the fourth Year of his Reign, on St. Luke's Day, above 600 Houses in London were thrown down with Tempest, and the Roof of St. Mary-le-Bow Church in Cheapside, was so rased, that in the Fall six of the Beams, being twenty seven Foot long, were driven so deep into the Ground, (the Streets being not then paved with Stone) that not above four Foot remained in Sight, and yet stood in such Rank and Order as the Workmen had placed them upon the Church. Also in this King's Reign all the Lands in Kent, sometimes belonging to Earl Godwyn, were by breaking in of the Sea covered with Sands, and are called Godwyn's Sands to this Day. In his eleventh Year, at a Town called Finchamstead in the County of Berks, a Well cast out Blood, as before it had done Water; and after by the space of fifteen Days, great Flames of Fire were seen in sundry Places, and at sundry Times.

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was but mean of Stature, thick and square bodied, his Belly swelling somewhat round, his Face was red, his Hair deep yellow, whereof he was called Rufus; his Forehead four square like a Window; his Eyes spotted, and not one like another; his Speech unpleasant and stammering, especially when he was moved with Anger. A strange Fall. The Streets in this King's Time not paved with Stone.

Godwyn's Sands in Kent.

A.D. 1098. cerning the Qualities of his Mind, they may best be known by looking upon the Actions of his Life; in which we shall find he was never more assured, than when he was least sure; never less dejected, than when in most Extremity; being like a Cube, that which way soever he fell, he was still upon his Bottom. For his Delights to pass the Time, there was none in more Request with him than Hunting, a Delight hereditary to him; which was the Cause that as his Father had begun the great New Forest, so he enlarged it to a far greater Extent. Other Delights of his we find not any, unless we shall reckon his Wars for Delights; for tho' they were oftentimes forced upon him, when he could not avoid them; yet sometimes he enter'd into them when he needed not, but for his Pleasure. And in general, it may be said that one of his greatest Virtues, was that which is one of the greatest Virtues, Magnanimity; and his worst Vice, was that which is the worst of Vices, Irreligion.

Presages that preceded his Death.

No Warning can prevent Destiny.

AT Finchamstead in Berkshire, near unto Abington, a Spring cast up Liquor for the space of fifteen Days, in Substance and Colour like to Blood. The Night before the King was kill'd, a certain Monk dreamed that he saw the King gnaw the Image of Christ Crucified with his Teeth; that as he was about to bite away the Legs of the same Image, Christ with his Feet spurned him down to the Ground; and that as he lay on the Earth, there came out of his Mouth a Flame of Fire, with abundance of Smoak. This being related to the King by Robert Fitz Mammon, he made a Jest of it, saying, This Monk would fain have something for his Dream: Go, give him a hundred Shillings, but bid him look that he dream more auspicious Dreams hereafter. Also the same Night, the King himself dreamed that the Veins of his Arms were broken, and that the Blood issued out in great abundance; and many other like Passages there were, by which it seems he had Friends somewhere, as well as Julius Cæsar, that did all they could to give him warning: But that, as Cæsar's, so his malus Genius would not suffer him to take.

KING William having kept his Christmas at Glocester, his Easter at Winchester, his Whitsuntide at Westminster; notwithstanding forewarned by many Signs of some great Disaster toward him, would needs the Day after Lammas, go a hunting in the New Forest;

yet something resenting the many Passages, A.D. 1098. he staying within all the Forenoon: About Dinner-time an Artificer came and brought him six Cross-Bow Arrows, very strong and sharp; whereof four he kept himself, and the other two he delivered to Sir Walter Tyrrel, a Knight of Normandy, his Bow-Bearer, saying, Here Tyrrel, take you two, for you know how to shoot them to purpose: And so having at Dinner drank more liberally than his Custom, as it were in Contempt of Presages, out he rides into the New Forest, where Sir Walter Tyrrel shooting at a Deer, at a Place called Charingham, (where since a Chapel hath been erected) the Arrow glanced against a Tree, or as some write, grazed upon the Back of the Deer; and flying forward, hit the King upon the Breast; with which he instantly fell down dead. Thus it is delivered by a common Consent of all; only one Sugerus, a Writer that lived at that Time, and was a familiar Acquaintance of the said Tyrrel's, against the Current of all Writers, affirms, that he had often heard the said Sir Walter swear, that he was not in the Forest with the King all that Day. I have been the longer upon this Point, because a more pregnant Example of God's Judgment remains not any where upon Record. For not only this King at this Time, but before this, a Brother of his named Richard, a young Prince of great Hope, and also a Nephew of his, the Son of his Brother Robert, came all in this Place to violent Deaths; that altho' K. William the Founder of the Forest escaped the Punishment in his own Person, yet it was doubled and trebled upon him in his Issue. Thus died K. William Rufus, in the three and fortieth Year of his Age, and twelfth and some Months of his Reign: His Body was drawn in a Collier's Cart, with one Horse, to the City of Winchester, where the Day following it was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Swithine, and was laid there in the Quire under a Marble Stone; till afterwards it was translated, and laid by K. Canutus's Bones.

Men of Note in his Time.

FOR Men of Valour, he must stand alone by himself: For Men of Learning, there was Lanfrank, a Lombard, but Bishop of Canterbury; also Robert, a Lorain, who epitomized the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus: Also Turgotus an English-man, Dean of Durham, who wrote the Annals of his own Time, and divers other Works; but especially Osmond Bishop of Salisbury, who composed the Ordinary Office, or Book of Prayer.

King Henry the First.

A.D. 1100.

ALTHO' Henry came not to the Crown, as his Brother William did, by the Gift of his Father, yet he came to it by the Prophecy of his Father; for when his Father made his Will, and divided all his Estate in Land between his two eldest Sons, giving to Henry his youngest only a Portion in Money, with which Division he perceived him to be much discontented, he said unto him, Content thy self Harry, for the Time will come, that thy Turn shall be served as well as theirs. And now the Time was come that his Prediction was accomplished; for on the fifth of August, in the Year 1100, he was crowned King of England at Westminster by Maurice Bishop of London, (as Dean of all the Bishops of England, and therefore might do it without any Prejudice to the Archbishop of Canterbury, tho' he had been present, who was indeed at this time in Exile.) But tho' it appears, su-isse in Fatis, to be decreed by the Divine Providence that it should be so; yet it would not have been so, if his own Endeavours had not been concurring. And therefore being in the New Forest when his Brother King William was killed, he never stayed to complement the Disaster, but rode presently to Winchester; and there, not without some Opposition of the Keepers, seized upon his Brother's Treasure, as knowing Treasure to be the means of getting of Friends, and Friends the means for getting the Crown; and having now gotten the first Means, he made use of it for the second; and both of them together brought him to this he is. Yet withal there were Circumstances in his own Person that conduced to it; his Brother was born when their Father was but a Duke, he, when he was a King; Robert but a Foreigner, being born in Normandy; himself a Native, born at Selby in Yorkshire: And it was not the least Circumstance that he was called Beauclerk, as much as to say, a good Scholar, having been bred in Cambridge; not perhaps that his Learning was so great, but that it was great, either in respect of that Age which had but little, or in respect of his Brothers, who had none at all; and the People having been oppressed before, by the ill Government of two Kings that were illiterate, could not chuse but be glad to come under the Government of a King that was learned. And tho' his Brother Robert, as being the elder, had Right unto it; yet he, as out of Sight was out of Mind, and perhaps neglected, as being himself negligent: Withal it was given out, that he was chosen King of Jerusalem, and therefore no looking for him to come home; and to give Force to all these Reasons, Henry Newborough Earl of Warwick was a principal Furtherer.

IT is a hard matter to keep that safely, which is unjustly gotten; and therefore he took all possible Care to overcome that Hardness, which he effected by these Means: First he called Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury home from Exile; placed William Gifford, a learned Man, in the Bishoprick of Winchester; and Monasteries that had been long vacant, he furnished with good Abbots. And because it is no less pleasing to the People to have bad Instruments punished, than the good to be advanced, he cast Ralph Bishop of Durham (a principal Cause of their late Oppressions) into Prison, then mitigated the Rigor of the new Laws, and promised Restitution of the old. And that there might be no Abuse in Measures, he ordained a Measure made by the Length of his own Arm, which is called a Yard. He restored to his Subjects the Use of Lights and Fire in the Night, which before had been forbidden after eight a Clock at Night. He acquitted the People from the Tax of Dane-gilt, and from all other unjust Payments which had been imposed upon them by the two former Kings. He gave free Liberty to the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, to enclose Parks for Deer, and Warrens for Conies, and such like Game. And because he knew Scotland might be an ill Neighbour to him, if not tied by some Bond, and none so sure as the Bond of Alliance; he therefore takes Matild, Sister of the present King Edgar, to be his Wife.

A.D. 1100. that had by this King been committed to the Tower, made an Escape, and passing over to Duke Robert in Normandy, incenseth him not to suffer himself to be baffled by a younger Brother; as for his Brother William there was some Reason, because his Father had given him the Kingdom by his Will; but what could Henry pretend, who had his Portion given him in Money? Besides, it was an Agreement with his Brother William, with Consent of all the Lords of the Realm, that the Survivor of them should succeed. With such like Instigations, and withal assuring him, there were many in England would take his part, he easily persuaded the Duke to that, from which he could hardly have dissuaded him. Who thereupon with a convenient Army puts to Sea, and lands at Portsmouth, while Henry waited for his coming about Hastings; and being landed there, much People resorted to him, that it was like to have been a bloody Business; but by Mediation of Friends, working upon the flexible Nature of Duke Robert, it was brought at last to this Agreement, That K. Henry should pay to Duke Robert three thousand Marks yearly, and Duke Robert should succeed him in the Kingdom, if he survived. And thus this Cloud, that threatned so great a Storm, brought with it rather Sun-shine, and fair Weather; for now to his possession of the Kingdom, there was added a Right, and he might now justify his being a King, without any Scandal or Usurpation. After this another little Cloud arose, but was soon dispersed; for Robert de Belsam, Earl of Shrewsbury, a rash young Man of Disposition, but more through Discontentment, though discontented for nothing, but that having a great Estate he was not a King as well as some others, fortified the Town of Shrewsbury, and the Castle of Bridgenorth, and got many Welshmen to assist him; but the King coming with a mighty Army, so terrified the Welsh, that they abandoned the Earl, and left him a Prey to the King in his Person, and more in his Estate; for the King seized his Estate into his Hands, but for his Person he only banish'd it the Realm. For as yet the shedding of Blood, and putting to Death, though for great treasonable Practices, was not much in Use: Policy of State was not yet grown to that height of Severity. The like Attempt, and upon the like Occasion, was made by William Earl of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England, Uncle to the King, only for denying him the Earldom of Kent; which because he could not obtain, he entred into treasonable Practices, by which he lost the Earldoms he had before. But these Troubles were but as the Labour of a Woman, that is safely delivered, painful for a Time but ended in Joy; and indeed for the most part, this King had the Fortune to be a Gainer by his Losses.

he released to K. Henry the three thousand Marks which he was yearly to pay him. But returning into Normandy, and considering better what he had done, he so repented him, that he spared not to give out, that his Brother had directly cozened him. Which coming to K. Henry's Ear, so incensed him, that he presently sent over a mighty Army, which foraged the Countrey, and wone many Towns, and Cities, and soon after went over himself; where he so prevailed, that he left Duke Robert but only Roan in all Normandy to put his Head in; and this done, returns into England. And now Duke Robert begins to be sensible of his own Weakness, and therefore comes over into England to try the uttermost of his Brother's good Nature. Himself had sent him a Tun of Wine to refresh him withal, when in Siege he was ready to perish for want of Water: And it cannot be but that Gratefulness and natural Affection meeting together, must needs work something in the Mind of a Brother. Thus resolved, he presents himself to the King, referring both his Dukedom and himself, and all Differences and Debates to his Will and Pleasure. But whether incensed with the scandalous Words Duke Robert had given out of him, or whether aspiring to join Normandy to England, as his Father had done before, K. Henry scarce vouchsafed to hear him speak, at least vouchsafed not to make him any Answer, but in a fullen manner turned away, and so left him: which scornful Usage put the Duke in such Indignation, that he resolved to set his whole State at stake, and either to redeem his Disgrace, or to forfeit his Life. So returning into Normandy, he used all his Force in raising of Forces; but K. Henry suspecting his Intentions, and not using to give Insurrections time to ripen, came upon him so suddenly with a mighty Army, that he drew him to a Battel before he was half ready to fight. In which Battel K. Henry received sundry Stripes on the Head at the Hands of one William Crispine, Count de Eureux; so as the Blood burst out of his Mouth: Yet nothing abashed, he struck down divers of his Enemies, and particularly the said Crispine who was there taken Prisoner at the King's Feet. And now Desire of Revenge so animated the Duke, and the Duke his Soldiers, that never Battel was more fiercely fought, and the Normans seemed at first to have the better; till K. Henry shewing himself in the Army, put such Courage into his Soldiers, that they quickly made good the Advantage they had in Number, and King Henry obtained a compleat Victory, both in Slaughter of Men, (of whom there were slain above ten thousand) and in taking of Prisoners (to the Number of four hundred:) amongst whom, besides other great ones, as the Earl of Mortaigne, William Crispine, and William Ferrers, was Duke Robert himself, whom the King (having first taken Order for all things, in his new State of Normandy) brought over with him into England, and committed him to the Castle of Cardiffe in Wales, where he remained a Prisoner till he died, used for a great

A.D. 1107. a time with reasonable Liberty for Recreation, till attempting to make an Escape, it was thought fit to put out his Eyes; which though it increased his Misery, yet it shortened not his Life, for he lived many Years after, in all, from the Time of his first Imprisonment, eight and twenty. And thus this great Duke, who in his Birth was the Joy of Nature, in his Life was the Scorn of Fortune; and it is not unworthy the observing, that the English wone Normandy the very same Day fortieth Year the Normans had wone England. Such Revolutions of Fortune there are in Kingdoms, and so unstable is the State of all worldly Greatness. He died A.D. 1134, and lies buried at Glocester. Matth. Westmin. writes that K. Henry his Brother sent him, according to his custom, a Robe of Scarlet; and putting it first on himself, perceived the Capouch to be somewhat strait: whereupon he said, Carry this Garment to my Brother, for his Head is less than mine. The Messenger delivering the Robe, Duke Robert demanded if any had worn it; and being told him the King had first assayed it, and what Speeches he had used, the Duke replied, I have now too long protracted a miserable Life, since my Brother is so injurious to me, that he sends me his old Clothes to wear; and from that time would never eat any Meat, nor receive any Comfort.

And now is K. Henry as great as ever his Father was; and as Greatness draws Envy, as much envied as ever his Father was; and as Envy makes Enemies, as much opposed as ever his Father was. For now Fulk Earl of Anjou, and Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, upon small Occasions, and Lewis the Gross King of France, upon none but such as Envy suggested, seeking to place William, Son to Duke Robert, in his Right to Normandy, assaulted the King's Dominions, perhaps to try whether Greatness had not made him unwieldy; but K. Henry, to shew that Greatness had made him more active, went over into Normandy with a mighty Army, and at Nice encountered the French King, where a bloody Battel was fought, with exceeding Valour on both Sides: But at last K. Henry repelled the French King, and recovered Nice; and after many other Conflicts between them, with Variety of Fortune, at last the King

A.D. 1112. made Peace with the Earl of Anjou, confirmed by a Marriage of the Earl's Daughter with his Son William; and upon this also the two Kings grew to a Peace, in which William, Son to K. Henry, being about seventeen Years of Age, was invested into the Duchy of Normandy, doing Homage for the same to the King of France. From whence it was afterwards a Custom, that the King of England's eldest Son (as long as Normandy remained in their Hands) was made always Duke of Normandy. After this, Charles Earl of Flanders being slain at Bruxels by a Conspiracy of his own People, and leaving no Issue behind him, Lewis King of France invested William, Son to Duke Robert, in the Earldom of Flanders, descended from Earl Baldwyn, whose Daughter Maude was Wife to King

So as William now having gotten this Step of Advancement, seeks to go on, and to recover Normandy, and was thereof by the Assistance of the King of France in a fair Possibility, when in a certain light Conflict, receiving a Wound in his Hand, the Thread of his fair Possibility was upon a sudden cut off; and of that light Wound he shortly after died.

William, Son to Duke Robert, is wounded, and dieth.

King Henry now in perfect Peace abroad, was not without some little Disquietings at home; and marching through Powysland in South Wales to repress some Insurrections of the Welsh, he came to certain Straits, where his main Army could not pass, in which Place the King was smitten with an Arrow full upon the Breast, whereat he swore by our Lord's Death (his usual Oath) that it was no Welsh Arm had shot that Arrow; yet in his Distress, for a thousand Head of Cattel, he had the passage left open, and came safely off; and these were his Troubles of Arms, both at home and abroad, during all his Reign.

His Taxations and Ways for raising of Money.

TOWARDS the Marriage of his Daughter Maude with the Emperor, he obtained at his first Parliament at Salisbury, three Shillings upon every Hide of Land throughout the Kingdom; which was afterwards drawn to Custom, to receive Aid from the Subjects whenever the King gave his eldest Daughter in Marriage. Besides this, he had no more in all his Reign, but only one Supply for his Wars in France; but he kept Bishopricks and Abbies void in his Hands; and that of Canterbury, five Years together. By an Act of Parliament, or rather by a Synod of Bishops holden at London, he was authorized to punish Marriage and Incontinency of Priests, which the Bishops afterwards repented; for he suffered Priests to have Wives for Fines; or rather took Fines of them whether they had Wives or no, because they might have them if they would. Punishments which before this Time were Mutilation of Member, he made Pecuniary. And the Provisions of his House, which were used to be paid in kind, were in his Time rated at certain Prices, and received in Money. By this Chapter and the next before, it appears there were in this King's Days but few Troubles at home, nor but few Taxations, whereof the one may be thought to be the Cause of the other; the first perhaps of the second, but certainly the second of the first.

Punishments made pecuniary. His Rents paid now in Money.

Laws first instituted in his Time.

HE first instituted the Form of the High Court of Parliament; for before his Time, only certain of the Nobility and Prelates of the Realm were called to consultation about the most important Affairs of State: But he caused the Commons also to be assembled, by Knights and Burgeses of their own Appointment, and made the Court to consist of three Parts, the Nobility, the Clergy, and the Common People, representing the whole Body of the Realm, and

Other Orders of that Court he ordained, as they are in Use at this Day. The first Council of this sort was held at Salisbury, on the nineteenth Day of April, in the sixteenth Year of his Reign. He forbade the wearing of long Hair, which at that Time was frequent, after the manner of the French. He commanded Robbers upon the Highway to be hanged without Redemption; of whom a famous one at that Time was one Dunne, and of him the Place where he most used, by reason of the great Woods thereabout, is to this Day called Dunstable, where the King built the Burrough as now it standeth. Counterfeiters of Money he punished with pulling out their Eyes, or cutting off their privy Members, a Punishment both less than Death, and greater.

Long Hair forbidden.

Contentions between the King and the Pope about Investiture of Bishops.

AT his first coming to the Crown, he forbore his Claim to the Investitures of Bishops; but after he had been King some time, he claimed, that both to invest Bishops, and to allow, or hinder Appeals to Rome, belonged to him. In these Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, who was now returned into England, opposed him; affirming that both of them belonged to the Pope. The Contention at last was brought to the Pope, to whom King Henry sent William Warlewast, elect Bishop of Exeter, who saying to the Pope that his Master would not for the Crown of his Realm, lose the Authority of investing his Prelates; the Pope started up, and answered, Neither will I lose the disposing of Spiritual Promotions in England, for the King's Head that wears the Crown; before God (saith he) I avow it. So the Contention grew long and hot, and many Messengers were sent to and fro about it: The Conclusion was (which proved no Conclusion) That the King should receive Homage of the Bishops elect, but should not invest them by Staff and Ring: To which the King said nothing for the present, but forbore not to do it ever the less. For five Years after the Death of Anselm, Ralph Bishop of Rocheſter, was by the King made Archbishop of Canterbury, and not withstanding all former Decrees and Threatnings of the Pope, he received his Investiture of the King. About this time a Council of Bishops was held at London, at which the Temporal Lords were present, to the end that the Decree of the Council might be confirmed by both Orders. If any Man desire to know more of the Passages between the King and Anselm, and of the many great Virtues of Anselm, let him read Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who was his Secretary, and hath written of purpose to set forth his Praises. About this Time, a Canon was made against the Marriage of Priests, to which purpose Johannes Cremenſis, a Priest Cardinal, by the King's License came into England, and held a solemn Synod at London, where A.D. 1112. inveighing sharply against it, affirming it to be no better than professed Adultery, he was himself the Night following taken in Bed with a common Harlot. Even Anselm himself the most earnest Enforcer of single Life, died not it seems a Virgin; for else he would never in his Writings make such Lamentation for the Loss thereof. A little before this, Anselm being at Roan, Boemundus, one of the chief Princes that had been at Jerusalem, came thither; and amongst other Holy Reliques, gave unto him certain Hairs of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which Anselm held always in great Veneration. About this time Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, held a Council at Westminster, where divers Constitutions were made; of which these were two, That Priests should no more be suffered to have Wives; and that there should be no more buying and selling of Men in England, which was hitherto accustomed, as if they had been Kine or Oxen. Anselm about this time dying at the Age of seventy six Years, Rodolph succeeded in the See of Canterbury, but not till five Years after the Death of Anselm; and Thomas dying, Thurſtane succeeded him in the Archbishoprick of York; between which two Prelates there arose great Contention. Rodolph would not consecrate Thurſtane, unless he would profess Obedience; Thurſtane was content to embrace his Benediction, but profess Obedience he would not. In this Contention, the King takes part with Rodolph, the Pope with Thurſtane: after many passages in the Business, upon the Pope's threatening to excommunicate the King, Thurſtane entred upon his Bishoprick, and the King connived. In the tenth Year of his Reign, the Abbey of Ely was made a Bishop's See, and Cambridgeſhire was appointed for the Diocese thereof, which because it belonged before to the Jurisdiction of Lincoln, the King gave the Bishop of Lincoln, in Recompence thereof, the Mannor of Spalding. This King also created a Bishoprick at Carlisle, and endowed it with many Honours. In his Time, the Order of the Templers began. In the twenty seventh Year of his Reign, the Grey-Fryers by the Procurement of the King, came first into England, and had their first House builded at Canterbury. Also in this King's Time, the first Legat to supply the Pope's Room came into England, but as yet not admitted. I may here have leave to tell two Stories of Churchmen for refreshing of the Reader. Guymond the King's Chaplain, observing that unworthy Men, for the most part were advanced to the best Dignities of the Church; as he celebrated Divine Service before him, and was to read these words out of St. James, [It rained not upon the Earth III Years, and VI Months] he read it thus, It rained not upon the Earth one, one, one, Years, and five one Months. The King observed his Reading, and afterwards blamed him for it; but for Ignorance Guymond answered, That he did it of purpose, for that such Readers were soonest preferred by his Majesty. The King smiled,

The other is this, Thomas Archbishop of York falling sick, his Physicians told him, That nothing would do him good, but to company with a Woman; to whom he answered, That the Remedy was worse than the Disease, and so died a Virgin: This King granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to William and his Successors, the Custody of Constablenesship of the Castle of Rocheſter for ever.

The Error of Gilbertus Porretas were condemned in a Council holden at Rheims, by Pope Calixtus; also in his Time Innocentius and Anacletus contended for the Papacy, whereby a great Schism arose in the Church.

Works of Piety done by this King, or by others in his Time.

THIS King founded and erected the Priory of Dunstable, the Abbey of Cirenceſter, the Abbey of Reading, the New-Abbey without the Walls of Wincheſter, the Abbey of Windſor, with a College there: He made also the Navigable River between Torkſey and Lincoln, a Work of great Charge, but greater Use: His Wife Queen Maud, paſſing over the River of Lea, was ſomewhat endangered; whereupon ſhe cauſed two Stone Bridges to be built, one at the Head of the Town of Stratford, the other over another ſtream there, called Channel-Bridge, and paved the way between them with Gravel. She gave also certain Mannors, and a Mill called Wiggon-Mill, for repairing the ſame Bridges, and Way. Theſe were the firſt Stone Bridges that were made in England; and becauſe they were arched over like a Bow, the Town of Stratford was afterward called Bow. This Queen also founded the Priory of the Holy-Trinity, now called Chriſt's Church, within the East Gate of London, called Aldgate; and an Hoſpital of St. Giles's in the Fields, without the West part of the City. In this King's Time Jordan Briſet Baron, founded the Houſe of St. John of Jeruſalem near to Smithfield, in London, and gave fourteen Acres of Ground, lying in the field next to Clerkenwel, to build thereupon a Houſe of Nuns, wherein he with Muriel his Wife was buried in the Chapter-Houſe. Robert Fiſham, who came out of Normandy with the Conqueror, founded a new the Church of Teukeſbury, and was there buried. Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, founded the Cathedral Church there. The Priory and Hoſpital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, was founded by a Minſtel of the Kings, named Reior, who became the firſt Prior there. Before this time, Smithfield was a Loiſtal of all Ordure and Filth, and the Place where Felons were put to Execution. Hugh Lacy founded the Monastery of St. John at Lanſhony near to Gloceſter. Juga Baynard, Lady of little Dunmore, founded the Church there, and gave to maintain it half a Hide of Land. This Lady Juga was late Wife to Baynard, that firſt builded Baynard's Caſtle in London. Eudo the King's Sewer, founded the Monastery of St. John at Colcheſter, of black Canons, and thoſe were the firſt of that Order in England. Simon Earl of Northampton, and Maud his Wife, founded the Monastery of St. Andrew in Northampton. In the ſeventh Year of this King's Reign, the firſt Canons entred into the Church of our Lady in Southwark, called St. Mary-Overy, founded by William Pountlarge Knight, and William Dancies, Normans. Robert the firſt Earl of Gloceſter, the King's baſe Sone, builded the Caſtles of Briſtow and Cardyſſe, with the Priory of St. James in Briſtow; and his Son Earl William began the Abbey of Kenſham. Geoffery Clinton, Treafurer and Chamberlain to the King, founded the Priory at Kenelworth of Regular Canons. Henry Earl of Warwick and Margaret his Wife, founded the College of St. Mary, in the Town of Warwick; and Roger de Blemond, his Son, and Ellyne his Wife, tranſlated the ſame College into the Caſtle of Warwick, in the Year 1123. Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, built the Deviſes in Wiltſhire; the Caſtles also of Malmesbury and Shirborn. He repaired the Caſtle of Salisbury, and environed it with a Wall; he also built the ſtately Church of Salisbury, deſtined to a longer Life than any of his other Works. Ralph Biſhop of Durham began to build the Caſtle of Norham, upon the Bank of the River Tweed. In the two and thirtieth Year of this King's Reign, the Priory of Norton in Cheſhire, was founded by one William the Son of Nychel; and the Abbey of Cumbermere, in the ſame Shire. The College of Secular Canons also in the Caſtle of Leiceſter. Also in this King's Reign was founded the Monastery of Plimpton in Devonſhire, with the Cathedral Church of Exeter; the Priory of Merton, the Hoſpital of Kepar, the Priory of Osney near Oxford, by Robert de Oylve Knight; and the Hoſpital of St. Croſs near Wincheſter, by Henry Bloies Biſhop there: Also Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Merival. And indeed ſo many in his Time were built, that one would think the Inhabitants of England to be all Carpenters and Maſons, that were able to finiſh ſo many great Buildings in ſo ſhort a Time as this King's Reign.

IN this King's Days all the four Elements were guilty of doing much Miſchief, but chiefly the Water: For King Henry returning into England after his Conqueſt of Normandy, left his Son William with his Siſter Mary, Counteſs of Perche, Richard his Son by a Concubine, the Earl of Cheſter with his Wife Lucy, the King's Niece by his Siſter Adela, and other Lords and Ladies, and Paſſengers to the Number of 180, to follow after him; who taking Shipping, (and the beſt Ship the King had) whether by Careleſneſs, or Drunkenneſs of the Sailors, were all drowned. The Prince indeed was got into the Ship-boat, and out of Danger; but hearing the lamentable Cries of his Siſter, Compaſſion wrought ſo in him, that he turned

An Accident not more grievous than exemplary; for amongst other Conclusions, from hence we may gather, that no State is so uncertain as Prosperity, no Fall so sudden as into Adversity; and that the Rule [He that stands, let him take heed he fall not] cannot always be observed, because a Man happens sometimes to fall before it is possible for him to take heed. Another great Mischief was in this King's Days wrought by the Water: For by the breaking in of the Sea, a great part of Flanders was drowned; whereupon a great Number of Flemmings being Suitors to King Henry for some Place to inhabit, he assigned them a part in Wales near the Sea, called Pembroke-shire, where they have inhabited to this Day; the King by this one Action, working two good Effects, both shewing Compassion to distressed Strangers, and putting a Bridle upon unquiet Natives. But the Water had another way to do Mischief, as much by Defect, as this was by Excess; for upon the tenth of October, the River of Medway many Miles together did so fail of Water, that in the midst of the Channel, the smallest Vessels could not pass: and the same Day also in the Thames between the Tower of London and the Bridge, Men waded over on Foot for the Space of two Days: Also at another time the River of Trent at Nottingham was dried up a whole Day. Now for the Earth, tho' naturally it be without Motion, yet it moves sometimes when it is to do Mischief, especially being assisted by the Air; as in this King's Days it moved with so great a Violence, that many Buildings were shaken down; and Malmesbury faith, that the House wherein he fate, was lifted up with a double Remove, and at the third time settled again in the proper Place. Also in divers Places it yielded forth a hideous Noise, and cast forth Flames at certain Rifts many Days together, which neither by Water, nor by any other Means could be suppressed. But yet the active Element of Fire was busiest of all; for first, Chichester, with the principal Monastery was burnt down to the Ground. From West-Cheap in London to Aldgate, a long Tract of Buildings was consumed by Fire: Worcester also and Roche-ster, even in the King's Presence; then Winchester, Bathe, Glocester, Lincoln, Peterborough, and other Places, did also partake of this Calamity, that there could be no charging the Fire with any Partiality: And to speak of one foreign Casualty, because a strange one, in Lombardy this Year was an Earthquake that continued forty Days, and removed a Town from the Place where it stood, a great way off. In the thirteenth Year of this King, many Prodiges were seen; a Pig was farrowed with a Face like a Child, a Chicken was hatched with four Legs, and the Sun was so deeply eclipsed, that by the reason of the Darkness, many Stars did plainly appear. In this King's Time Gerard Archbishop of York, a Man tho' learned, yet of many ill Parts, sleeping one Day in his Garden after Dinner, never waked again, but was there found dead.

Of his Wives and Children.

AT his first coming to the Crown, he married Matild, or Maude, Sister to Edgar then King of Scotland, and Daughter to Malcolme by Margaret the Sister of Edgar Atheling. This Matild, if she were not a veiled Nun, she was at least brought up in a Nunnery, and thereby grown so averse from Marriage, that when the Motion was first made her to marry with K. Henry, she utterly refused it, and resolved, tho' perhaps not vowed, to die a Virgin; till at last importuned, and even forced by the Authority of her Brother, she rather yielded than consented: For she did it with so ill a Will, that it is said, she prayed, if ever she had Issue by the Marriage, that it might not prosper, and indeed it prospered but untowardly; as will be seen in the Sequel. But tho' she made this Imprecation before she knew what it was to be a Mother; yet when she came to be a Mother, she shewed her self no less loving and tender of her Children, than loyal and obsequious to her Husband. And to make amends for this seeming Impiety towards her Children, there is a Story related of her real Piety towards the Poor: For a Brother of hers coming one Morning to visit her in her Chamber, found her sitting amongst a Company of Lazar People, washing and dressing their Ulcers and Sores, and then kissing them after she had done; who wondering at it, and saying to her, How could she think the King would like to kiss that Mouth, which had kissed such filthy ulcerous People? She answered, she had a greater King to kiss, who she knew would like her never the worse for it. By this Queen Matild, K. Henry, according to some Writers, had four Children; but as the received Opinion is, only two, a Son named William, and a Daughter called Maude; of whom the Son at fourteen Years old had Fealty sworn to him by the Nobility at Sbrevesbury; at seventeen married the Daughter of Fulk Earl of Anjou; and at eighteen was unfortunately drowned, as hath been shewed. The Daughter lived to be an Empress, afterwards a Duchess, but could never come to be a Queen, though born to a Kingdom; as shall be shewed hereafter. She survived her second Husband seventeen Years living a Widow, and at Roan in Normandy died, and was buried there in the Abbey of Bec, though there be a Tradition that she was buried at Reading, in the Abbey there beside her Father; but it appears to have been a Custom in those Days, for great Personages to have their Monuments erected in divers Places. After the Death of this Queen Matild, who died at Westminster, in the eighteenth Year of his Reign, K. Henry married Adeliza, the Daughter of Godfrey Duke of Lorain, who tho' she were a beautiful Pembroke-shire assigned to the Flemings to inhabit.

Henry*, sitting crown'd in the Chair of State, asking him who had set the Crown upon his Head? The King answering, he had now forgotten, it was so long since; Well, said the Archbishop, who-soever did it, did me wrong to whom it belonged; and as long as you hold it thus, I will do no Office at this Coronation. Then (saith the King) do what you think good. Whereupon the Archbishop took the Crown off from the King's Head, and after at the Peoples Entreaty, set it on again, and then proceeded to crown the Queen. By Concubines K. Henry had many Children; it is said seven Sons, and as many Daughters; of whom some perished in the great Shipwreck. Of the rest, two of the Sons, Reynold and Robert, were made Earls; Reynold of Bristol, Robert of Glocester, and was a great Assister of his Sister Maude in her Troubles with K. Stephen, who after many Acts of Valour performed by him, in the twelfth Year of K. Stephen died, and was buried at Bristol. The Daughters were all married to Princes and Noblemen of England and France, from whom are descended many worthy Families: Particularly one of those Daughters by Anne Corbet, was married to Fitz Herbert, Lord Chamberlain to the King; from which Fitz Herbert, our Family (absit invidia verbo) is by Females descended; passing by the Names of Cummin, Chenduet, Brimpton, Stokes, Foxcote, Dynebey, and so to Baker and Barret.

Of his Incontinency.

OF this enough hath been said, in saying he had so many Children basely begotten: But if Comparison be made between his Brother Rufus and him, it may be said, that howsoever they might be equal in Looseness of Life; yet in that Looseness William Rufus was the baser, and K. Henry the more noble. For K. Henry had certain selected Concubines, to whom he kept himself constant, whereas K. William took only such as he found; constant to the Pleasure, but not to the Persons.

His Course for establishing the Succession in Maude and her Issue.

HE married his only Daughter Maude, being but six Years old, to the Emperor Henry the Fourth; but he leaving her a Widow without Issue, he married her again to Geoffery Plantagenet, Son to Fulk Duke of Anjou; not the greatest Prince that was a Suitor for her, but the fittest Prince for King Henry's Turn: For Anjou is neighbouring upon Normandy, a great Security to it, if a Friend; and as great a Danger, if an Enemy. And having thus placed her in Marriage, he now considers how to establish her Succession in the Crown of England: Whereupon he calls his Nobility together, and amongst them David King of Scots, and causeth them to give their Oaths of Allegiance to her and her Issue; as thinking he could never make her Succession sure enough: He causeth A.D. 1112. his Lords the Year after again to take the like Oath, and after that a third time also; as conceiving that being doubled and trebled, it would make the Tie of Allegiance the stronger: Wherein nothing pleased him so much, as that Stephen Earl of Blois was the first Man that took the Oath, because he was known to be, at least known he might be a Pretender. But the King should have considered, that Nulla fides Regni, and therefore no Oath, tho' never so often iterated, sufficient to warrant Loyalty in Persons so deeply interested as Stephen was: Yet Providence could do no more, and the King was well satisfied with it, especially when he saw his Daughter a Mother of two Sons: For this, tho' it gave him not Assurance, yet it gave him assured Hope to have the Crown perpetuated in his Posterity.

Of Ireland in his Time.

THE Kings of England as yet had nothing to do with Ireland, the Countrey was govern'd by its own Kings; and the People of both Nations, tho' they were Neighbours, yet divided by a rough Sea, but little acquainted: But now began Intercourse to be more frequented, and Mercherdach chief K. of the Irish, bore such awful Respect to K. Henry, that he would do nothing but by his Counsel, and with his Liking.

Mercherdach King of Ireland is much ruled by K. Henry.

Whom King Henry used as his Vicegerent in his Absence.

HE was absent sometimes in Normandy three or four Years together; during which Times, he committed commonly the Care of the Realm to Roger Bishop of Salisbury, a politick Prelate, and one as fit to be the second in Government, as K. Henry to be the first.

His Personage and Condition.

HE was a Person tall and strong, broad breasted, his Limbs well knit, and fully furnished with Flesh; his Face well fashioned, his Colour clear, his Eyes large and fair, his Eyebrows large and thick, his Hair black and somewhat thin towards his Forehead; his Countenance pleasant, specially when he was disposed to Mirth. A private Man, vilified and thought to have but little in him, but come to the Crown, never any Man shewed more excellent Abilities; so true is the Saying, Magistratus indicat virum. His natural Affection in a direct Line was strong, in an oblique but weak; for no Man ever loved Children more, nor a Brother less. Tho' a King in Act, yet he always acted not a King; but in Battels sometimes the part of a common Soldier, though with more than common Valour: As at a Battel King Henry's in France, where he so far hazarded himself, that tho' he lost not his Life, yet he lost his Blood. He delighted much in Beasts of foreign Countries, as in Lions, Leopards, Camels, and such like, for which he inclosed a Place at Woodstock of purpose to keep them.

Of his Death and Burial,

K. Henry surfeiteth of eating of a Lamprey.

A Discontent of Mind upon some Differences between him and his Son-in-law the Earl of Anjou, brought upon him a Distemper, which increased by eating, against his Physician's Advice, of a Lamprey, a Meat always pleasing to him, but never agreeing with him, and cast him into a Fever, which in few Days put a Period to his Life: So certain it is, that one intemperate Action is enough to overthrow the Temperance of a whole Life; as of this King Henry it is said, that he seldom did eat but when he was a hungry; never did drink but when he was a-thirst: Yet this but once yielding to his sensual Appetite, made him forfeit all Benefit of his former Abstinence, tho' some write he took his Death by a Fall off his Horse. He died upon the first of December at Night, in this Year 1135, when he had reigned five and thirty Years, lived threescore and seven. His Bowels, Brains and Eyes, were buried at Roan in Normandy where he died, the rest of his Body was stuffed with Salt, wrapped in Ox Hides, and brought over into England, and with honourable Exequies buried A.D. 1135. in the Monastery of Reading, which himself had founded. The Physician that took out his Brains, with the intolerable Stench, shortly after died. In this King Henry ended the Line of the Normans, as touching the Heirs the Norman Males; and then came in the French by the Title of Heirs General. The Line of the Norman Kings ends.

Men of Note in his Time.

MEN of Learning in his Time were many; first, Stephen Harding, a Benedictine Monk, who was Founder to the Cistercian Order. Then Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, who besides his Activeness in Matters of State, writ many great and learned Books. Then Walter Calene, Archdeacon of Oxford, who delivered a History written in the British Tongue, from Brute to Cadwallader, to Geoffery of Monmouth to translate; and added forty Years of his own Time. Also Florentius a Monk of Worcester, who writ De rebus Gestis Anglorum. Also Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who besides other Works, writ the History of his own Time, under the two Williams, and Henry the First.

THE REIGN OF King STEPHEN.

A.D. 1135.

K. Stephen is crowned.Upon what Reasons the Oath before taken to Maude was sighted.

AFTER the Decease of K. Henry, presently steps upon the Stage of Royalty, Stephen Earl of Boleyn, Son to Stephen Earl of Blois, by Adela Daughter of K. William the Conqueror; and tho' there were two other before him, Maude the Empress, and Theobald his elder Brother; she in a substantial Right, he in a colourable; yet taking Advantage of being primus occupans, the first Invader, (as being quickly here after K. Henry's Death, where the other staid lingring about other Affairs) he solicits all the Orders of the Realm, Bishops, and Lords, and People, to receive him for their Sovereign: Wherein besides his own large Promises, what greater Matters he would do for them all, he had also the Assistance of Henry his Brother, Bishop of Winchester, and the Pope's Legate; and of Roger Bishop of Salisbury, his great Friend, (two the most powerful Men at that Time in the State) who partly by Force of Reasons, but more indeed by Force than Reasons, procure the State to accept him for their King, and so upon St. Stephen's Day, in Anno 1135, he was crowned at Westminster, in the Prefence of but three Bishops, few of the Nobility, and not one Abbot, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, with great Solemnity. That which put a Scruple in Mens Minds, and made them averfe at first from K. Stephen, was the Oath they had taken to receive K. Henry's Daughter Maude to be their Queen after his Decease; but the Weight of this Scruple was somewhat abated, when it was urged, That no Precedent could be shewed, that ever the Crown had been set upon a Woman's Head. And Roger Bishop of Salisbury brought another Reason, because they had taken that Oath but upon Condition, that the King should not marry her out of the Realm without their Consents; and the King's having broken the Condition, was just Cause to nullify their Obligation. To which was added, That the Oath having been exacted by Authority, which is a kind of Force, it might have the Plea of Per minas, and therefore void. And yet more than all these, Hugh Bigot, sometime Steward to K. Henry, immediately after his Decease came over into England, and took a voluntary Oath before divers Lords of the Land, that he was present a little before K. Henry's Death, when he adopted and chose his Nephew Stephen to be his Successor, because his Daughter Maude A.D. 1135. had grievously at that time displeased him. But howsoever their Breach of Oath was thus palliated, it is certain that many of them, as well Bishops as other Lords, came afterward to an evil End, at least to many Calamities before their End.

What Course he took to establish himself in the Kingdom.

IT is a true Saying, Is rebus optime servatur Imperium, quibus paratur; and this was Stephen's Course, he got the Kingdom by Promises, and he establish'd it by Performances: He pleased the People with easing them of Taxes and Impositions: He pleased the Clergy with forbearing to keep Bishopricks and Abbies vacant, and with exempting them from the Authority of the temporal Magistrate: He pleased the Nobility with allowing them to build Castles upon their own Lands: He pleased the Gentry with giving them Liberty to hunt the King's Deer in their own Woods; and besides, with advancing many of them in Honours: And for his Brother Theobald, who being the elder, was before him in pretence to the Crown, he pleased him with a Grant to pay him 2000 Marks a Year. And then to strengthen himself abroad no less than at home, he married his Son Eustace to Constance a Daughter of Lewis King of France, which Alliance alone might be thought a sufficient Security against all Opposition. And yet one thing more which establish'd him more than these, at least these the more for this, That he had seized upon K. Henry's Treasure, which amounted to one hundred thousand Pounds, besides Plate and Jewels of inestimable Value, which he spent not in vain Riot, but employed to his best Advantage, both in procuring of Friends, and in levying of Soldiers out of Britany and Flanders.

He marries his Son Eustace to the K. of France's Daughter.

K. Henry had left a hundred thousand Pounds in ready Money.

Of his Troubles in his Reign.

THERE may well be made a Chapter of the Troubles of his Reign, seeing his whole Reign was in a manner but one continued Trouble, at least no longer Intermission than as to give him Breath against new Encounters; till at last, when he grew towards his last, he rather left to be in Trouble, than was at quiet, being forced to make his Adversary his Heir, and to leave his Crown to him that had fought his Life. For he was no

A.D. 1139. no sooner set in his Chair of State, but he was presently disquieted and made to rise, by the Provocation of David King of Scots, who solicited by some Lords of England, but chiefly by Maude the Emperess (whose Right he had sworn to defend) with a mighty Army enter'd Northumberland, took Carlisle and New-Castle, and was proceeding further, till K. Stephen with a greater Army coming against him, yet rather bought his Peace than won it. For, to recover New-Castle out of his Hands, he was fain to let K. David hold Cumberland, and his Son Henry the Earldom of Huntington, as their Inheritance, for which, the Father would not for his, as being engaged, but the Son for him as being free, did Homage to K. Stephen.

Upon a Bruit of K. Stephen's Death, the Lords possess themselves of several Castles.

No sooner was this Trouble over, but he was presently under another; for being fallen somewhat ill at Ease, it was bruited abroad that he was dead; which so distracted Mens minds, that every one thought it Wisdom to shift for himself; and the great Lords made a contrary Use of Castles, to that which King Stephen intended, when he gave Liberty to build them; for the King intended them for his own Defence against his Enemies, and they made Use of them in their own Defence against the King; for now Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk possessed himself of Norwich, Baldwyn Rivers of Oxford, and Robert Quessquerius of other Castles. In these Difficulties King Stephen, tho' he could not in Person be in all Places at once, yet in Care he was, and there most, where was most Danger, imploying others against the rest. Against Baldwyn he went himself, whom driven before out of Oxford, and gotten to the Isle of Wight, the King followed and drove him from thence, and at last into Exile.

Geoffery Duke of Anjou enters into Normandy, but is compounded withal.

And now England afforded him once again to take a little Breath; but then Normandy presently begins with him afresh: For now Geoffery Plantagenet Duke of Anjou, in right of Maude his Wife, enters upon his Towns there, and seeks to get Possession of the Countrey: When King Stephen passed over with an Army, and arrests his Proceedings; and after some small Defeats of his Enemies, brings the matter at last to a pecuniary Composition, he to pay the Duke 5000 marks a Year, and the Duke to relinquish his Claim to Normandy. This done he returns into England, where new Commotions are attending him. For the Lords in his Absence, resenting his Breach of Promises, upon which they had admitted him to the Crown, make Use every one of their Castles, and stand upon their Guard: The Lord Talbot held Hereford; Earl Robert Maude's Brother, Bristol; William Lovell, the Castle of Cary; Paganell, the Castle of Ludlow; William Moune, the Castle of Dunster; Robert of Nichol, now called Lincoln, the Castle of Warham; Eustace, the Son of John, the Castle of Melton; William, the Son of Alan, the Castle of Sbrewsbury; and withal David King of Scots, neither regarding his former Agreement enters Northumberland with an

Army, committing so great Cruelty, in ravishing of Maids, murdering of Infants, slaughtering of Priests, even at the Altar, that never any barbarous Nation committed greater. Thus the Kingdom from one end to the other was in Combustion; that if the King had had as many Hands as Briareus, there would have been Work enough for them all. Yet all this dismay'd not the King, but as having learned this Lesson, Tu ne cede malis sed contra audentior ito, grows the more in Confidence, the less he was in Assurance; and as if Danger was the Fuel of Courage, the more erected in himself, the less he was upheld by others; and so, venturing what his Rebels at home would do in his Absence, he passeth himself in Person against David King of Scots, as being most dangerous, and therefore the first to be repressed: But finding it hard to draw him to a Battel, and impossible without a Battel to do any good upon him, he leaves the Care of that Quarrel to Thurstone Archbishop of York, and returns himself home, if it may be called home, where he scarce had a safe Place to put his Head in. But tho' many Lords were rebellious against him, yet some there were that stuck firmly to him, by whose Assistance and his own Industry, partly by Inticements, partly by Inforcements, he reduced most of them to Obedience, and all of them to Submission. When in the mean time Thurstone Archbishop of York, and in his Sickness, Ralph Bishop of Durham, assisted with William Earl of Aumerle, William Piperell of Nottingham, and Hubert de Lacy, fought a memorable Battle against David King of Scots, wherein tho' K. David himself, and his Son Henry performed wonderful Acts of Prowess, yet the English got the Victory with the slaughter of 11000 Scots in the Fight, besides many other slain in the Fight; where of the English none of account were slain but only a Brother of Hubert Lacy's, and some small Number of common Soldiers. This Victory infinitely pleased and comforted King Stephen, who not long after to make an absolute Suppression of the Scots, passeth again with an Army, and inforceth King David to demand a Peace, delivering his Son Henry into King Stephen's Hands for a Pledge, and coming homeward, by the way he besieged Ludlow, one of the Rebels Nests, where Prince Henry of Scotland had been taken Prisoner, if King Stephen in his own Person had not rescued him.

He goes in Person against the King of Scots.

The Rebel Lords are reduced to Obedience.

Eleven thousand Scots slain, and but very few English.

K. Stephen's good Nature and Valour.

After this, once again the King got a little breathing time, but it was to prepare him for greater Encounters. For now Maude the Emperess her self in Person comes into Play, in whom the Oath before taken was to have its Trial; for till now, tho' never so really intended, yet it could not actually be performed; for how could they receive her for Queen, who came not in Place to be received? But now that she came in Person, now was the Time of Trial how the Oath would work; and work it did indeed with many, and that strongly. For Maude coming

The Emperess Maude comes now into England, and hath many Adherents.

A.D. 1141. ing into England with Robert Earl of Gloucester her base Brother, was most joyfully received at Arundel Castle, by William de Aubigny, who had married Abeliza the Queen Dowager of the late King Henry, and had the said Castle and Countrey assigned for her Dower. King Stephen having Intelligence hereof, cometh to Arundel Castle with an Army, and besiegeth it; but either diverted by Council, or else finding the Castle to be inexpugnable, he left the Siege, and suffered the Empress to pass to Bristow. The King hearing that Ranulph Earl of Chester, Son-in-Law to Robert Earl of Gloucester, had possess'd himself of the City of London, thither he goeth with an Army, and besiegeth it: Thither also came the said Earl of Chester, and Robert Earl of Gloucester to raise the Siege; at which time a most fierce Battel was fought between them upon Candlemas Day; wherein as it is memorable what Wonders of Valour King Stephen performed; for when all Men about him were either fled or slain; yet he kept the Field himself alone, no Man daring to come near him, Horrentibus inimicis incomparabilem ictuum ejus immanitatem, saith Hoveden: Yet overmastered at last by Multitude, he was taken Prisoner, and brought to Maude the Empress; who sent him to be kept in safe Custody in the Castle of Bristow, where he remained till All-hallowtide after. And now the Empress having gotten King Stephen into her Hands, she takes her Journey to London; received in all Places as she went peaceably, and at London joyfully. Where Queen Matild made humble Suit unto her for the Liberty of King Stephen her Husband, and that he might but be allowed to live a private Life; the Londoners also made Suit to have the Laws of K. Edward restored: But the Empress not only rejected both their Suits, but returned them Answers in harsh and insulting Language: Indeed most unseasonable; and which gave a Stop to the Current of all her Fortunes. For Queen Matild finding thereby how high the Empress's Pulses did beat, sent presently to her Son Eustace, being then in Kent, to raise Forces with all speed, with whom the Londoners as much discontented as she, do afterwards join; and Henry Bishop of Winchester, as much discontented as either of them, fortifies his Castles at Waltham and Farnham, and especially Winchester, where he stays himself, attending upon what Coast the next Wind of the Empress would blow. Of all these Things the Empress had Intelligence, and thereupon secretly in the Night she fled to Oxford, sending strait Charge to have K. Stephen more narrowly watched, more hardly used, put (as some write) in Fetters, and fed with very bare and poor Commons; withal she sends to her Uncle David King of Scots, to come unto her with all speed possible; who coming accordingly, they fall into Consultation what is first to be done. The Lot falls upon Winchester, as being their greatest Adversary, now, no less in Appearance than in Power: So Winchester they besiege, which Queen Matild hearing, she with her Son Eustace and the Londoners came presently to the Succour; where a fierce Battel being fought, the End was, that the Party of Queen Matild prevailed, and the Empress to make her Escape, was fain to be laid upon a Horse's Back in the manner of a dead Corpse, and so conveyed to Gloucester, while Earl Robert her Brother disdaining to fly, was taken Prisoner, whom Queen Matild caused to be used the more hardly, in Retaliation of the hard Usage which the Empress before had shewed to King Stephen. Things standing on these Terms, Propositions were made by the Lords for Pacification; but such were the high Spirits of the Empress and her Brother Robert, that no Conditions would please them, unless the Empress might enjoy the Crown. But after long Debate, whether by Agreement between themselves, or by Connivence of the Keepers, both King Stephen and Earl Robert got to be at Liberty. When the first thing King Stephen did, was to look out the Empress to requite the Kindness she had shewed him in Prison; and hearing her to be at Oxford, he lays Siege to the Town, and brings the Empress to such Distress, that she had no way to free her self but by Flight; and no way to fly but with manifest Danger: yet she effected it by this device. It was in the Winter Season, when Frost and Snow covered all the Ground over; she therefore clad her self, and her four Servants that were with her in white Cloaths, which being of the Colour of Snow, made her pass the Watches without being discerned, and by this means came safe to her Friends at Wallingford. Yet Malmesbury who lived at that Time, confessed he could never learn certainly by what Means she made her Escape. But howsoever she escaped this present Danger, yet it left such an Impression of Fear upon her, that she never had after any mind to appear upon the Stage of War, but left the Prosecution of it to her Son Henry, who was now about sixteen Years of Age; and being forward of his Age, and able to bear Arms, was by his great Uncle David King of Scots, Knighted to make him more forward.

It was now the ninth Year of K. Stephen's Reign, when Ralph Earl of Chester, keeping Possession of the City of Lincoln, was in the Night time assaulted by the King; but the Earl perceiving the King's Forces to be but small, suddenly issued forth, and repelled the King with the slaughter of fourscore of his Men. Yet two Years after this, the Earl was reconciled to the King, and came of his own accord to wait upon him, when perfidiously he was detained by the King, and not set at Liberty, till he had surrendered into the King's Hands all the Castles that were in his Possession; which tho' it brought the King some present Benefit, yet it wrought him a greater future Loss; for it lost him his Credit with all Men, and no Man afterward would trust his Word.

Now was Duke Henry come to the Age of nineteen Years, and was in Possession of the Dukedom of Anjou, by the Death of his Father Geoffery Plantagenet: And not long after this,

Duke of Guyen*, by whom he had that Duchy, and also the Earldom of Poitou; Normandy he had by his Mother, but more by the People's Inclination. So as being possess'd now of four great Principalities, this Greatness of Estate adding to the Greatness of his Spirit, made him aspire to recover his Right in England; and over he comes, bringing with him but small Forces, but promising himself great from the People of this Kingdom. And many indeed resorted to him; with whom he fell on presently, and besieged Marleborough: but by the King's greater Forces was repelled.

Eustace King Stephen's Son dieth.

K. Stephen and Prince Henry agree.

Prince Henry thought by some to be K. Stephen's Son.

A.D. 1154. Son, went privily to him, asking him how he could find in his Heart to fight against him that was his own Son? Could he forget the Familiarity he had with her in her Widowhood? But this was no Matter for the Writers of that Time to deliver. It touched too near the Interest of Princes then in being, and Princes must not be touched while they live; nor when they are dead neither, with Uncertainties, as this could be no other: But howsoever it was, certain it is, that after this Agreement between K. Stephen and Duke Henry, they continued in mutual Love and Concord as long after as they lived.

No Mention what became of Maude at this Time.

But what became of Maude the Empress at this Time? For that she was alive, and lived many Years after this Agreement between K. Stephen and her Son Henry, all Writers agree: And to say that she consented to the Agreement, without any Provision made for herself, is to make her too much a Woman, a very weak Vessel: And to say there might be Provision made, tho' it be not recorded, is to make all Writers defective in great Excess: And besides, being so stirring a Woman as she was, that upon a sudden she should be so quiet, as not to deserve to have one Word spoken of her in all the long time she lived after, (being no less than 12 or 13 Years) is A.D. 1154. as strange as the rest. And if she placed her Contentment so wholly in her Son, that in regard of him she regarded not her self at all, it deserves at least the Encomium of such a motherly Love as is very unusual, and not always safe. Whatsoever it was, I must be fain to leave it as a Gordian Knot, which no Writer helps me to untie. Matthew Paris makes her to live 31 Years after the Death of K. Stephen, and makes this her Epitaph:

*Ortu magna, viro major, sed maxima partu,
Hic jacet Henrici filia, sponsa, parens.*

Of his Taxations and Ways for raising of Moneys.

OF Taxations in his Time, there is no Mention made, for Taxations indeed are properly drawn from a Body of State when it is entire, whereas the State all this King's Time was altogether in Factions. But what he wanted in Taxations, he supplied with Confiscations, which by reason of the many Revoltings of Men of all Sorts, could not but chuse but fill his Coffers, every Rebellion being in Nature of a Purchase to him; for whatsoever became of the Persons, their Lands and Goods were sure to be his. And if it happen'd at any time, that Confiscations came in but slowly, he had then Devices to hasten their Pace; for upon light Suggestions (not so much oftentimes as just Suspicions) he would call Men into question, and seize upon their Goods, as in the Case particularly of Roger Bishop of Salisbury; and it may not be displeasing to hear from what Beginning this Bishop grew to such a Height of Greatness; which was thus: In the Time of K. William Rufus he was a poor Priest, serving a Cure in a Village near to Caen in Normandy, when the King's younger Brother Henry chanced to pass that Way, and to make some Stay in the said Village, who being desirous to hear a Mass, this Roger being Curate, was the Man to say it; which he dispatched with such Celerity, that the Soldiers (who commonly love not long Masses) commended him for it, telling their Lord, That there could not a fitter Priest be found for Men of War than he. Whereupon Henry appointed him to follow him; and when he came to be King, preferred him to many great Places, and at last to be Chancellor of England, and Bishop of Salisbury. You have heard his Rising, now hear his Fall: When K. Stephen came to the Crown, he held this Man in as great account as his Predecessor K. Henry had done, and perhaps in greater; for being a great Beggar of Suits, the King would say of him, If this Man will never give over asking, neither shall I ever give over giving. Yet this great Prelate fell first thro' Pride into Envy, and then thro' Envy into Ruin. For K. Stephen having given Liberty to build Castles, this Man did so far exceed all others in Magnificence, (for he builded the Castles of Salisbury, the Devises, Sherburn, Malmesbury, and Newark, to which there were no Structures comparable in the Kingdom) that the Lords out of Envy put it into the King's Head, that these Castles of his

Which so possessed the King, or he would be thought to be so possessed, that taking this for a just Cause, he seized them all into his Hands, and 40000 Marks besides, which he had in Money; and not contented with this, he took the like Course also with Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, only because he was his Nephew, and of his near Kindred. Another way he had for gaining of Money; for in the first Year of his Reign, having given Liberty to hunt in his Forests, he afterwards at Oxford caused many to be impleaded for that Liberty; a Trick which perhaps he learned from Hunting, first to give Men leave to do a thing, and then to fine them for having done it. But this is the Privilege of Princes, that their Leave must be interpreted by him that gives it, and not by him that takes it.

Laws and Ordinances in his Time.

Norwich is allowed to have Coroners and Bailiffs.

HE gave Licence to the City of Norwich to have Coroners and Bailiffs, before which Time they had only a Serjeant for the King to keep Courts; and after this, in the 37th Year of K. Henry the Third, they had Licence to inclose the Town with Ditches.

The King might not imprison Bishops.

Clergymen exempt from secular Power.

UPON the King's seizing into his Hands the Bishop of Salisbury's Castles and Goods, Complaint was made, and a Synod was call'd by the Bishop of Winchester, the Pope's Legate, to right the Bishop, where the King was cited to appear; who sending to know the Cause, Answer was made, that it was to answer for his imprisoning of Bishops, and depriving them of their Goods, which being a Christian King he ought not to do: The King replies by his Lawyer, Alberic or Awbrey de Vere, that he had not arrested the Bishop of Salisbury as a Bishop, but as his Servant that was to make him Account of his Employment. To this the Bishop answereth, That he never was Servant or Accomptant to the King: And many Allegations and Probations were urged to and fro, but in Conclusion the Synod brake up, and nothing was done. The Bishops durst not excommunicate the King without the Pope's Privy; so in the end they fell from Authority to Submission, and in the King's Chamber fell down at his Feet, beseeching him that he would pity the Church, and not suffer Dissention to be between the Kingdom and the Priesthood. And this was no small Magnanimity in the King, that he was able to pull down the high Stomachs of the Prelates in that time. In the eighth Year of his Reign, a Synod was held in London by Henry Bishop of Winchester, where it was decreed, That whosoever should lay violent Hands upon any Clergyman, should not be absolved but by the Pope himself; and from this time forward, Clergymen were exempt from the secular Power. In the tenth Year of his Reign, by the soliciting of St. Bernard, many took upon them the Cross, for a Supply to the Holy Land, amongst whom some English Lords also.

Works of Piety by him, or by others in his Time. A.D. 1154.

HE founded the Abbeyes of Cogshal in Essex, of Furneys in Lancashire; of Hurgillers and Fewersham in Kent; at Heigham in Kent, a House of Black Nuns; also an House for Nuns at Carew. His Q. Matild builded the Hospital of St. Katharine's by the Tower of London. A Knight called Sir William of Mount Fitchet, founded the Abbey of Stratford Langthorn, within four Miles of London; William of Ypre founded Boxley Abbey in Kent; Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Merival in Warwickshire; and in the same Shire, Robert Earl of Glocester the Abbey of Nun-Eaton. Thurstan Archbishop of York founded the Monastery of Fountains in Yorkshire. Also by others were founded the Abbeyes of Titley, of Rieval, of Newborough and Beeland, of Kirkstead in Yorkshire; and divers others in other Places. So that more Abbeyes were erected in his Days, than had been within the space of a hundred Years before.

NEWBRIGENSIS, and also Huntingdon, reporteth of one Raynerus, a wicked Minister of a more wicked Abbot, that crossing the Seas with his Wife, he so with his Iniquity overweighed the Ship, that in the midst of the Stream it was not able to stir; at which the Mariners astonished, cast Lots, and the Lot fell upon Raynerus; and lest this should be thought to happen by chance, they cast the Lots again and again, and still the Lot fell upon Raynerus; whereupon they put him out of the Ship, and presently the Ship, as eased of her Burthen, sailed away. Certainly a great Judgment of God, and a great Miracle; but yet recorded by one that is no fabulous Author. In this King's Time also there appeared two Children, a Boy and a Girl, clad in green, in a Stuff unknown, of a strange Language, and of a strange Diet; whereof the Boy being baptized, died shortly after, but the Girl lived to be very old; and being asked from whence they were, she answer'd, They were of the Land of St. Martyn, where there are Christian Churches erected, but that no Sun did ever rise unto them; but where that Land is, and how she came thither, she her self knew not. This I the rather write, that we may know there are other Parts of the World than those which to us are known: And this Story I should not have believed, if it were not testified by so many, and so credible Witnesses as it is. In the 15th Year of this King, the River of Thames was so hard frozen, that Horse and Cart passed over upon the Ice. In this King's Time lived Johannes de Temporibus, of whom it is recorded, that he lived 361 Years. He was one of Charlemain the Emperor's Guard, and died in the Reign of Conradus the Third, A.D. 1139.

HE married, by his Uncle King Henry's Queen Matild, Daughter and Heir of Eustace Earl of Boloyne, a Woman made for the Proportion of both Fortunes. In Adversity

A.D. 1154. City not dejected, in Prosperity not elated. While her Husband was at liberty, a Woman; during his Durance, as it were a Man, acting his part for him when he was restrained from acting it himself; not looking that Fortune should fall into her Lap, but industrious to procure it. By this Queen he had only one Son named Eustace, a Prince more than of Hope, for he lived to the blossoming of much Valour, tho' it came not to Maturity, as being cut off at 18 Years of Age, some say by drowning, and some by a stranger Accident. But strange Relations must not always be rejected; for tho' many of them be forged, yet some no doubt are true; and who knows but it may be of this Kind, which some Writers relate of this Prince? That being at the Abbey of Bury in Suffolk, and denied some Money he required to have had, he presently in a Rage went forth, and set Fire on the Corn Fields belonging to the Abbey; but afterwards sitting down to Dinner, at the first Morfel of Bread he put into his Mouth, he fell into a Fit of Madness, and in that Fit died. Certainly, the Persons of Princes are for more Observation than ordinary People; and as they make Examples, so they are sometimes made Examples. This Prince Eustace was so beloved of his Father, that he had a purpose to have joined him King with himself, but that the Pope, upon the Bishops complaining to him of it, diverted him from it. Howsoever being dead, he was buried in Feversham Abbey, where his Mother was buried a little before. Other legitimate Issue K. Stephen had none, but by a Concubine he had a Son named William, whom he made Earl of Norfolk; which Honour was confirmed upon him by a special Article, in the Agreement made between K. Stephen and Duke Henry; only a French Chronicle speaks of another Son of his, named Gervase, made Abbot of Westminster, and that he died in the Year 1160, and was there buried.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of Stature, of great Strength, and of an excellent good Complexion. Concerning the Qualities of his Mind, there was apparent in him a just Mixture of Valour and Prudence; for if he had not had both, he could never have held out with such weak Friends as he did, against such potent Adversaries as he had. And specially it must be confessed, he was of an excellent Temper for a Soldier, seeing he never kill'd any Enemy in cold Blood, as Anthony did Cicero; nor any Friend in hot Blood, as Alexander did Clitus. What he would have been in Peace, we are left to judge by only a Pattern, the short Time between his Agreement with Duke Henry and his Death. Which seeing he spent in travelling to all Parts of the Realm, and seeking to stitch up the Breaches which the Violence of War had made, we may well think that if his Life had been continued, he would have given us as good Proofs of his Justice in Peace, as he hath done of his Valour in War. For of his extraordinary good Nature we have a sufficient example in one Action of his, which was this: Duke Henry being on a time in some Straits for Money, sent to his Mother Maude A.D. 1154: the Empress, desiring her to furnish him; but she answered, that she was in as great Straits her self, and therefore could not do it: Then he sent to his Uncle Earl Robert to furnish him, and he answered, he had little enough to serve his own turn, and therefore could not do it: At last he sent to K. Stephen, and he tho' an Adversary and standing in Terms of Opposition, yet sent presently, and supplied him with it. He was withal a great Oppugner of Superstition, which made him on a time to ride into Lincoln with his Crown upon his Head, only to break the People of a superstitious Opinion they held, that no King could enter into that City in such manner, but that some great disaster would fall upon him. One special Virtue may be noted in him, that he was not noted for any special Vice, whereof if there had been any in him, Writers certainly would not have been silent.

Of his Death and Burial.

AS a Fish cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Destiny of this King to live out of Trouble. As soon as he came to enjoy Quietness, he left to enjoy Life. No Time left him between his Agreement with Duke Henry and his Death, but only so much as might reasonably serve him to take his last Leave of all his Friends: For it was but from January to October; and the last Friend he took Leave of was Theodorick Earl of Flanders, whom he met at Dover, and as soon as he had dismissed him, he was suddenly taken with the Iliack Passion, and with an old Disease of the Emrods; and died in the Monastery there, the 25th of October, in the Year 1154, when he had reigned almost nineteen Years, lived nine and forty, and was buried in the Abbey of Feversham, which he had founded.

Men of Note in his Time.

OF Clergy-men there was Thurstan Archbishop of York, and Henry Bishop of Winchester the King's Brother; also William another Archbishop of York, whom we may find in the Calender of Saints; as likewise St. Bernard, who lived in this Time, tho' not of this Country. And if we may reckon Strangers, there lived at this Time Peter Lombard, Master of the Sentences; Peter Comestor, Writer of the Ecclesiastical Story; and Gratian, Compiler of the Canon Law; all three Brothers, and all three Bastards: Also Avicen, Averroes, Mesue, and Rabbi Solomon, were in this Time famous. Of Military Men, there was Ranulph Earl of Chester, Reynold Earl of Cornwal, Robert Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk; but especially Robert Earl of Glocester, the King's base Son, whose Praises if any desire to hear sounded out to the full, let him read William of Malmesbury, who writ the History of these Times of purpose to be his Trumpet. Of the Writers of our Nation, there was this William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, Simeon Dunelmensis, William of Wells; and Geoffery of Monmouth Bishop of St. Asaph in Wales. Also Hugo Carthusianus, a Burgundian, but made Bishop of Lincoln here in England.

A.D. 1155.
K. Henry is crowned.

A greater Prince than any of his Ancestors.

Born at Mans in Normandy.

Is educated at Bristol.

Is sent into Scotland.

Is carried in- to Anjou.

KING Stephen being dead, Henry Duke of Anjou, by his Father Geoffery Plantaginet, succeeded him in the Kingdom of England, by agreement; whom he preceded by right as being Son and Heir of Maude, sole Daughter and Heir of King Henry the First; and was crowned at Westminster by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, on the seventeenth of December, in the Year 1155, and was now a greater Prince than any of his Ancestors had been before. And indeed the Kingdom of England, the Dukedom of Normandy, and the Dukedom of Anjou, in his own Right, and in the Right of his Wife Queen Eleanor, the Duchy of Guyen, and the Earldom of Poitou, being all united in his Person, made him a Dominion of a larger Extent than any Christian King had at that Time.

He was born at Mans in Normandy, in the Year 1132, a great Joy to his Father Geoffery Duke of Anjou, a greater to his Mother Maude the Empress; but so great to his Grandfather King Henry the First, that it seemed to make amends for his Son William, whom unfortunately he had lost before by Shipwreck. The Years of his Childhood were spent at home under the Care of his Parents. At nine Years old or thereabouts, he was brought by his Uncle Robert Earl of Glo- cester into England, and placed at Bristol, where under the Tuition of one Mathew his Schoolmaster, to instruct him in Learning, he remained four Years; after which time he was sent into Scotland, to his great Uncle David King of Scots, with whom he remained about two Years, initiated by him in the Principles of State, but chiefly of his own Estate. And being now about fifteen Years of Age, was by him knighted; and tho' scarce ripe for Arms, yet as a Fruit gathered before its Time was mellowed under the Discipline of his Uncle Robert, one of the best Soldiers of that Time. And now the Duke his Father not able any longer to endure his Absence, sent with great Instance to have him sent over to him; for satisfying whose Longing, Earl Robert provided him of Passage, and conducted him himself to the Sea-side where he took his last Farewel of him. Being come into Anjou, his Father perhaps overjoyed with his Presence, not long after died, leaving him in present Possession of that Dukedom, being now about nineteen Years of Age; when shortly after he married Eleanor A.D. 1155. the late Wife of Lewis King of France, but now divorced. A Year or two after, he came again into England, where after some Velitations with King Stephen, they were at last reconciled and his Succession to the Crown of England ratified by Act of Parliament. Not long after he went again into France, and presently fell to besiege a Castle which was detained from him by the French King. In the Time of which Siege, News was brought him of King Stephen's Death, which one would have thought should have made him hasten his Journey into England; yet he resolved not to stir till he had won the Castle. Which Resolution of his being known to the Defendants, they surrendered the Castle; but yet no sooner, but that it was six Weeks after before he came into England, when he was now about the Age of three and twenty Years.

HE began his Reign as Solomon would have begun it, if he had been in his Place. For first he made Choice of wise and discreet Men to be his Counsellors; then he banished out of the Realm all Strangers, and especially Flemmings, with whom the Kingdom swarmed; as of whom King Stephen had made Use in his Wars, amongst whom was William of Ypres, lately before made Earl of Kent. Ca- He causeth Castles to be demolished.
stles which by King Stephen's Allowance had been built, he caused to be demolished, (of which there were said to be 1115) as being rather Nurseries of Rebellion to the Subject, than of any Safety to the Prince. He appointed the most able Men of that Profession, to reform Abuses of the Laws, which Disorder of the Wars had brought in. He banished many Lords, who against their Oath had assisted King Stephen against him, as thinking that Men once perjured would never be faithful; and to the end he might be the less pressing upon the People with Taxations, he resumed all such Lands belonging to the Crown, which had any way been aliened or usurped, as thinking it better to displease a few than many; and many other Things he did, which in a disjointed State were no less profitable and expedient, than requisite and necessary.

He reforms the Laws.
He resumed Crown-Lands.

A.D. 1155.

His Troubles during his Reign.

His Troubles with the Welsh soon ended.

A.D. 1157.

Henry Earl of Essex, how punished for letting the King's standard fall.

Malcolm K. of Scots repressed.

K. Henry's Unkindness to his Brother Geoffery.

HE had no Competitors nor Pretenders with him for the Crown; and therefore his Troubles at first were not in Capite, struck not at the Root, as King Stephen's did; but were only some certain Nibblings at inferior Parts, till at last he brought them himself into his own Bowels. For what was the Trouble in his first Year with the Welsh, but as an Exercise rather to keep him in Motion, than that it needed to disquiet his rest? For tho' they were mutinous for a time, while they looked upon their own Bucklers, their Woods and mountainous Passages; yet as soon as King Henry did but shew his Sword amongst them they were soon reduced to Obedience for the present, and to a greater Awfulness for the Future. It is true, Henry Earl of Essex that bore the King's Standard, was so assaulted by the Welsh, that he let the Standard fall to the Ground, which encouraged the Welsh, and put the English in some Fear, as supposing the King had been slain; but this was soon frustrated to the Welsh, and punished afterward in the Earl, by condemning him to be shorn a Monk, and put in the Abbey of Reading; and had his Lands seized into the King's Hands. And what was his Trouble with Malcolm King of Scots, but a Work of his own Beginning? For if he would have suffered him to enjoy that which was justly his own, Cumberland, and Huntingdonshire, by the Grant of King Stephen, and Northumberland, by the Gift of his Mother Maude the Empress, he might have stayed quietly at home, and needed not at all to have stirred his Foot; but he could not endure there should be such Parings off from the Body of his Kingdom; and therefore went with an Army into the North, where he took Northumberland from him, with the City of Carlisle, and the Castles of New-Castle and Bamberg: And meerly out of Gratefulness, in remembrance of the many Courtesies done to him before by David King of Scots, he left him the County of Huntington; but yet with this Condition, to owe Fealty, and to do Homage to him for it. And what was his Trouble with his Brother Geoffery, but a Bird of his own hatching? For his Father Geoffery Duke of Anjou, had three Sons, Henry, Geoffery and William; and dying, he left his Dukedom of Anjou to his eldest Son Henry, but to hold no longer than till he should come to be King of England, and then to deliver it up to his second Son Geoffery. And he made his Lords to swear, not to suffer his Body to be buried, until his Son Henry had taken his Oath to do it. Which Oath Henry afterward, in reference to his Father's Body, did take; but as he took it unwillingly, so he willingly brake it, and sent presently to Adrian the then Pope for a dispensation of his Oath. Which granted, he enters Anjou with an Army, and takes from his Brother Geoffery, being little able to make resistance, not only the Dukedom of Anjou, but some other Cities also, which his Father had absolutely given him for his Maintenance: Yet out of Brotherly Kindness, was content to allow him a Pension of 1000 Pounds a Year. Which Brotherly Kindness was so unkindly taken by his Brother Geoffery, that it brake his Heart; and within a short time after he dyed.

And thus these Troubles begun by Henry himself, were soon ended; but now a Trouble is coming on, begun by Lewis King of France; and this is like to stick longer by him. For King Lewis not having yet digested King Henry's Marriage with his divorced Wife Eleanor, seeks all Opportunities to express his Spleen, by doing him Displeasure, and a fit Opportunity was now offered. For there fell out a Difference between Raymond Earl of St. Giles's, and Henry King of England, about the Earldom of Tholouse, which Raymond possess'd, and Henry claimed: In this Difference, King Lewis takes part with Raymond, as pretending to be the juster Side. Hereupon are great Forces provided on both Sides, and it was like to have come to a dangerous Battel: But that by Mediation of Friends, a Peace was made; and to make the Peace the firmer, a Marriage was concluded between Henry, King Henry's eldest Son, scarce yet seven Years of Age, and Margaret, Daughter of King Lewis not past three, who was delivered to King Henry to bring up till fit Years for Consummation. This was then thought a strong Link to hold them in Friendship, but it proved afterward a Cause to make a greater Breach; and indeed when a Son is once matched into a Family, the Father must never look from thence afterward to have a good With; seeing the Daughter thus matched can have no Advancement, but by the Advancement of her Husband, and he none, at least, none so well as by the Ruin of his Father: yet this brake not out till some Years after. It was now about the sixteenth Year of King Henry's Reign, and his Son Henry grown to be seventeen Years of Age, when it came into the King's Mind to have his Son Henry crowned King, and reign with himself in his own Time; partly out of Indulgence to his Son, but chiefly, as having found by his own Experience, that Oaths for Succession are commonly eluded, but Oaths for present Allegiance, as being Verba de presenti, can have no Evasion. And pleasing himself with this Conceit, he acquaints his Lords with his Purpose, and causeth his Son Henry to be crowned King by the Hands of Roger Archbishop of York; and all the Lords to swear Allegiance to him. At the Feast of which Solemnity, King Henry to honour his Son, would needs carry up the first dish to his Table: Whereupon the Archbishop Roger standing by, and saying merrily to the new King, What an Honour is this to you, to have such a Waiter at your Table? Why (saith he) what great matter is it for him who was but the Son of a Duke, to do Service to me, that am the Son of a King and Queen? Which the old King hearing, began to repent him, now it was too late, of that he had done. For indeed the Honour which by God's Commandment

K. Henry causeth his Son Henry to be crowned King with himself.

The Son's insolent Speech against his Father.

A.D. 1170. Children are to do their Parents, is by such making them their equal, in a manner abolished; at least it gives them Stomachs to take more upon them than is fit. But King Henry passed it over, and meant to set the best Side outward. Notwithstanding this ill success of King Henry, yet King Lewis of France soon after did the like to his Son Philip, and caused him to be crowned King in his own Life-time at Paris, Anno 1179.

The young K. Henry is incited by his Father-in-law K. Lewis to oppose his Father.

Queen Eleanor also.

The young King requires his Father to resign the Kingdom.

K. Lewis and the Lords of France assist him.

And now King Lewis took Displeasure that his Daughter was not crowned as well as her Husband; and therefore to satisfy him in that Point, King Henry sendeth his Son Henry, and his Wife Margaret into England, and causeth them both to be crowned by Walter Archbishop of Roan: And shortly after, the young King Henry and his Wife go back to King Lewis her Father, and by him with great Joy and Variety of Sports were entertained. In the time of their being there, King Lewis partly out of his old Spleen to King Henry, and partly to make his Son-in-law more absolute, falls oftentimes into Conference with him; and finding his hot Spirit to be fit Tinder for such Fire, tells him it was a shame he should suffer himself to be made a Stale; have the Title of a King, and not the Authority; and that as long as he stood in such Terms, that which seemed an Honour was indeed a Disgrace. With which Words of King Lewis, the young King Henry was set afloat, and from that time forward stuck not openly to oppose his Father. Whereof his Father having Intelligence, sent Messengers to King Lewis, desiring him from the King their Master, to be a means to bring his Son to more Moderation. But K. Lewis hearing the Embassadors name their Master King, with an angry Countenance said unto them; What mean you by this, to call him King who hath passed his Kingdom over to his Son? And with this Answer sent them away. To this evil, another worse was added: That Queen Eleanor his Wife enraged with Jealousy of her Husband's Concubines, both incensed her Son Henry, and persuaded also two other of her Sons, Richard and Geoffrey, to join against their Father; telling them, it would be better for them that their Brother should prevail, who could not chuse but allow them better Maintenance than their Father did. With these Persuasions they pass over into Normandy, and join with their Brother Henry, who emboldned by their Assistance, grows now more insolent than he was before; that when Messengers were sent to him from his Father, requiring him to lay down his Arms, and to come lovingly to him, he proudly made Answer, that his Father must not look he would lay down his Arms, unless himself first would lay down his Authority, and resign the Kingdom. And now Lewis King of France calling together the great Lords of his Kingdom, and with them William King of Scots, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, Hugh Bigot, and others of his Son's party, they all take their Oaths to assist the young K. Henry with all their power, and thereupon all in one Day the French invade Normandy, Aquitain, and Britain; A.D. 1170. the King of Scots Northumberland; and King Lewis the City of Verneuil, which he brought to that Distress, that it was agreed by the Inhabitants, if it were not succoured within three Days, then to surrender it. K. Henry hearing of this Agreement, promiseth to succour them by that Day. But here K. Lewis useth Trick, gets that by Fraud, which he could not do by Force; for he sends to King Henry, that if he were willing to have a Peace with his Sons, he should meet him at a Place appointed, at such a Time, and he doubted not to effect it. King Henry glad of such an Offer, and with that Gladness perhaps blinded, and not suspecting any Deceit, promised to meet; and coming to the Place at the Day, which was the Day he should have succoured Verneuil, he stayed there all Day looking for King Lewis coming; who instead of coming, sent word to Verneuil, that K. Henry was defeated, and therefore their Hope of Succour was in vain. Whereupon the Citizens thinking it to be so indeed, because he came not according to his Promise, surrendered the Town; which King Lewis finding himself unable to hold, set it on Fire, and so departed. But King Henry when he perceived the Fraud, followed him with his Army, and took a bloody Revenge of his Fraud, with the slaughter of many of his Men. At the same Time also King Henry's Forces encountred Hugh Earl of Chester, and Robert Fulger, who had taken Dole in Britain, took them Prisoners, and brought them to King Henry. And about the same Time likewise in England, Robert Earl of Leicester thinking to surprize Reynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard Lacy, King Henry's Generals, at unawares, was himself by them overthrown, and the Town of Leicester taken, which only the Sight of the Place defended from being battered to the Ground. Robert Leicester a strong Site. Earl of Leicester being thus defeated, passeth over into France, and being supplied by King Lewis with greater Forces than before, is together with Hugh Bigot sent back into England, to draw the Countrey to Henry the Son's Party, who at first Assault took Norwich; and then sitting down before Bury, they are in a great Battel by Richard Lucy, and others of King Henry's Captains, overthrown with the Slaughter of 10000 Men, and as many taken Prisoners; amongst whom Earl Robert himself. Yet were not Roger Mowbray, and Hugh Bigot so daunted with this Overthrow, but that together with David King of Scots Brother, they gather new Forces, and invade Northumberland and Yorkshire, when Robert Scottee, Ralph Granula, William Vesci, and Bernard Balliol (who built Bernard Castle in the Bishoprick of Durham) Knights of those Parts, assembled together, and fighting a great Battel with them, overthrew them, and took the King of Scots Prisoner, with many others. Yet is not Hugh Bigot daunted with this neither, but gathers new Forces and takes Norwich; and Robert Ferris, Nottingham. The News whereof, when King Henry the Son heard, he recovered new Spirits, and Lewis, prepares himself afresh for War: Which King Henry the Father hearing, returns speedily into England, and to appease St. Thomas Becket's Ghost, goes to visit his Tomb, and there asks him Forgiveness. This done he goes into Suffolk, and at Farmingham Castle, which belonged to Hugh Bigot, stays with his Army: when suddenly moved by what Instinct no Man knows (unless the appeasing of St. Thomas's Ghost did work it,) both Hugh Bigot delivers up his Castle into K. Henry's Hands, and likewise Robert Mowbray, Robert Ferris, and many others of that Party, come voluntarily in, and submit themselves to the King's Mercy. Hereupon King Henry returns to London, about which Time he committed his Wife Queen Eleanor to Prison for her Practices against him. In the mean time, King Lewis understanding that Normandy was but weakly guarded, together with his Son the young King Henry, and Philip Earl of Flanders, he besieged Roan, which the King's Forces valiantly defended, till he came himself in Person; and thereupon King Lewis despairing of any good to be done, sends Messengers to King Henry for a Truce, and appointed a Day to meet at Gyfors, where he doubted not to make a reconciliation between his Sons and him. K. Henry agreed willingly, but at the Meeting nothing was done. It seems it was but one of K. Lewis's old Tricks to come fairly off.

A Reconciliation is made on all Parts. Richard, K. Henry's second Son affianceth Adela the K. of France's Daughter.

A.D. 1179. With whom K. Henry is thought to have unlawful Familiarity.

After this Truce made with K. Lewis, K. Henry hearing that his Son Richard had in the mean time possessed himself of a great part of the Province of Poitou, goes thither with an Army, where Richard at last, after some Hesitation, as doubting his Forces, submits himself to his Father, and asks Pardon; which his Father as freely grants, as if he had never committed any Fault. And thereupon K. Henry employs him to K. Lewis, and his Brother Henry, to persuade them to Peace; who wearied now with the Wars, were easily drawn, and so Reconciliation on all Parts is made. And to confirm the Reconciliation between the two Kings, Henry and Lewis, his Daughter Adela is affianced to K. Henry's Son Richard, as Earl of Aquitaine; and because the Lady was but young, she was committed to the Care of K. Henry till she could be fit for Marriage. Upon this K. Henry sets Robert Earl of Leicester, and Hugh Earl of Chester, giving Hostages and Oath for their Allegiance, at Liberty; and William also King of Scots, paying a certain Mulet, for which he delivered in Pawn the strong Castles of Berwick, Roxborough, and Sterling to K. Henry, and was fined to lose the County of Huntington, and never to receive any Rebels into his Protection. These Things done, the King with his Son returns into England, where with all Joyfulness they were received.

It was now the Year 1179, when K. Lewis began again to grow discontented with King Henry, because his Daughter was not yet married to his Son Richard, as was agreed: But K. Henry making him Promise to have them married within a few Days, gave him Satisfaction; tho' indeed he meant nothing less, for it was thought he kept her for himself, as with whom he had before that time had unlawful Familiarity.

The Year 1184 was memorable for nothing, or for nothing so much as the Death of the young K. Henry, who died then, being of the Age of one and twenty Years; whose Widow Margaret returning into France, was afterward married to Bela King of Hungary. Now K. Henry's Son Richard, no longer enduring to have his Marriage delayed, which his Father often promised, but would never suffer to be performed, falls into his old Fit of Discontentment. Wherein tho' he cannot perhaps be justified, yet he may justly be excused; for to be kept from a Wife at that time of his Age for which a Wife was most proper; and especially having been affianced so long before, which could not chuse but make his Appetite the sharper; must needs be, if not a just Cause, at least a strong Provocation to make him do as he did.

Howsoever from this Fit of Discontentment, he falls into a Relapse of Rebellion, and infecting with it his Brother John, and a great part of his Father's Adherents, they all take part with Philip, (now after the Decease of Lewis King of France) who willing to make use of their Assistance, before the Stream of filial Awfulness should return into the natural Chanel, takes them along with him, and besiegeth the City of Mans, in which K. Henry at that time was himself in Person. Who apprehending the Danger, and then resenting the Mischief of falling into his Enemies Hands, gets him secretly out of the City, leaving it to defend itself, till he should return with greater Forces; for hearing afterward that the Town was taken, he fell into so great a Distraction of Mind, that it made him break out into these blasphemous Words:

I shall never hereafter love God any more, who hath suffered a City so dear unto me, to be taken from me: But he quickly recollected himself, and repented him that he had spoken those Words. Indeed Mans was the City in which he was born. That to have this City taken from him, was as much as to have his Birth-right taken from him. And to say the truth, after he had lost this City, he scarce seemed to be alive; not only because he shortly after died, but because the State of Majesty, which had all his Life accompanied him, after this forsook him; for now he was fain to beg Peace of his Enemies, who often before had begged it of him; now he was glad to yield to Conditions, which no Force before could have wrested from him. It is

And thus this great Prince's Troubles, which began in little ones, and were continued in great ones, ended at last in so great a Trouble, that it ended his Life, and left him an Example of Desolation, notwithstanding all his Greatness; forsaken of his Friends, forsaken of his Wife, forsaken of his Children; and (if he were not himself, when he blasphemed for the Loss of Mans) forsaken of himself; which might be exemplar in this King, if it were not the common Epilogue of all Greatness.

Who first of all Englishmen entered Ireland.

Robert Fitz Stephen was the first of all Englishmen after the Conquest that enter'd Ireland, the first Day of May in the Year 1170 with 390 Men, and there took Wexford in the Behalf of Dernutus, Son of Mercherdach, called Mack Murg, King of Leymster. In September following, Richard Earl of Chepstow, surnamed Strong-bow, sailed into Ireland with 1200 Men, where he took Waterford and Dublin, and married Eve the Daughter of Dernutus, as he was promised. From these Beginnings, K. Henry being then at rest from all hostile Arms both at home and abroad, takes into his Consideration the Kingdom of Ireland, as a Kingdom which oftentimes afforded Assistance to the French; and therefore purposing with himself by all means to subdue it, he provides a mighty Army, and in the Winter Season sailed thither, taking Shipping at Pembroke, and landing near to Waterford. Where entering into Consultation what Course was fittest to be taken in the Enterprize, suddenly of their own Accord the Princes of the Countrey came in, and submitted themselves unto him, only Rodoric King of Connaught stood out; who being the greatest, thought to make himself the only King of that Nation. But K. Henry forbearing him for the present, who kept himself in the Fastness of Bogs and Woods, and was not to be followed in the Winter Season, takes his Journey to Dublin, the chief City of the Countrey; and there calling the Princes and Bishops of the Nation together, requires their Consent to have him and his Heirs to be their King; which they affirming they could not do without the Pope's Authority, to whom, at their first Conversion to the Christian Religion, they had submitted themselves; the King sent presently to Adrian the then Pope, an Englishman, requiring his Assent, which upon divers good Considerations he granted; and hereupon the King built him a stately Palace in the City of Dublin; and having thus without Blood possess'd himself of the Kingdom, the Spring following he returns joyfully into England. About four Years after, Rodoric also sends his Chancellor to K. Henry, to offer his Submission, with a Tribute to be paid of every ten Beasts, one sufficient. After this, in the one and thirtieth Year of his Reign, he sent his Son John to be the Governour there.

The Pope confirms their Submission.

His Taxations and Ways for raising of Money. A.D. 1184.

Taxations in his Time were chiefly once when he took Escuage of Englishmen, towards his Wars in France, which amounted to 12400 Pounds: But Confiscations were many, because many Rebellions, and every Rebellion was as good as a Mine. Also Vacancies of Bishopricks and Abbies kept in his Hand, sometimes many at once, no Time without some. He resumed also all Lands which had either been sold or given from the Crown by his Predecessors; but a principal Cause that made him plentiful in Money, was his Parsimony: As when he was enjoined for a Penance to build three Abbies, he performed it, by changing secular Priests into regular Canons, only to spare Cost: And it was not the least Cause of alienating his Sons from him, that he allowed them not Maintenance answerable to their Calling. And it could be nothing but Parsimony while he lived, which brought it to pass, that when he died, there were found in his Coffers 900000 Pounds, besides Plate and Jewels.

He keeps Abbies vacant in his Hands.

Laws and Ordinances in his Time.

IN the Beginning of his Reign, he refined and reformed the Laws of the Realm; making them more tolerable and more profitable to his People than they were before. In the one and twentieth Year of his Reign, he divided his whole Kingdom into six several Circuits, appointing in every Circuit three Judges, who twice every Year should ride together, to hear and determine Causes between Man and Man: As at this Day, tho' altered in the Number of the Judges, and in the Shires of Circuit. In this King's Days, the Number of Jews all England over was great: Yet wheresoever they dwelt, they might not bury any of the Dead any where but in London; which being a great Inconvenience to bring dead Bodies oftentimes from far remote Places, the King gave them Liberty of Burial in several Places, where they lived. It was in this King's Days also ordained, that Clergy-men offending in hunting the King's Deer, should be punishable by the Civil Magistrate, according to the Laws of the Land; which Order was afterward taken with them for any Offence whatsoever they committed. Tho' it be not a Law, yet it is an Ordinance which was first brought in by this King, that the Lyons should be kept in the Tower of London. Also this King made a Statute concerning Armour and Weapons, That every Man that held a Knight's Fee, should be bound to have a Pair of Curasses, an Helmet, with Shield and Spear; and that every Man of the Laity having Goods and Revenues to the Value of sixteen Marks, should have one Pair of Curasses, an Helmet, a Spear and a Shield; and every Man worth ten Marks, should have an Habergeon, a Steel Cap, and a Spear.

Jews, where-soever dwelling, might bury no where but in London, till this King gave them Liberty.

Clergy-men punishable by the Civil Magistrate. Lyons ordained to be kept in the Tower.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

THIS King's Reign is famous for the Contention of a Subject with the Prince; and and tho' it may be thought no equal Match, yet in this Example we shall find it hard to judge which of them had the Victory. But before we come to speak of the Contention, it is fit to say something of the Man, and of the Quarrel. The Man was Thomas Becket, born in London, his Father one Gilbert Becket, his Mother an Outlandish-woman, of the Countrey of Syria. His first Rising was under Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, who taking a Liking to him, (as one saith, no Man knew for what) made him first Archdeacon of Canterbury, and then used Means to have him be the Prince's Tutor; after that to be Chancellor of England; and after the decease of the said Theobald, was himself made Archbishop of Canterbury in his Place. One memorable Thing he did at his coming to be Archbishop, he surrendred his Place, being Chancellor, as not thinking it fit to sit at the Helm of the Commonwealth, and of the Church, both at once. But now began the Contention between the King and him.

Th. Becket's
Parentage and Rising.

The Contention between the King and him.

The Difference was, the King would have it ordained that Clergy-men who were Malefactors, should be tried before the Secular Magistrate as Lay-men were: This Becket opposed, saying, it was against the Liberty of the Church, and therefore against the Honour of God. Many Bishops stood with the King, some few with Becket; the Contention grew long, and with the Length still hotter, till at last Becket was content to assent to the Ordinance with this Clause, Salvo Ordine suo. The King liked not the Clause, as being a deluding of the Ordinance: He required an absolute Assent, without any Clause of Reservation. At last, after many Debatings and Demurs, the Archbishop yields to this also, and subscribes the Ordinance, and set his Hand unto it: But going homewards, it is said, his Cross-bearer and some other about him, blamed him for that he had done. But whether moved with their Words, or otherwise, upon second Thoughts, the next Day when he met him again, he openly repented his former Deed, retracts his Subscription, and sends to the Pope for Absolution of his Fault; which the Pope not only granted, but encouraged him to persist in the Course he had begun. It may be thought a Fable, yet it is related by divers good Authors, that one time during this Contention, certain Fellows cut off the Archbishop's Horses Tails; after which Fact all their Children were born with Tails like Horses; and that this continued long in the Posterity, tho' now long since ceased, and perhaps their Families too. But K. Henry finding there was no prevailing with Becket by fair Means, begins to deal more roughly with him; and first makes use of Authority upon his Temporalities; and withal a Censure was spoken to be intended against his Person. Which Becket understanding, thought it his best Course to flee the Realm, and thereupon passing under the Name of Dereman, he passeth over Sea, and there, two Years by the Pope, and five by the King of France, was maintained as it were of Alms: In which Mifery nothing vexed him so much, as that K. Henry sent all his Kindred, Men and Women, old and young, into Banishment after him. And now K. Henry finding that Becket stood much upon his Legantine Power, sent Messengers to the Pope, desiring him to take that Power from him, and to confer it upon his Archbishop of York; but the Pope answered, he would not do so, but he was content the King himself should be his Legate, and sent him Letters to that Purpose; which King Henry took in such Scorn, that he threw away the Letters, and sent them presently back to him again. This Dignity of Legateship, for the diligent Service of Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, was by a special Decree of Pope Innocent the Second, to remain to the Archbishop of Canterbury; so that they were entituled Legati nati, Legats born.

The Pope offers to make King
Henry his Legate.

In this mean Time, the King of France prevailed with K. Henry to afford Becket a Conference, hoping to bring them to some Agreement; where being together, K. Henry alleged before the King of France, that he required nothing of Becket but his Assent to an Ordinance, to which in his Grandfather K. Henry I's Time, all the Bishops of the Realm, and the Archbishop of Canterbury that then was, did give their Assent: Yet this moved not Becket at all, but he continued his former Tenet; it was against the Honour of God, and therefore desired to be excused. See now (saith K. Henry) the Perverseness of this Man, all that agrees not with his own Humour, is presently against the Honour of God. While these Things were thus a working, Becket had gotten him more Friends at Rome, and by their means prevailed with the Pope to give him Power to interdict some Bishops in England that had done him Wrong; and the Pope spared not to threaten Excommunication to K. Henry himself, if he restored not Becket to his Dignity. But whether aw'd with Threatnings, or won by the King of France's Importunity, or else perhaps relenting in himself, he was contented at last that Becket should return home and enjoy his Bishoprick.

Who being come to Canterbury, the Bishops whom he had interdicted for crowning the young K. Henry, (which he said was his Right to have done) made humble Suit unto him, to be released of the Censure. Which, when the Archbishop would not grant, but with certain Cautions and Exceptions, the Bishops discontented went over to the King, complaining of the hard Measure that was offered them by the Archbishop: Whereat the King being much moved, Shall I never (saith he) be at quiet for this Priest? If I had any about me that loved me, they would find some way or other to rid me of this Trouble. Whereupon four Knights standing by, that heard the King make this complaint, namely*, Reynold Fitz-urse, or Bereson, Hugh Morvill, William Tracy, and Richard Britton, thinking they should do an acceptable Service to the King, went shortly after into England; and going to Canterbury found the Archbishop then at Church, when upon the Steps there, they struck him upon the Head with their Swords, and flew him the 29th Day of December, in the Year 1172. Afterward with much ado, by K. Henry's means they were pardoned by the Pope, only enjoined Penance to go on Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, as some write: But others more probably, that the King abhorred them ever after; and that within three Years after they all died miserably. You have heard his Persecution, and (as some would have it called) his Martyrdom: Now hear the Honours that have been done him, and the Visitations to his Tomb: And first K. Henry himself coming to Canterbury, as soon as he came within Sight of Becket's Church, lighting off his Horse, and putting off his Hose and Shoes, he went barefoot to his Tomb; and for a further Penance suffered himself to be beaten with Rods by every Monk of the Cloister. A few Years after, K. Lewis of France comes into England of purpose to visit the Shrine of St. Thomas; where having paid his Vows, he makes Oblations with many rich Presents. The like many Princes since that Time have done; and many Miracles are reported to have been done at his Tomb, which yet may be unbeliev'd without Unbelief, and with Faith enough. It is worth observing, how some Days are to some Men more Fortunate than other Days; as Matthew Paris writes of this Becket, that Tuesday was observed to be a fortunate Day to him; for upon Tuesday he was Born; upon a Tuesday he was banished; upon a Tuesday he was recalled from Banishment; upon a Tuesday he suffered Martyrdom; upon a Tuesday, fifty Years after his Death, his Body with great Solemnity was translated.

Contention betwixt the two Archbishops.

Two Popes at once.

A bond-man comes to be Pope, called Adrian the Fourth.

Choaked with a Fly.

Heraclius the Patriarch of Jerusalem his insolent Speech to K. Henry.

Another Difference in this King's Days, was between the two Archbishops of England, about the Jurisdiction of Canterbury over York, which being referred to the Pope, he gave Judgment on Canterbury's Side. Also in this King's Days, there was a Schism in the Church of Rome, two Popes up at once, of whom Alexander the third was one; which Schism continued the Space of almost 20 Years. Also in this King's Days, one Nicholas Breakspear, born at St. Albans, or as others write, at Langley in Hertfordshire, being a Bondman of that Abbey, and therefore not to be allowed to be a Monk there, went beyond Sea, where he so profited in Learning, that the Pope made him first Bishop of Alba, and afterward Cardinal, and sent him Legat to the Norwegians, where he reduced that Nation from Paganism to Christianity; and returning back to Rome was chosen Pope by the Name of Adrian the Fourth, and dyed, being choaked with a Fly in his Drink. In his Days also Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem came to K. Henry, desiring Aid for the Holy Land, but not so much of Money as of Men; and not so much of Men neither, as of a good General, as himself was: To whom K. Henry answered, That tho' he were willing to undertake it, yet his unquiet State at home would not suffer him. With which answer the Patriarch moved, said, Think not, great King, that Pretences will excuse you before God; but take this from me, That as you forsake God's Cause now, so he hereafter will forsake you in your greatest Need. But (saith the King) if I should be absent out of my Kingdom, my own Sons would be ready to rise up against me in my absence; to which the Patriarch replied, No marvel, for from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they shall; and so departed. Also in this King's Days there came into England thirty Germans, Men and Women, calling themselves Publicans, who denied Matrimony, and the Sacraments of Baptism, and of the Lord's Supper, with other Articles; who being obstinate, and not to be reclaimed, the King commanded they should be marked with a hot Iron in the Forehead, and be whipped; which Punishment they took patiently, their Captain (called Gerard) going before them singing, Blessed are ye when Men hate you. After they were whipped, they were thrust out of Doors in the Winter, where they died with Cold and Hunger, no Man daring to relieve them. This King after his Conquest of Ireland, imposed the Tribute of Peter-pence upon that Kingdom, namely, that every House in Ireland should yearly pay a Penny to St. Peter. In this King's Time was held by Pope Alexander the Third, the General Council of Lateran, consisting of 310 Bishops; where many Ordinances were made for the Peace of the Church. Also in the 33<sup>d</sup> Year of his Reign Jerusalem was taken by the Turks.

THIS King founded the Church of Bristol, which K. Henry the Eighth afterward erected into a Cathedral. He also founded the Priors of Dover, of Stonely, of Basinwork, and the Castle of Rudlan; and began the Stone-bridge over the Thames at London. He caused also the Castle of Warwick to be builded. Maude the Empress, his Mother, founded the Abbey of Bordesly. In his Time also Hugh Mortimer founded Wigmore Abbey: Richard Lucy the King's Chief Justice laid the Foundation of the Conventual Church, in the Honour of St. Thomas, in a place which is called Westwood, otherwise Lesnes, in the Territory of Rochester in the new Parish of Southfleet. He also builded the Castle of Onger in Essex. Robert Harding, a Burgess of Bristol, to whom K. Henry gave the Barony of Barkley, builded the Monastery of St. Augustine in Bristol. In the tenth Year of his Reign, London-Bridge was new made of Timber, by Peter of Cole-Church a Priest. Robert de Boscu Earl of Leicester, founded the Monastery of Garenden, of Monks; and of Leicester, called St. Mary de Pratis, of Canons Regular; and his Wife Amicia, Daughter of Ralph Montford, founded Eaton of Nuns. In the two and twentieth Year of his Reign after the Foundation of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, the Stone Bridge over the Thames at London began to be founded, towards which a Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury gave 1000 Marks. Casualties that happened in his Time.

A great Earthquake.

IN the eleventh Year of this King's Reign, on the six and twentieth Day of January, was so great an Earthquake in Ely, Norfolk, and Suffolk, that it overthrew them that stood upon their Feet, and made the Bells to ring in the Steeples. In the seventeenth Year of his Reign, there was seen at St. Oystes in Essex, a Dragon of marvellous Bigness, which by moving burned Houses; and the whole City of Canterbury was the same Year almost burnt. In the eighteenth Year of his Reign, the Church of Norwich with the Houses there-to belonging was burnt, and the Monks dispersed. At Andover, a Priest praying before the Altar, was slain with Thunder. Likewise one Clerk and his Brother was burnt to Death with Lightning. In the three and twentieth Year a Shower of Blood rained in the Isle of Wight two Hours together. In the four and twentieth Year, the City of York was burnt; and on Christmas Day, in the Territory of Derlington, in the Bishoprick of Durham, the Earth lifted up her self in manner of a high Tower, and so remained unmoveable from Morning till Evening, and then fell with so horrible a Noise, that it frightened the Inhabitants thereabouts, and the Earth swallowing it up there, made a deep Pit, which is seen at this Day; for a Testimony whereof Leland saith, he saw the Pits there commonly called Hell-Kettles. Also in the same Year, on the tenth Day of April, the Church of St. Andrews in Rochester was consumed with Fire. In the eight and twentieth Year of his Reign, Barnwell with the Priory, near unto Cambridge, was burnt. In the thirtieth Year, the Abbey of Glastenbury was burnt, with the Church of St. Julian. In the Year 1180, a great Earthquake threw down many Buildings, amongst which the Cathedral Church of Lincoln was rent in pieces the five and twentieth of April. And on the twentieth of October, the Cathedral Church of Chichester, and all the whole City was burnt. This Year also, near unto Orford in Suffolk, certain Fishers took in their Nets a Fish, having the Shape of a Man in all Points, which Fish was kept by Bartholomew de Glandevile in the Castle of Orford six Months and more; he spake not a Word; all manner of Meats he did gladly eat, but most greedily raw Fish when he had pressed out the Juice; oftentimes he was brought to the Church, but never shewed any Sign of Adoration: At length, being not well looked to, he stole to the Sea, and never was seen after. In the Year 1188, on the twentieth of September, the Town of Beverley, with the Church of St. John there was burnt. And in this King's Time, the Bones of K. Arthur, and his Wife Guinevour, were found in the Vale of Avalon, under an hollow Oak fifteen Foot under Ground: The Hair of the said Guinevour being then whole and of fresh Colour; but as soon as it was touched, it fell to Powder, as Fabian relateth.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Eleanor, Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Guyen, late Wife of Lewis the seventh King of France, but then divorced; but for what Cause divorced, is diversly related. Some say K. Lewis carried her with him into the Holy Land, where she carried her self not very holily, but led a licentious Life; and which is the worst kind of Licentiousness, in carnal Familiarity with a Turk. Which K. Lewis tho' knowing, yet dissembled, till coming home, he then waved that Cause, as which he could not bring without Disgrace to himself, and made use of their Nearness in Blood, as being cousins in the fourth Degree, which was allowed by the Pope, as a Cause sufficient to divorce them, tho' he had at that Time two Daughters by her. Being thus divorced, Duke Henry marries her, with whom it was never known, but she led a modest and sober Life, a sufficient Proof, that the former Report was but a Slander. By this Queen Eleanor he had five Sons, William, Henry, Richard, Geoffery, and John; and three Daughters, Maude, married to Henry Duke of Saxony; Eleanor, married to Alphonso the Eighth of that Name, King of Castile; and Jane or Jone, married to William King of Sicily. Of his Sons, William died young. Henry born the second Year of his Reign, was crowned King with his Father in the eighteenth Year, and died the nine and twentieth Year, and was buried at Roan; married to Margaret, Daughter of Lewis King of France, but left no Issue. Richard born at Oxford (in the King's Palace there called Beaumont) in the fourth Year of his Father's Reign, and succeeded him in the Kingdom. Geoffery born the fifth Year of his Father's Reign, married Constance, Daughter and Heir of Conan, Earl of Little-Britain, in the fourteenth Year, and in the two and thirtieth Year died; leaving by his Wife Constance, two Daughters and a posthumous Son named Arthur. John his youngest, called John without Land, because he had no Land assigned him in his Father's Time; born the twelfth Year of his Father's Reign, and succeeded his Brother Richard in the Kingdom. And this may be reckoned a peculiar Honour to this King, that of his five Sons, three of them lived to be Kings; and of his three Daughters, two of them to be Queens. Concubines he had many, but two more famous than the rest; and one of these two more famous than the other; and this was Rosamund, Daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, whom he kept at Woodstock, in Lodgings so cunningly contrived, that no Stranger could find the way in; yet Queen Eleanor did, being guided by a Thread: So much is the Eye of Jealousy quicker in finding out, than the Eye of Care in hiding. What the Queen did to Rosamund when she came to her, is uncertain; but this is certain, that Rosamund lived but a short Time after, and lies buried in the Nunnery of Godstow near to Oxford. By this Rosamund, K. Henry had two Sons, William called

Henry*, was the Wife of Ralph Blewet a Knight; by whom he had a Son named Morgan, who was Provost of Beverly, and being to be elected Bishop of Durham, went to Rome for a Dispensation, because being a Bastard he was else incapable: But the Pope refusing to grant it, unless he would pass as the Son of Blewet, he absolutely answered, he would for no Cause in the World deny his Father; and chose rather to lose the Dignity of the Place, than of his Blood, as being the Son, tho' but the base Son, of a King.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

Why called
Short mantle.

HE was somewhat red of Face, and broad Breasted; short of Body, and therewithal fat, which made him use much Exercise and little Meat. He was commonly called Henry Short-mantle because he was the first that brought the Use of short Cloaks out of Anjou into England. Concerning Endowments of Mind, he was of Spirit in the highest Degree generous, which made him often say, that all the World sufficed not to a courageous Heart. He had the Reputation of a wise Prince all the Christian World over; which made Alphonfus King of Castile, and Garcia King of Navarre, refer a Difference that was between them, to his Arbitrament; who so judiciously determined the Cause, that he gave Contentment to both Parties; a harder Matter than to cut cloth even by a Thread. His Custom was to be always in Action: For which Cause, if he had no real Wars, he would have feigned; and would transport Forces either into Normandy or Britain, and go with them himself, whereby he was always prepared of an Army; and made it a Schooling to his Soldiers, and to himself an Exercise. To his Children he was both indulgent and hard; for out of Indulgence, he caused his Son Henry to be crowned King in his own Time; and out of Hardness, he caused his younger Sons to rebel against him. He was rather superstitious than not religious; which he shewed more by his Carriage toward Becket being dead, than while he lived. His Incontinency was not so much that he used other Women besides his Wife, but the affianced Wife of his own Son: And it was commonly thought, he had a Meaning to be divorced from his Wife Queen Eleanor, and to take the said

Adela to be his Wife. Yet generally to speak of him, he was an excellent Prince; and if in some Particulars he were defective, it must be considered he was a Man.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE was not well at Ease before; but when the King of France sent him a List of those that had conspired against him, and that he found the first Man in the List to be his Son John, he then fell suddenly into a Fit of fainting, which so encreased upon him, that within four Days after he ended his Life. So strong a Corrosive is Grief of Mind, when it meets with a Body weakened before with Sickness. He died in Normandy in the Year 1189, when he had lived threescore and one Years; reigned near five and thirty; and was buried at Font-Evraud in France; the manner of whose Burial was thus: He was cloathed in his Royal Robes, his Crown upon his Head, white Gloves upon his Hands, Boots of Gold upon his Legs, Gilt Spurs at his Heels, a great Rich Ring upon his Finger, his Scepter in his Hand, his Sword by his Side, and his Face uncovered, and all bare. As he was carried to be buried, his Son Richard in great haste ran to see him, who no sooner was come near the Body, but suddenly at his Nostrils he fell a bleeding afresh; which tho' it were in Prince Richard no good Sign of Innocency, yet his breaking presently into bitter Tears upon the seeing it, was a good Sign of Repentance. It may not be unreasonable to speak in this Place of a thing which all Writers speak of; that in the Family of the Earls of Anjou, of whom this K. Henry came, there was once a Princess, a great Enchantress, who being on a time enforced to take the blessed Eucharist, she suddenly flew out at the Church Window, and was never seen after. From this Woman these latter Earls of Anjou were descended, which perhaps made the Patriarch Heraclius say of this K. Henry's Children, that from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they would go. But Writers perhaps had been more compleat, if they had left this Story out of their Writings.

The manner
of his Coronation.

KING Richard, the First of that Name, after his Father's Funeral, went to Roan, where he settled the State of that Province; and from thence came into England, where he was crowned King at Westminster, by the Hands of Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, the third Day of September in the Year 1189. And herein this Prince is more beholden to Writers than any of his Predecessors; for in speaking of their Crowning, they content themselves with telling where and by whom they were crowned; but of this Prince they deliver the manner of his Crowning, in the full Amplitude of all Circumstances, which perhaps is not unfit to do, for Satisfaction of such as are never like to see a Coronation; and it was in this manner: First, the Archbishops of Canterbury, Roan, and Dublin, with all the other Bishops, Abbots, and Clergy, apparelled in rich Copes, and having the Cross, Holy Water, and Censers, carried before them, came to fetch him at the Door of his Privy-Chamber; and there receiving him, they led him to the Church of Westminster, till they came before the high Altar with a solemn Procession. In the Middle of the Bishops and Clergy went four Barons, bearing Candlesticks with Tapers; after whom came Geoffery de Lucy, bearing the Cap of Maintenance, and John Marshall next to him, bearing a massy Pair of Spurs of Gold; then followed William Marshal, Earl of Striguil, alias Pembroke, who bare the Royal-Scepter, in the Top whereof was set a Cross of Gold; and William de Patrick, Earl of Salisbury going next him, bare the Warder or Rod, having on the Top thereof a Dove. Then came three other Earls, David, Brother to the King of Scots; the Earl of Huntington; John the King's Brother, Earl of Mortaigne; and Robert Earl of Leicester, each of them bearing a Sword upright in his Hand, with the Scabbards richly adorned with Gold. The Earl of Mortaigne went in the Middle betwixt the other two; after them followed six Earls and Barons, bearing a Chequer Table; upon the which were set the King's Escutcheons of Arms; and then followed William Mandevil Earl of Albemarle, bearing a Crown of Gold, a great height before the King, who followed, having the Bishop of Durham on the right Hand, and Reynold Bishop of Bathe on the left, over whom a Canopy was born: and in this Order he came into the Church at Westminster; where before the high Altar, in the Presence of the Clergy and the People, laying his Hand upon the Holy Evangelists, and the Reliques of certain Saints, he took a solemn Oath, That he should observe Peace, Honour, and Reverence to Almighty God, to his Church, and to his Ministers, all the Days of his Life; also that he should exercise upright Justice to the People committed to his Charge; and that he should abrogate and disannul all evil Laws, and wrongful Customs, if any were to be found in the Precinct of his Realm; and maintain those that were good and laudable. This done, he put off all his Garments from his Middle upwards, but only his Shirt, which was open on the Shoulders that he might be anointed. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury anointed him in three Places, on the Head, on the shoulder, and on the right Arm, with Prayers in such Cases accustomed. After this he covered his Head with a Linen Cloth hallowed, and set his Cap thereon; and then after he had put on his Royal Garment, and his uppermost Robe, the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, with which he should beat down the Enemies of the Church; which done, two Earls put his Shoes upon his Feet, and having his Mantle put on him, the Archbishop forbid him on the Behalf of Almighty God, to presume to take upon him this Dignity, except he faithfully meant to perform those things which he had there sworn to perform; whereunto the King made answer, That by God's Grace he would perform them. Then the King took the Crown beside the Altar, and delivered it to the Archbishop, which he set upon the King's Head, delivering to him the Scepter to hold in his right Hand, and the Rod-Royal in his left Hand; and thus being crowned, he was brought back by the Bishops and Barons, with the Cross and Candlesticks, and three Swords, passing forth before him unto his Seat. When the Bishop that sang the Mass, came to the Offertory, the two Bishops that brought him to the Church, led him to the Altar, and brought him back again. The Mass ended, he was brought with solemn Procession into his Chamber;

Chamber;

A.D. 1189. Chamber; and this was the manner of this King's Coronation. But at this Solemnity there fell out a very disastrous Accident. For this Prince not favouring the Jews, as his Father had done, had given a strict Charge, that no Jew should be admitted to be a Spectator of the Solemnity; yet certain Jews, as tho' it had been the crowning of K. Herod, would needs be pressing in; and being put back by Officers set of purpose, it grew to be a Brabble, and from Words to Blows, so as many Jews were hurt, and some slain: and thereupon a Rumor was suddenly spread abroad, that the King had commanded to have all the Jews destroyed. Whereupon it is incredible what Risting there was of Jews Houses, and what cutting of their Throats: And tho' the King signified by publick Declaration, that he was highly displeased with that which was done; yet there was no staying the Multitude till the next Day; so often it falls out that great Solemnities are waited on with great Disasters, or rather indeed, as being connatural, they can hardly be asunder.

Of his first Acts after he was Crowned.

He sets his Mother Q. Eleanor at Liberty.

His Bounty to his Brother John.

He refused his affianced Lady Adela, and why.

He marries Berengaria the Daughter of the King of Navarre.

He makes great Provision of Money for his Journey to the Holy Land.

HE began with his Mother Queen Eleanor, whom upon her Husband's Displeasure having been kept in Prison sixteen Years, he not only set at Liberty, but set in as great Authority, as if she had been left the Regent of the Kingdom. The next he gratifies was his Brother John, to whom he made appear how much the Bounty of a Brother was better than the Hardness of a Father? For he conferred upon him in England, the Earldoms of Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Leicester; and by the Marriage of Isabel, Daughter and Heir to the Earl of Gloucester, he had that Earldom also, as likewise the Castles of Marleborough and Lutgarfal, the Honours of Wallingford, Tichil, and Eye, to the value of 4000 Marks a Year; an Estate so great, as was able to put a very moderate Mind into the Humour of aspiring, of which Princes should have a Care. Concerning his affianced Lady Adela, it may be thought strange, that having desired her so infinitely when he could not have her, now that he might have her, he cared not for her: But the Cause was known, and in every Man's Mouth; that she was now but his Father's Leavings: Yet he would not send her home but very rich in Jewels, to make Amends, if it might be, for the Loss of her Virginity; tho' this was somewhat hard on his Part, when the Father had taken all the Pleasure, that the Son should afterwards pay all the Charges. But by this at least he made a quiet Way for his Marriage now concluded, and shortly after to be consummated in Sicily with Berengaria the Daughter of Garcia King of Navarre. And now his Mind is wholly set upon his long intended Voyage to the Holy Land; for which he thinks not the treasure left by his Father to be sufficient, which yet amounted to nine hundred thousand pounds: but fore-casting with himself the great charge it must needs be, to carry an Army so long a journey, he seeks to enlarge his provision of A.D. 1189. Money by all the means he can devise. Not long before Hugh Pudsey had been advanced to the Bishoprick of Durham; and now for a great Sum of Money, he sold him the Earldom: and then said merrily among his Lords, Do ye not think me a cunning Man, that of an old Bishop can make a young Earl? From the Londoners he drained also great Sums of Money, and made them Recompence in Franchises and Liberties which they had not before. He made also great Sales; to the King of Scots, he sold the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough, for 10000 Pounds; to Godfrey de Lucie, Bishop of Winchester, the Mannors of Weregrave and Mentz; to the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury the Mannor of Midhal for 1000 Marks of Silver; to the Bishop of Durham, the Mannor of Sadborough: And when it was marvelled that he would part with such Things, he answered, That in this Case he would sell his City of London, if he could find a Chapman. But the worst Way of all was, that pretending to have lost his Signet, he made a new one; and made Proclamation, that whosoever would safely enjoy what under the former Signet was granted, should come to have it confirmed by the new: whereby he raised great Sums of Money to himself, but greater of Discontentment in his Subjects. By these, and such like Means, he quickly furnished himself with Money; and now it remained only to consider, to whose care he should commit the Government of the Kingdom in his Absence: And after Deliberation, he made Choice for the Northparts, of Hugh Bishop of Durham; joining in Commission with him, Hugh Baldulph, and William Brunel; and for the South-parts he appoints William Longshampe, Bishop of Ely, and Chancellor of England, and for his greater Strength, causeth the Pope to make him Legat of all England and Scotland; and for Normandy and Aquitain, Robert Earl of Leicester; all Men eminent for Prudence and Uprightness, and which is most of all, for Loyalty; and indeed to make a Man fit for such Employment, all these Virtues must concur. As for his Brother John, he knew well his aspiring Mind, and therefore would have tied him to live in Normandy, and not to come into England till his Return, but that their Mother Queen Eleanor interceded, and passed her Word for him; and that nothing might be left unprovided for, he appointed his Nephew Arthur, the Son of his Brother Geoffery Duke of Britain to be his Successor, if himself should fail. And now Undique convenere, vocat jam carbasus auras, every Man is ready to take Shipping, and no stay now but for a Wind; only some say that K. Richard before his departing, calling his Lords and Knights unto him, and swearing them to be true, gave to every of them a blue Ribband to be known by; from whence the first Occasion of the Order of the Garter is thought to begin.

He makes the Bishop of Durham an Earl for Money.

He sells Berwick to the King of Scots.

He leaves William Longshampe Bishop of Ely, Governor of the Kingdom.

He appoints his Nephew Arthur to be his Successor, if himself should fail.

Of

A.D. 1189.

Of his Journey into the Holy Land.

A.D. 1190.

KING Richard having prepared an Army of 30000 foot, and 5000 Horse; and having appointed to meet Philip King of France in Sicily, at the latter end of June, in the Year 1190, sets forward himself by Land to Marseilles, and their stays till his Ships should come about: But his Navy being driven by Tempest to other Parts, and the King weary of long staying, after six Weeks, he hireth Shipping for himself and his Company, and passeth forward to Messina in Sicily, where arrived also the King of France, and not long after, his own Navy. In this Island, the K. William now lately dead had married Jane, King Richard's Sister, from whom Tancred the present King withheld her Dower; and therefore tho' he shewed K. Richard fair Countenance, yet he dealt secretly with the Messinese to use all means to get him gone: Whereupon the Messinese taking a small Occasion set suddenly upon the English, and thrust them out of their Town. With which K. Richard justly offended, who had his Camp without the Town, prepares himself to revenge the Affront; when Tancred sending to him to signify that the Affront was offered without his Knowledge, and much against his Liking, so pacified him, that for the present he remained satisfied: But understanding afterward, that the Messinese did but wait their Opportunity till the Spring, when K. Richard should be going, he resenting their Intention, stays not their Leisure, but assaulting the Town with Fire and Sword, in one Day's Labour takes it; and had made great Slaughter in it, if K. Richard had not been moved to Compassion with the Tears of the Messinese, but chiefly with K. Tancred's Offers, both to pay his Sister Jane her Dower, and to marry his Daughter to K. Richard's Nephew, Arthur Duke of Britain, and to give a good part of the Portion in hand. But K. Philip was not well pleased with these Conditions, yet he breaks not out to open Diffention till more Fewel was afterward cast upon the Fire of his Anger. In the Spring King Philip sails with his Army to Ptolemais (otherwise called Acon) which the Christians had long besieged, and with them he joyns; while K. Richard taking his Sister Jane and Berengaria the young Daughter of the King of Navarre with him in 190 Ships, and 50 Gallies, puts to Sea for the Holy Land, but is by Tempest cast upon the Coast of Cyprus, where the Islanders seeking to hinder his Landing, he set upon them with his Forces; and invading the Island, easily subdues and brings it under his Subjection. And the King of the Countrey being taken Prisoner, and intreating K. Richard not to put him in Bonds of Iron, K. Richard gives him his Word, and keeps it, but puts him in Bonds of Silver. In this Island he solemnized his Marriage with Berengaria, and then leaving Richard de Canville and Robert de Thurnham, his Lieutenants in Cyprus, he passeth on to Ptolemais, which City was defended by Saladin, and had been besieged now two Years, when the Enemy seeing and fearing the Encrease of the Christian Forces, propounds Conditions, upon which accepted, they deliver it up in August the Year 1192.

A.D. 1192.

At the taking of this Town there fell out an Accident, seeming an Honour to K. Richard for the present, but proving a Disgrace, at least a great Trouble and Charge to him afterward; for Leopold Duke of Austria had first set up his Colours upon the Wall, which K. Richard caused to be thrown down, and his own to be set up: But this was no place to stand a quarrelling, it came not to the Reckoning till some time after. When Ptolemais was taken, Saladin fearing the Christians further proceeding, dismantles all the best Towns that were near it; as Porphyria, Cesarea, Ascalon, Gaza: But of Joppa, K. Richard takes a care, and placeth in it a Colony of Christians. For Joppa is a City of Palestine that was built before the Flood, and hath belonging to it a Haven of great Convenience. And now the King of France, tho' valiant enough himself, yet thinking his own great Acts to be obscured by greater of K. Richard's, he began, besides his old hating him, now to envy him. For indeed Emulation when it is in Virtue, makes the stronger Knot of Love and Affection; but when it is in Glory it makes a Separation, and turns into the Passion of Envy and Malice. And so it did with K. Philip, who pretending the Air of the Countrey did not agree with his Body, but was indeed because the Air of K. Richard's Glory did not agree with his Mind, obtained K. Richard's Content to return home, swearing first solemnly not to molest his Territories in his Absence. But this fell out for the present Enterprize most unseasonably: For the Departure of the King of France, tho' it diminished not much the Strength, (for he left Odo Duke of Burgundy in his Place) yet it diminished much the shew of Assistance. And indeed Saladin, who was at this time in Terms of surrendering Jerusalem, when he saw the King of France departed, as knowing there must needs be a Conclusion, where there was a Beginning, doubted not but the rest would follow soon after; and thereupon stayed his Hands, and grew more confident than he was before. At this time Guy of Lusignan was possess'd of the City of Tyre, and with it of the Right of the Kingdom of Jerusalem: With him King Richard makes an Exchange, that Guy should have the Island of Cyprus, which K. Richard had won, and K. Richard should have the Kingdom of Jerusalem, to which Guy had a Right; and upon this Title the Kings of England were styled Kings of Jerusalem a long time after; as likewise the Posterity of the said Guy hath by this Exchange held the Kingdom of Cyprus to this Day. Now was K. Richard more hot upon taking Jerusalem than ever before, and had certainly taken it, but that by ill Counsel diverted, because the Winter drew on, and indeed by the drawing back of Odo Duke of Burgundy, who envied that K. Richard should have the Honour of taking it, he removed for that Season to Ascalon; never come to the like again. And shortly after K. Richard was advertised of the King of France his invading Normandy, contrary to his Oath at his Departure; which forced K. Richard much to his grief, to conclude a Peace with Saladine, and that upon Conditions not very honourable for the Christians; and himself presently to return home. And so sending his Wife Berengaria, and his Sister Jane, with a great part of his Army into Sicily, and from thence into England, he passeth himself with some few in his Company, by the way of Thrace, and was by Tempest brought into Dalmatia; from whence being to pass thro' Germany, and particularly thro' Duke Leopold's Countrey of Austria, he remembering the old Grudge, changed his Apparel, and travelling sometimes on Foot, and sometimes on Horseback, he used all means possible to keep himself from being known. But destiny is not to be avoided, for as soon as he came to Vienna, partly by his Tongue, and partly by his Expences, it was presently found he was an English-man, and withal some great Man; and by and by a Rumour was spread, that it was Richard King of England; who finding himself to be discovered, and no means possible to escape, he puts off his Disguise, putting on his Princely Apparel, and avows himself. Which Duke Leopold understanding, sent presently to have him apprehended: But K. Richard refusing to yield himself to any, but to the Duke himself; the Duke himself came and led him to his own Palace honourably enough, but yet strongly guarded: Whereof as soon as Henry the Emperor heard, he sent with great Instance to Duke Leopold to send K. Richard over to him, under Pretence of safer Custody, but with a purpose indeed to be a Sharer in his Ransome. And the Duke, tho' well knowing his Meaning, yet knowing withal that it was not for him to deny the Emperor, he sent him over to him; who soon after put him into a prison he had called Trivallis, into which no Man was ever known to be put that escaped with Life, tho' done perhaps to him but in terrorem, to draw the better Ransom from him. That with which K. Richard was charged, beside the Wrong done to Leopold in throwing down his Colours at Ptolemais, was the Death of Conrade Duke of Tyre, whom they pretended K. Richard had murdered. Wherein tho' K. Richard made his Innocency appear by the Testimony of Limboldus, who confessed himself to have been the Author of the Marquess's Death; yet the Pretence served to detain him in Prison: And in Prison indeed they kept him, till his Ransom was agreed upon and paid. Which being 100000 Pounds, 80000 was paid in Hand, whereof two Parts to the Emperor, a third Part to Duke Leopold; and for the rest, Hostages given to the Number of fifty, of whom the Bishop of Roan was one: Tho' the Hostages afterward were delivered without paying the rest; for Henry the Emperor dying shortly after, his A.D. 1192. Successor had the Conscience not to take it, as knowing it had been unjustly exacted. And indeed the Accidents that befel both the Emperor and the Duke Leopold, were evident Demonstrations of the Injustice they had done; for the Emperor shortly after died, and the Duke Leopold in a Tilting for Solemnity of his Birth-day, fell off his Horse, and so broke his Leg, that to save his Life, he was fain to have his Leg cut off. And now after fifteen Months Imprisonment, K. Richard is released, and returns into England four Years elder than he went out; and thus ended his Journey to the Holy Land. Yet one memorable Accident happening to him in the Holy Land, may not be omitted, that going one Day a Hawking about Joppa, finding himself weary, he laid himself down upon the Ground to sleep, when suddenly certain Turks came upon him to take him: But he awakened with their Noise, riseth up, gets a Horseback, and drawing out his Sword, assaults the Turks, who feigning to flee, drew the King into an Ambush where many Turks lay, who had certainly taken him if they had known his Person; but one of the King's Servants, called William de Patrelis, crying out in the Saracen Tongue, that he was the King, they presently laid hold upon him, and let the King escape.

Troubles in his Dominions in his Absence.

KING Richard at his going out of England had so well settled the Government of the Kingdom, that it might well have kept in good Order during all the Time of his Absence; but Disorders are Weeds which no Foresight can hinder from growing, having so many Hands to water them: Where Occasions of Distaste are no sooner offered than taken; and oftentimes taken before they be offered, as was here to be seen. For King Richard had left in chief Place of Authority William Longshampe Bishop of Ely; a Man who so carried himself, that altho' the Things he did were justifiable, yet the Pride with which he did them was unsufferable; seldom riding abroad without 500, some say 1000 in his Train; not for Safety, but for State: And tho' there were other left in Authority besides himself; yet his Power was so predominant, that he made of them but Cyphers, and ruled all as he list himself. This Insolency of governing was soon distasted by many, and especially by John the King's Brother, who counting the Greatness of his Birth an equal Match, at least with any substitute Greatness, affronted the Bishop in the managing of Affairs in such sort, that while some adhered to the one, and some to the other, the Kingdom in the mean time was in danger to be rent asunder; till at last the Bishop finding himself too weak, or at least fearing that he was so, but rather indeed deposed from his Authority by the King's Letters, and the Archbishop of Roan put in his Place, thought it best for him to flee the Realm. Whereupon for his greater Safety, disguising himself in Woman's Apparel, and carrying a Web of Cloth under

This disgrace made him glad to get into Normandy, his native Countrey, where to little purpose he wooed K. Richard and Queen Eleanor for Reparation. But this was but a Sport in comparison of the Mischiefs done in Normandy by Philip King of France; for first he invades Normandy, where he takes many Towns, and amongst others Gisors, and draws the King's Brother John to combine with him, promising to assist him in winning the Kingdom of England, and to have his Sister Adela, whom K. Richard had repudiated, to be his Wife: With which Promise Duke John had been ensnared, if his Mother Queen Eleanor had not dissuaded him. But in England Duke John took upon him as King, persuading the People that his Brother K. Richard was not living; and indeed it was easie to remove, they knowing him to be a Prisoner, to the affirming him to be dead: But such was the Faithfulness of the Archbishop of Roan, and other the Princes of the Realm to K. Richard, that they opposed Duke John, and frustrated all his Practices; and the Bishop of Ely had told him plainly, That tho' K. Richard were dead, yet the Succession in the Kingdom belonged not to him, but to Arthur Duke of Britain, Son of Geoffery his Elder Brother. And in these terms K. Richard found his State when he returned from the Holy Land.

His Acts and Troubles after his returning from the Holy Land.

AT his coming home from the Holy Land, the first thing he did, was to give his Lords and People Thanks for their Faithfulness to him in his Absence, and then for their Readiness in supplying him for his Ransom. But as for his Brother John, in whom Ungratefulness seemed to strive with Ambition, which should be the greater in him, he depriveth him of all those great Possessions he had given him; some ado he had to make found certain Pieces which he had corrupted, as the Castles of Marlborough, Lancaster, and a Fortrefe at St. Michael's Mount in Cornwal; but chiefly the Castles of Nottingham and Titchil, which stood so firmly for Duke John, that they were not reduced to Obedience without some Blood, and much Expence. But his greatest Trouble was with Philip King of France, in whom was so ingrafted a Spleen against K. Richard, that he seemed to be never well but when he was working him some Ill. Now therefore K. Richard, to make it appear he had not left the Holy War for nothing (having first obtained in Parliament a Subsidy towards his Charges, and caused himself to be new Crowned at Winchester, when the King of Scots bore one of the three Swords before him, lest the People thro' his long Absence might have forgotten they had a King) he departs with 100 Ships into Normandy; but it was withal upon this Occasion: Sitting one Day at dinner in his little Hall, (as it was called) News was brought him that K. Philip had besieged Vernueil, with which he was so moved, that he swore a great Oath he would not turn his Face till he were revenged. Whereupon he caused the Wall right before him to be presently beaten down, that so he might pass forward without turning his Face; and thus in haste he goes to Vernueil, whither he was no sooner come, but the King of France made as great haste to be gone, not without some Loss and more Disgrace. Here his Brother John submits himself to him, and with great shew of Penitence intreats his Pardon, which he readily granted; saying only, I wish you may as well remember your Fault, as I shall forget it. The King of France having left Vernueil enters Touraine, and near to Vendosme pitcheth his Tents: Thither K. Richard follows him, and with his coming so affrighted him, that leaving Bag and Baggage, Munition, Tents, and Treasure, to a marvellous Value, he got him gone, and glad he was so rid of K. Richard. After this a Truce was agreed upon for a Year, which each of them longed till it was expired; as having no Pleasure but in troubling one another. In this Time there was a Trouble at home, tho' not to the King, yet to the Kingdom. For Robin Hood, accompanied with one Little John, and 100 stout Fellows more, molested all Passengers upon the High-way: Of some it is said, that he was of Noble Blood, at least made Noble, no less than an Earl, for some deserving Services; but having wasted his Estate in riotous Courses, very Penury forced him to take this Course. In which yet it may be said he was honestly dishonest; for he seldom hurt any Man, never any Woman; spared the Poor, and only made Prey of the Rich; till the King setting forth a Proclamation to have him apprehended, it happened he fell sick at a certain Nunnery in Yorkshire, called Birkleys; and desired there to be let Blood, was betrayed, and bled to Death. Such another Trouble, tho' not to the King, yet to the Kingdom, fell out by reason of the Jews; and first at the Town of Lynne in Norfolk upon this Occasion: A Jew being turned Christian, was persecuted by those of his Nation, and assaulted in the Street; who thereupon flying to a Church hard by, was thither also followed, and the Church assaulted; which the People of the Town seeing, in Succour of the new Christian, they fell upon the Jews, of whom they slew a great Number, and after pillaged their Houses. By this Example the like Assaults were made upon the Jews at Stamford, and after that at Lincoln, and lastly, at York, where an infinite Number of Jews were massacred; and some of them block'd up in the Castle, cut the Throats of their Wives and Children, and cast them over the Walls upon the Christians Heads, and then burnt both the Castle and themselves. Neither could this Sedition be stayed, till the King sent his Chancellor the Bishop of Ely, with Force of

His last Trouble was a Punishment of Covetousness; for one Guydomer having found a great Treasure in the King's Dominions, and for fear of K. Richard, flying to a Town of the King of France for his Safeguard, was pursued by the King; but the Town denied him Entrance; and he thereupon going about the Walls to find the fittest Place for assaulting it, one Bertram de Gerdon, or as others call him, Peter Basile, shot at him with a Cross-Bow, and hit him on the Arm, of which Wound he died within four Days after, and so ended all his Troubles.

OF Taxations properly so called, there were never fewer in any King's Reign; but of Ways to draw Money from the Subject, never more. It is true, the first Money raised for his Journey, was all out of his own Estate, by selling or pawning of Lands; but then at his coming back, he resum'd the Lands into his Hands again, without paying back the Money he had received. This, if it may not have the Name, yet certainly it had the Venom of a bitter Taxation. Likewise the feigning to have lost his Seal, and then enjoining them to have their Grants confirmed by a new; tho' it went not in the Number, yet it had the Weight of a heavy Taxation where it lighted. Afterward, the Money raised for his Ransom, was not so properly a Taxation, as a Contribution; or if a Taxation for him, yet not by him; which was done in his Absence, by the Subjects themselves. And indeed no Taxations are commonly so pinching, as those which are imposed upon the Subject by the Subject, and such was this; for to raise Money for his Ransom, there was imposed upon every Knight's Fee twenty; of all Lay-men's Revenues the fourth part; and the fourth part of all the Revenues of the Clergy, with a tenth of their Goods. Also the Chalice and Treasure of all Churches were taken to make up the Sum. Afterward, this only was a plain Taxation, and granted in Parliament; that of every Plough-land thro' England, he would have two Shilings, and of the Monks Cisteaux, all their Wool of that Year. And one more great than this, and was this Year imposed towards his Wars in Normandy, that every Hide of Land, as much as to say every 100 Acres of Land, should pay 5 s. which computed without Deductions, will rise to a Sum that will seem incredible.

HIS Ordinances were chiefly for the Meridian of London; for where before his Time the City was governed by Portgraves, this King granted them to be governed by two Sheriffs and a Mayor, as now it is. And to give the first of these Magistrates the Honour to be remembered, the Names of the Sheriffs were Henry Cornbill, and Richard Reyner; and the Name of the first Lord-Mayor was Henry Fitz-Aldwyn, who continued Lord-Mayor during his Life, which was four and twenty Years. But Fabian who was himself a Sheriff of London, and by that means most likely to know the Truth, affirmeth that the Officers ordained now by K. Richard, were but only two Bayliffs: And that there was no Mayor nor Sheriff of London till the tenth Year of K. John; and therefore at that Year I will begin their Catalogue. But howsoever, now began the City first to receive the Form State of a Commonwealth, and to be divided into Fellowships and Corporations, as at this Day they are: And this Franchise was granted in the Year 1189, the first Year of K. Richard the First. He made also divers Ordinances concerning the Measures of Corn, and Wine, and Cloath; and that no Cloath should any where be dy'd of any other Colour than black, but only in principal Towns and Cities. Also he ordained Justs and Tournaments to be holden for Exercise of his Gentry in Arms.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

THE Church within his own Dominions was quiet all his Time, no Contestation with the Pope, no Alterations amongst the Bishops, no Difference between the Clergy and the Laity, or the Clergy amongst themselves: They also seemed to be asleep, till they were afterwards awakened in the Time of the succeeding King. But abroad in his Time there was an Addition of three Orders of Devotion; the Order of the Augustine Friars, called Friars Mendicants, begun by William of Paris; then the Orders of Friars Minors begun by St. Francis; and lastly, the Orders of Friars Preachers, begun by St. Dominick, tho' not confirmed till the first Year of Pope Honorius.

New Orders of Friars.

Works of Piety in his Time.

WORKS of Piety are for the most part Works of Plenty. Penury may inwardly have good Wishes, but outwardly it can express but little. And indeed all parts of the Kingdom, all sorts of People were drawn so dry, by the two great Occasions of his Journey and his Ransom, and afterward by the Taxations, that the richest Men had enough to do to maintain themselves, without being at any Charge to make Provision for others. All Works of Piety were now for the Service of the Holy Land; and therefore it may well pass, if not for a Work of Devotion, at least worthy to be remembered, that William Bishop of Ely built the outer Wall of the Tower of London, and caused a deep Ditch to be made about it, with an intention the River of Thames should have surrounded it; tho' it could not be effected. Only Hubert Walter, who at one time was Archbishop of Canterbury, the Pope's Legate, Lord Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice, and the immediate Governor under the King, both in Wales and England, founded a Monastery at West-Derham in Norfolk, where he was born; begun another at Wolverhampton; and finished a Collegiate Church at Lambeth.

Of

Of his Wife and Children.

IN his Infancy he was contracted to a Daughter of Raymond Earl of Barcelone, after that affianced to Adelia, or Alice, Daughter of Lewis King of France, yet married to neither of them; but he married Berengaria, Daughter of Garfias King of Navarre, whom his Mother Queen Eleanor brought unto him into Sicily, from whence passing into Cyprus, their Marriage was there solemnized. Afterward going forward to the Holy Land, he carried her and his Sister Jane Q. of Sicily along with him, where they remained till his return home, and then sent them to pass to Sicily, and from thence into England: But that ever she came into England, no Mention is made, neither what became of her after she parted from K. Richard at the Holy Land. But Children certainly he had none either by his Wife, or by any Concubine, unless we reckon as a Priest in Normandy did, who told K. Richard he had three Daughters; and the King marvelling who they should be, seeing he knew of none he had; Yes (saith the Priest) you have three Daughters, Pride, Covetousness, and Letchery. Which the King taking merrily, called to the Company about him, and said, I am told by a Priest here, that I have three Daughters, and I desire you to be Witnesses how I would have them bestow'd; My Daughter Pride upon the Templars and Hospitalers; my Daughter Covetousness upon the Monks of the Cistercian Order; and my Daughter Letchery upon the Clergy.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his Time the Town of Mawling in Kent, with the Nunnery, was consumed with Fire. And in his Time the Bones of Arthur the famous King of Britain were found at Glastenbury in an old Sepulchre, about which stood two Pillars, in which Letters were written, but could not be read. Upon the Sepulchre was a Cross of Lead, whereupon was written, Here lieth the Noble King of Britain, Arthur. Also in this King's Days for three or four Years together, there reigned so great a Dearth, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for 18 Shillings 8 Pence; and then followed so great a Mortality of Men, that scarce the Living sufficed to bury the Dead.

K. Arthur's Sepulchre found.

A great Dearth.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of Stature, and well proportioned; fair, and comely of Face; of Hair bright abourn, of long Arms, and nimble in all his Joints; his Thighs and Legs of due Proportion, and answerable to the other Parts of his Body. To speak of his moral Parts, his Vices for the most part were but only upon Suspicion: Incontinency in him, much spoken of, nothing proved. But his Virtues were apparent, for in all his Actions he shewed himself valiant, (from whence he had the Appellation or surname of Cœur de Lion) Wife, Liberal, Merciful, Just, and which is most of all, Religious. A Prince born for the Good of Christendom, if a Bar in his Nativity had not hindered it. The Remorse for his Undutifulness towards his Father, was living in him till he died; for at his Death he remembred it with bewailing, and desired to be buried as near him as might be, perhaps as thinking they should meet the sooner, that he might ask him Forgiveness in another World.

K. Richard, why called Cœur de Lion.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE died of a Wound with an Arrow in his Arm, shot at him by one Bertrad, or Peter Basile, which neglected at first, and suffered to rankle, or as others say, ill handled by an unskilful Chyrurgeon, in four Days brought him to his end. But his Charity deserves to have it remembred, that finding himself past hope of Recovery, he caused the Party that had wounded him to be brought before him; who being asked what moved him to do this Fact? answered, That K. Richard had killed his Father and two of his Brothers with his own Hand, and therefore he would do it if it were to do again. Upon this insolent answer, every one looked the King should have censured him to some terrible Punishment; when contrary to all their Expectations, in a high Degree of Charity, he not only freely forgave him, but gave a special Charge he should be set at Liberty, and that no Man should dare to do him the least Hurt; commanding besides to give him 100 Shillings for his Pains. An act that well shewed he had been at the Holy Land, or rather indeed that he was going to it. But the Policronicon saith, That after K. Richard was dead, the Duke of Brabant, who was then present, caused the said Bertrad to be flayed quick, and then to be hanged. He died the sixth Day of April, in 1199, when he had lived 44 Years, reigned nine, and about nine Months, and had his Body buried at Font-Evraud, by his Father: His Heart at Roan, in Remembrance of the hearty Love that City had always born him; and his Bowels at Chalons, for a Disgrace of their Unfaithfulness: others say at Carlisle in England.

K. Richard's charitable mind at his Death.

Men of Note in his Time.

IN his Time were famous, Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, who followed K. Richard into the Holy Land, and died there; Hubert that succeeded him; Hugh Bishop of Lincoln; William Bishop of Ely, a Man equally famous and infamous; also Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, a learned Writer in Divinity; Daniel Morley a great Mathematician; John de Herbam, and Richard de Herbam, two notable Historians; Gulielmus Stephanides, a Monk of Canterbury, who wrote much in the Praise of Archbishop Becket; also one Richard Divisiensis, Nicholas Walsington, and Robert de Bello Foco, an excellent Philosopher. Of Martial Men, Robert Earl of Leicester, Ranulph de Fulgeres, two of the Bardolphs, Hugh and Henry; three Williams; Marshall, Brunel and Mandevill; with two Roberts, Rose and Seveville.

KING Richard being dead, the Right of Succession remained in Arthur, Son of Geoffery Plantagenet, elder Brother to Earl John; but John, as thinking the Title of Arthur but a Criticism in State, and not for every one's Capacity, at least in common Sense not so plain as his own, who was the Son of a King, and Brother to a King, ascends into the Throne as confidently as if he had no Competitor: Only Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury went before, and made an Oration in his behalf, wherein seeking to do him a Courtesy, he did him indeed a Wrong; for waving his Right of Succession, he insisted wholly upon their Right of Election, whereof would follow, that as they brought him in, so they might cast him out; of which Error when he was told, he said, He did it of purpose to make K. John the more careful of his Government, by making him sensible upon what an unsure Ground his Regality stood. K. John resented it; but seeing it to serve his turn for the present, he took it not ill, as knowing that his Turn once served, he could afterward be his own Carver of what Title he pleased; and so upon Ascension-day in the Year 1199, he was Crowned King at Westminster, with more Solemnity than Joy: Many prefacing by their Countenances, and more in their Minds, That all would not long be well. It cannot be denied, but that in moral Circumstances, Earl John had the Advantage of his Nephew Arthur; for he was a Man of Years fit to govern, Arthur but a Child, not thirteen Years old; he a Native, at least always bred up in the Kingdom; Arthur a Foreigner, and had never been here; he well known both to the Nobility and People; Arthur a Stranger to both, as one they had never seen. And besides these moral Advantages, he had now added one from the Politicks, That he had gotten Possession; (of more Force in the practical part than all the former) and withal a greater than all these, if it be true which some write, That his Brother K. Richard had assigned him his Successor after his Decease. But yet knowing the Title at last would come to be tried in a Court, where the Sword must be Judge, he employeth all his Endeavours to get this Judge to be his Friend, and by all means possible to strengthen himself with Arms; and thereupon going to Chinon and Roan, he seisseth upon the Treasure which his Brother had left in those parts, and with it gets Friends and Soldiers, the Armour of Arms. And indeed all he could have done himself would have done him no good, if he had not had the help of able Assistants, who yet assisted him no less for their own ends than for his. And these were chiefly his Mother Queen Eleanor, who knew if her Grandson Arthur should be King; that then his Mother Constantia would rule all, at least during his Minority, and thereby her self be put from the stage of all Authority: And the Archbishop Hubert, who also knew that if Arthur should come to reign, that then the Angevins and French should have all the best Offices, and the English wholly be neglected, as it was in the Time of K. William the Conqueror: And yet a greater Friend than both these; for coming to Roan, he used means, that Walter the Archbishop in the Cathedral Church with great Pomp girt him with the Ducal Sword of Normandy, and crowned him with a Coronet of Golden Roses, he taking his Oath for faithful Administration in that Dukedom, and they their Oath for being Loyal Subjects.

THOU' K. John had entred upon Normandy, and made that Province sure unto him; yet the Province of Anjou stood firm for Arthur, in observance of their Love to his Father their former Prince; which also K. John soon after invading, reduceth by Force of Arms to his Obedience. And now Constantia, the Mother of Prince Arthur, finding K. John too powerful an Adversary, and no Likelihood for her Party to be able long to stand out against him without further Assistance, conceives it her best way to have Recourse to the King of France, and thereupon commits her Son Arthur to his Tutition; who seemed to receive him with the Tendernefs of a Father, and promiseth to assist him with his uttermost Forces, in the Recovery of his Right both in France and England. Here we may observe upon what Hinge the Affections of the King of France were used to turn. For in K. Henry the Second's Time, K. Lewis of France was so great Constantia, Prince Arthur's Mother, imploreth Aid of the King of France.

A.D. 1199. great a Friend to his Son Richard, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Father; afterward when Richard was King, then Philip King of France was so great a Friend to John, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Brother: And now that John is come to be King, he is presently grown so great a Friend of Arthur's, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Uncle; and no doubt if Arthur should ever have come to be King, he would have been as ready to help any other to get the Kingdom from him; by which it appears, that it was not the Persons of Men they either hated or loved, but that they were always jealous of their growing too great. And indeed this ballancing of States keeps Princes Affections always in Suspence, and never suffers the Glasse of their Love or Hate to make a true Reflection. About this Time, William King of Scots came to London to visit K. John, and there did Homage to him for his Kingdom of Scotland, tho' some say, but only for the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland: But being required Aid against the French, he excused himself, saying, He could not do it without Consent of his Kingdom, and so returned home.

The King of Scots doth Homage to K. John.

And now Philip King of France having undertaken the Protection of the young Prince Arthur, with a mighty Army enters Normandy, takes many of the best Towns, and pursuing his Victories, enters the Province of Anjou also, and recovers it from K. John, which he the Year before had gotten from Prince Arthur. Upon this, K. John makes a Journey into Normandy, accusing K. Philip for breaking the Truce which he had formerly made with K. Richard for five Years. But when he should come to make his Accusation good by Arms, he falleth to Treaties, and obtaineth a new Truce for fifty Days: With which new Truce, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who had professed himself of that Side, was not well pleased, and thereupon cometh to K. John to Roan, and entering a new League with him, they there consult how to proceed, when the fifty Days should be expired. This Consultation the King of France understood; and thereupon both Sides prepare for War, but at the End of the Truce, both Sides seemed to relent, and divers Meetings were had for Treaties of Peace: And in Conclusion, K. John, more desirous of Peace than he was for his Honour, agreed to these Conditions, That his Niece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonfus K. of Castile, by his Sister Eleanor, should marry with Lewis K. Philip's Son, who should have with her in Dower, besides 30000 Marks in Money, all those Cities, except only Angiers, which the French before that Time had taken, which were very many and great. And this Peace thus made, he returns into England with great Joy, but was not with the like Joy received of the English Lords, who counted themselves dishonoured in the dishonourable Conditions he had made; and Baldwin Earl of Flanders also, when he saw the poor Spirit of K. John, to descend to such base Conditions, left his Party, and entering League with the King of France, disposed himself for the Holy War.

The English Lords are discontented with the Conditions of Peace.

But K. John having now gotten a Vacation, and a Time of Ease, which agreed much better with his Nature than Wars, sets his Mind wholly upon Pleasures; and for maintaining his Pleasures, upon seeking after Profit, which he pursues by all manner of Injustice, under the Name of Prerogative; and with such Violence, that when his Brother Geoffery Archbishop of York, in the Dutifulness of a Counsellor, adviseth him not to take such unlawful Courses, he most unworthily took from him all he had, and it was a Year's Work for all the Archbishop's Friends to pacify his Anger. The Lords refuse to do the King Service out of the Kingdom.

Consent, sent him Word, That unless he would restore them their Rights and Liberties, they would do him no Service out of the Kingdom. But what it was that made the Lords more violent in pressing their Demands at this Time than before, no Writers of these Times do sufficiently deliver: Only some of them speak scatteringly of certain Oppressions (besides the general Grievance for Exactions) lately offered to some of the Lords; one to the Earl of Chester, whom he would have banished, only for advising him to leave his Cruelty and Incontinency. Another, a Pursuit in Love to the Daughter of Robert Fitz-Water, called Maud the Fair, who not consenting to the King's Lust, a Messenger was sent to give her Poison in a Potched Egg, whereof she died: And the third offered to William de Brawse and his Lady, for a rash Word spoken; for when the King sent to have de Brawse's Son delivered him for a Pledge, the Lady answered, We shall do well indeed to commit our Son to his Keeping, who kept so well his own Nephew Prince Arthur. This rash Word cost de Brawse his Countrey, and his Lady and their Son their Lives, both of them being famished to Death in Prison. For tho' these directly were but particular Grievances, yet reflecting they were general, what one suffered, all might; but whether any of these, or all of these together, were the Ingredients to make a Compound of Violence in the Lords at this Time, or whatsoever was the true Cause, this was plainly the Effect, That unless the King would restore their Liberties, they would not follow him out of the Kingdom. But notwithstanding this Refusal of his Lords, he passeth over

But now Hugh Earl of March, resenting the Injury done him by K. John, in taking away his affianced Wife, joins with Prince Arthur; and the King of France also, for all his fair Shew of Amity lately made, joins with them, as having some time before married his youngest Daughter to Prince Arthur; and these, with their Forces joined, invade first the Turones, and then the Anjovins

John*, acquainting him with the Danger she was in, and required his speedy Succour. When in the mean time Prince Arthur takes the City, and in it his Grandmother Queen Eleanor, whom he used with greater Reverence and Respect than she expected. But K. John at the Hearing hereof, was so moved, calling the French King ungrateful and perfidious for succouring Prince Arthur contrary to his League, that studying presently the Art of Revenge, he fell upon a Stratagem of all other the most prudent against an Enemy. For a Surprise in War is like an Apoplexy in the Body, which strikes without giving Warning for Defence. And this Stratagem at this Time K. John put in Practice; for traveling Night and Day with indefatigable Labour, he came upon his Enemies before they were aware, and setting upon them unprovided, it was rather an Execution than a Battle: and they who remained unslain were taken Prisoners; amongst whom Prince Arthur himself, who committed presently to the Custody of Robert de Veypont in Roan, lived not long after. Whether it were, that attempting to make Escape, he fell down from the Walls of this Prison, and was drowned in the River Seyne, as some say: Or whether it were that thro' Anguish of Mind he fell sick and died, as others say: Or whether indeed he were made away by K. John, as the common Fame went; certain it is, that he survived his Imprisonment but a very few Days. But tho' he were gone, yet his Sister Eleanor, a preceding Competitor to K. John, was still remaining: Her therefore, at this time also K. John seized upon, and commits her in safe Custody to Bristol Castle, where after she had lived long, she died.

K. John by Celerity surprizeth his Enemies.

Prince Arthur is taken Prisoner, and soon after died.

Of his Troubles after the Death of his Nephew Arthur.

KING John being now freed from his Competitor, one would think he should have ended all his Troubles: But like a Hydra's Head, they rather multiplied upon him. For they who had been so ready to assist Prince Arthur in his Life, were now as ready to revenge his Death. And first, Constance his Mother comes to K. Philip, with open Exclamations against K. John, accusing him with the Murder of her Son, and with all the Instance of Tears and Intreaties, solicites him to revenge it. Hereupon A.D. 1202. K. Philip summons K. John to appear at a Day; and because he appeared not according to the Tenure of his Homage it was decreed against him, that he had forfeited all the Property of his Estate in France; and thereupon K. Philip with mighty Forces invades his Territories, takes many Towns of principal Consequence, while K. John lived idle at Roan, no more regarded it than if it had not at all concerned him. And when some of his Lords seemed to marvel what he meant to suffer the French to rob him of such good Cities; You say true indeed (saith he) for it is but robbery; and within a few Days you shall see I will make him restore them back with Usury. In this slighting Humour he returns into England, where he looks not after the levying of Soldiers, or the raising of an Army, as this Case required, but continues his old Courses for raising of Money, accusing sometimes one of his Lords, sometimes another, as if it were their Fault that he had lost these Towns in France. And upon these Accusations made many of them pay great Sums of Money, which brought him not only into Hatred at home, but into Contempt abroad; for the King of France understanding his unworthy Courses, proceeds more violently in his Invasions than before, getting Falais, Damfront, and all the good Towns of Normandy, but only Roan. And at last, tho' Roan was a Town strongly fortified with Walls, and more strongly with the faithful Hearts of the Inhabitants; yet finding no hope of Succour from K. John, it was forced for want of Victuals to Submit it self to the King of France. Whose Example all the other Cities followed; and so all Normandy returned to the Subjection of the French, after three hundred and sixteen Years that Rolla the Dane had first possess'd it.

King John's Carelessness.

All Normandy lost by K. John.

It was now the Year 1205, and the sixth of K. John's Reign, about which Time, the two Props of his Estate or rather indeed two Bridles of his intemperancy died, his Mother Queen Eleanor, whose Virtues had oftentimes qualified the Vices of her Son; and Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, who repented him at his Death of nothing more, than that he had been an Instrument of bringing him to the Crown.

A.D. 1205.

And now K. John being a Substantive of himself, hath a Device in his Head to make his Subjects as willing to give him Money as he was to have it: For knowing the great Discontentment they all had for their Losses in France, he gives it out, that he would presently raise an Army for Recovery of these Losses, if he might have Money to go about it: Whereupon never was Money given with more Alacrity. And as soon as he had it, he instantly went to Portsmouth, and there took Shipping before it was possible for his Lords and others to be in Readiness to accompany him; and sailing forward some certain Leagues into the Sea, upon a sudden he returns back again, and then lays the Fault upon his Lords, that had not followed

A.D. 1205. lowed him: And for this Backwardness of theirs, imposed afterwards great Fines upon them, by which means he got Money no less by Pretence of his not going, than he had done before by Pretence of his going. About this Time died Geoffery Fitz-Peter, Justiciar of England, who while he lived kept the King in some Awe; infomuch, as hearing he was dead, he swore by the Feet of God, that now at length he was King of England, and with great Rejoicing said to some Lords about him, Now when this Man comes into Hell, let him salute the Archbishop Hubert; whom certainly he shall find there. But Philip King of France intending to leave the English nothing on that Side the Sea, invades Chinon, and takes it; and in it the valiant Captain Roger Lacy, which had given a Period to K. Philip's Victories, had not Guido, the Husband of Constantia, Prince Arthur's Mother, revolted to K. John. Who with his Assistance once again levies an Army, besieged Mount Auban, a Castle thought impregnable, and within fifteen Days takes it, which Charles the Great could not get with his seven Years Siege: Where so great a Number of French Lords were taken Prisoners, that K. John sent a Catalogue of their Names into England, for a Memorial of so great a Victory. After this, he taketh the strong Town of Angiers, and utterly defaceth it; for which afterward he was sorry, as being the Town where he was born. But now when the two Kings were ready to meet, and to give Battle, Intercession was made by Friends on both Sides, and thereupon a Peace concluded for two Years, and K. John returned into England.

K. John passeth into Ireland, and reduceth it to Obedience.

He subdueth the Welsh Rebels, and takes twenty eight Pledges of them.

Upon their rebelling again, he hangs up all their Pledges.

A.D. 1214. It was now the Year 1214, and the fourteenth of K. John's Reign, when he going to Angiers, strongly repairs it, and the Province of Poitou revolted to him; which Lewis K. Philip's Son understanding, comes upon them with a mighty Army, and uses much Severity upon the Authors of the Revolt, takes Prisoners Reynald

Earl of Boloinne, and William Earl of Sa-A.D. 1214 lisbury, with many other of K. John's Captains, and defeated his whole Army. K. John's Army defeated by the French, and thereupon a Truce. Whereof when K. John was certified, he grew in a manner desperate, and as a Man dejected, makes a new Truce upon any Conditions with the King of France, and returns into England, where he finds a worse Business ready to entertain him. For the Lords of the Realm having often required their ancient Rights and Liberties, and finding nothing but Delusions, endure no longer to be abused; but meeting at St. Edmundsbury, they there confer how they might find a Remedy to redress this evil, and at last concluded to go to the King themselves in Person, and make their Demands; whereof a Charter was produced, that had been formerly granted in K. Henry the First's Time. Whereupon coming to the King after Christmas, lying then in the New Temple, and acquainting him with their Demands, he gives them this fair Answer, that within a few Days he would give them Satisfaction; and causeth the Bishops of Canterbury and Ely, with William Marshall, Earl of Glocester, to pass their Words for him that it should be performed. But the King meaning nothing less than to do as he said, falls presently a levying of Soldiers, which the Lords understanding, they all did the like; and going to the Bishop of Canterbury, deliver him a Copy of their Demands, and required the King's Answer: But the Bishop shewing it to the King, and humbly intreating him to give the Lords a Satisfactory Answer, he swore a great Oath, they might as well demand the Kingdom; and that he would dye before he would yield to any such Demands. Whereupon the Lords (knowing now what they were to trust to) fall to besiege Northampton, and after that Bedford, which is yielded to them; and withal they are sent to by the Londoners to signify their Readiness to join with them. At this time the King was at Windfor, providing an Army, but hearing the Londoners were joined with the Lords, thought it no good way to proceed by Force, but rather by Fraud; and thereupon sends to the Lords, that if they would come to him to Windfor, he would grant their Demands. The Lords coming thither, but in a military Manner, (for they durst not trust his Word) the King saluted them all kindly, and promised to give them Satisfaction in all they demanded; and so in a Meadow between Windfor and Stanes, called Running-Mead, he freely consented to confirm their former Liberties; and was content some grave Personages should be chosen to see it performed. But the next Day, when it should be done, he gets him gone to Southampton, and from thence to the Isle of Wight; where Advising with his Council what in this Case was fittest to be done; it was concluded he should send to the Pope, to acquaint him with this Mutiny of the Lords, and to require his Help: While the King in the mean

And now the Lords begin to suspect Fraud, when shortly after the King's Messengers who were Walter and John, Bishops of Worcester and Norwich, return with the Pope's Decree, which was, That the King's Grant to the Lords should be void. With this Decree, the King after three Months that he had staid in the Isle of Wight, coming back to Windsor, acquaints the Lords; but they accusing the Messengers for false informing the Pope, and the Pope also for making a Decree without hearing both Sides, betake them to Arms, and swear by the holy Altar to be revenged for this Ludification and injurious Dealing. The King finding the Lords nothing mov'd with the Pope's Decree, sends again unto him, to acquaint him with it, who mightily incensed to have his Decree so slighted, adjudged them all to be held as Enemies of Religion; and gives Power to Peter Bishop of Winchester, and to the Abbot of Reading, to excommunicate them. In the mean time the King had sent the Bishop of Worcester, Chancellor of England, and others, with his Seal, to hire Soldiers from the Parts beyond the Seas; who returning shortly after, bringeth along with him out of Poitou and Gascony, Savery de Malcon, Geoffry and Oliver Boteville, Brothers; and under their Conduct so great a Rabble, that with these Forces, within half a Year the King had gotten all the Castles of the Barons, to the Borders of Scotland. And now he divides his Army, committing part of it to his Brother William Earl of Salisbury, and others, to set upon London, and with the other part he goes himself into Yorkshire, where most of the Lords had possession, which in most cruel manner he destroyed with Fire and Sword. The Lords being thus on all Sides distressed, resolved upon a Course, neither honourable nor safe; yet such as Necessity made seem both; they send to Philip King of France, requiring him to send over his Son Lewis to their Aid, and promising they would submit themselves to be governed by him, and take him for their Sovereign. To this Motion of the Lords, K. Philip was as forward as themselves; which K. John understanding, sends again to the Pope, requiring him to use his Authority to stay the King of France from coming. But K. Philip, tho' much regarding the Request of the Pope, yet nothing so much as the Acquest of England, with all speed provides an Army; and with a Fleet of 600 Sail, sends over his Son Lewis; who passing into England, landeth at Sandwich, whither many of the Lords and others resort unto him; and giving Oaths of Allegiance, join themselves with him. K. John at that time was at Dover, but not daring to stay there for fear of the Enemy, he commits the Castle to Hubert Burgh, and goeth himself to Canterbury, and from thence to Winchester in the manner of a Flight; which Prince Lewis understanding, A.D. 1216. went strait to London, and by a plausible Oration makes that City sure unto him; and thither came to him the King of Scots, with an Army of choice Soldiers, as also the Earls, Warren, Arundel, Salisbury with many others. And now Prince Lewis passeth all the Countrey over without resistance, but not without infinite Outrages committed by his Soldiers, which was not in him to hinder. And then coming to Norwich, he takes that City easily, but Dover cost him a longer Siege, as being defended by the valiant and loyal Captain Hubert Burgh. In this mean while K. John finding his Enemies employ'd in these difficult Sieges, sends about and gathers a Rabble of all raskal People to him; and with them runneth over all the Countrey, spoiling and killing in most barbarous manner. And now was the Kingdom made the Stage of all the Miseries of Rapine and Cruelty; two Armies in it on Foot at once, each of them seeking to prey upon the other, and both of them upon the Countrey. But the King coming to Walpool in Norfolk, where the Washes were to be passed over, he sendeth one to search where the Ford was passable, and there himself with some few passed over; but the Multitude, with all the Carriages, passing without Order, they cared not where, were all drowned; with which Disaster the King thro' anguish of mind fell into a Fever, whereof within a few Days he died. And here was an end of all the Troubles of this King; in whom it is observable, that loving his Ease so well as he did, he should run voluntarily into such Troubles, especially at home, upon so small Occasions as he did; but it should seem there is no greater Hindrance to Men for accomplishing their Will, than their own Wilfulness.

Of his Taxations.

TO speak of his Taxations, it may not improperly be said, that it was but one continued Taxation all his Reign through; yet to divide it into two Parts; his first was the Taxation of three Shillings upon every Plough-land thro' the Kingdom, to pay the 30000 Marks for his Niece Blanch's Portion; and to mend this Taxation, he seizeth upon all the Temporalities of his Brother Geoffery Archbishop of York, for opposing it; and for a Continuation, he makes a Progress shortly after into all the North Parts, where he exacts great Fines of Offenders in his Forests. Very shortly after, solicited by the Pope's Legate, he grants a Subsidy of the fortieth Part of all his Subjects Revenues for one Year, to succour the Holy Land. Shortly after this, he chargeth his Earls and Barons with the Losses he sustaineth in France, and thereupon fines them to pay the seventh part of all their Goods; neither spared he the Church, or the Commons in this Imposition. Before this Year is ended, another Levy is made at a Parliament in Oxford, wherein is granted two Marks and a half of every Knight's Fee, for military Aid; neither are the

the Clergy exempted from paying their Part. And before another Year is out, another Imposition is laid of the thirteenth part of all Moveables and other Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. It may be reckoned amongst his Taxations, that when the Monks of Canterbury had displeased him about the Election of their Archbishop, he seized upon all their Goods, and converted them to his own Use: And presently after this, upon the like Displeasure, he deposes many Bishopricks, Abbeyes and Priories into the Hands of Lay-men, and confiscates all their Revenues. To these may be added, that he took 11000 Marks of Silver of the King of Scots, for granting him Peace. Add to these also great Sums of Money exacted and gathered from the Jews, among whom there was one that would not be ransomed, till the King caused every Day one of his great Teeth to be pulled out by the space of seven Days; and then he was content to give the King 10000 Marks of Silver that no more might be pulled out, for he had but one left. Add to these, that at his return out of Ireland he summoned all the Prelates of the Kingdom to appear before him; of whom he extorted for their Redemption the Sum of 100000 Pounds Sterling. Add lastly to these, that at his Return out of Wales, he exacts of every Knight that attended him not in that Expedition, two Marks.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE was the first that appointed the Forms of Civil Government in London, and other Cities, endowing them also with their greatest Franchises. The first that caused Sterling Money to be here coined: The first that ordained the honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earls: The first that settled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such other Necessaries of Commerce: The first that planted English Laws and Officers in Ireland: The first that enlarged the Royal Style with the Lord of Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdom, and fastened Wales to the Crown of England.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

AFTER the Death of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the Monks of that Convent secretly in the Night elected one Reginald, their Sub-Prior, to succeed him; and caused him to go to Rome for Confirmation: But afterward, doubting how the King would take it, being done without his Knowledge, they crave Leave of the King to chuse a fit Man; the King is content to allow them the Election, but requires himself to have the Nomination, and thereupon commends unto them John Grey Bishop of Norwich, whom he specially favoured, and accordingly the Monks elect him. But the Matter being afterward referred to the Pope, which of these two Elections should stand good, after many Allegations of both Sides, the Pope, to shew himself indifferent to both, disallows them both, and nominates a third Man, one Stephen Langton, Cardinal of St. Chrysgone, an English Man born, and a Man of great Learning. The Monks admit him, but the King opposeth it. And now as it were, a Prize began to be played between the two Swords, the Spiritual and the Temporal: But he that used the Spiritual Sword, proved so much the better Fencer, that he disarmed the other, and took away his Temporal Sword from him. It is true, in the first Venue, the King gave the Pope as good as he brought; for as the Pope threaten'd the King to excommunicate him, and to interdict the Kingdom, so the King threaten'd the Pope to nullify his Authority, and to banish the Clergy-men out of the Realm. In the second Venue, as the Pope acted as much as he had threaten'd, (for he interdicted the Kingdom;) so the King performed as much as he had spoken, for he drove the Monks out of their Cloisters. Yet at last when Pandulphus the Pope's Legate came into England, and made appear to the King in what great Danger he stood, first, of the King of France, by Invasion; and then of his own Subjects, by Rebellion; for both which, there was no other Help but Reconcilement with the Pope; he so touched him to the Quick, that he made him leave his great Words, and fall to asking Forgiveness. So as taking off the Crown from his Head, he laid it down at Pandulphus Feet, to be disposed of as the Pope should please. And Pandulphus stuck not to take up his Crown, and to keep it three or four Days in his Hands before he restored it; and did not then neither, but upon Condition that he and his Successors should hold the Kingdom of the See of Rome at the annual Tribute of 1000 Marks. And all those three or four Days in which Pandulphus kept the Crown, it might be truly said the Kingdom was without a King. And upon this, no doubt it was that Peter an Hermit in a prophetic Rapture had given out some time before, that by Ascension-Day there should be no King of England. Which tho' in some sort it was true, yet because in some sort it was not true, and it was in the Prerogative of the King to make his own Interpretation, it cost the poor Hermit and his Son their Lives, and they remain as a Pillar of Salt to make Men take heed of Ludere cum Sanctis, and of playing the Criticks in Matters of State.

I Need not relate a Speech of his, tho' very unchristian; that having been a little before reconciled to the Pope, and then having an Overthrow in France, in great Anger he cried out, That nothing had prospered with him since the Time he was reconciled to God and the Pope. Nor another Speech of his, which tho' spoken merrily, was in good Earnest very irreligious; that being on a time a hunting, at the Opening of a fat Buck, he said, See how this Deer hath prospered, and how fat he is, and yet I dare swear he never heard Mass. It is sufficient to relate one Act of his, (if it be true which some write) that being in some Distress, he sent Thomas Hardington, and Ralph Fitz-Nichols, Knights, in Embassage to Mirammulim King of Africk and Morocco, with Offer of his Kingdom to him, upon Condition he would come and aid him; and that if he prevailed, he would himself become a Mahometan, and renounce the Christian Faith. Tho' some there be that say, All these were but false Criminations charged upon him by Monks that did not love him. But though we believe not these Things of him; yet to suffer his Kingdom to stand interdicted so many Years together, upon so small Occasion as he did, was certainly no good Sign of Religion in him. Yet one Act he did, wherein he shewed a Respect to Religion, by the Honour he did to a religious Man. For Hugh Bishop of Lincoln lying very sick, he not only went to visit him; but being dead, was one of the three Kings (the other two were William King of Scotland, and the King of South Wales) that carried his Herse upon their Shoulders, till they delivered it to the Peers, and the Peers afterward to the Archbishops and Bishops to carry it into the Quire.

YET did this King leave more Works of Piety behind him, than all his Subjects that were in his Time: For he founded the Abbey of Beaulieu in the New Forest in Hampshire: Also an Abbey of Black Monks in the City of Winchester, and the Monastery of Faringdon, and the Monastery of Hales-Owen in Shropshire: He re-edified Godstow and Wroxwel: and enlarged the Chapel of Knariborough. Now for his Subjects, only Richard Prior of Bermondsey builded an House against the Wall of the said House of Bermondsey, called Almary, or Hospital of Converts and Children, in Honour of St. Thomas.

The Stone Bridge of London finished.

In this King's Time St. Mary Overy's in Southwark was begun to be builded, and the Stone-Bridge over the Thames was by the Merchants of London finished. Also Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury founded a Monastery at West Derham in Norfolk, which upon the Dissolution came to the Family of the Derhams, who hold it to this Day.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

FROM the first Year of the Reign of King Richard the First, the City of London had been governed by two Bailiffs; but the King in his tenth Year taking Displeasure against them for denying his Purveyors Wheat, caused them to be imprisoned, till thirty five of the chief Citizens repaired to him, and acquainting him what small Store the City had, how the Commons were ready to make Insurrection about it, he was then satisfied; and moreover at their Suit, granted them to have a Mayor and two Sheriffs to be yearly chosen nine Days before Michaelmas; which Order hath continued, tho' with some Alteration in the Time of their Election to this Day. Also in this King's Time, five and thirty of the most substantial Citizens of London were chosen out, and called the Council of the City. He caused the Laws of England to be executed in Ireland, and Money to be coined there according to the Weight of English Money.

Of his Wives and Children.

KING John lived to have three Wives. His first was Alice Daughter of Hubert Earl of Morton, who left him a Widower without Issue. His second was Avice Daughter and Heir of Robert Earl of Gloucester, by whom no Issue neither; divorced from her by reason of Consanguinity in the third Degree. His third Wife was Isabel, Daughter and Heir of Aymer Earl of Angoulesm, affianced before to Hugh le Brun Earl of March. By this Wife he had two Sons, Henry and Richard, and three Daughters, Jone, Eleanor and Isabel: Henry succeeded him in the Kingdom; Richard was Earl of Cornwal, and crowned King of the Romans, and had Issue Henry and John, that died without Issue; also Edward Earl of Cornwall, and others. Jone his eldest Daughter married to Alexander the Second, King of Scots, died without Issue. Eleanor the second Daughter (married to Simon Earl of Leicester) had Issue, Henry, Simon, Almarick, Guy, Richard, and Eleanor. Henry slain without Issue. Simon Earl of Bigorre, and Ancestor to a Family of the Mountfords in France. Almarick first a Priest, after a Knight. Guy Earl of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitor of the Mountfords in Tuscany, and of the Earls of the Campo Bacchi in the Kingdom of Naples. Richard remaining privily in England, and changing his Name from Mountford to Wellesbourn, was Ancestor of the Wellesbourn's in England. Eleanor born in England, brought up in France, married into Wales, to Prince Lewis ap Griffith. Isabel, his youngest Daughter, married to the Emperor Frederick the Second, had Issue Henry, appointed to be King of Sicily, and Margaret Wife of Albert Lantgrave of Thuring. She died in Childbed, after she had been Empress six Years. He had also also two natural Sons, Geoffery Fitz-Roy, and Richard, that married the Daughter and Heir of Fulbert de Dover, (who built Childham Castle) and had Issue by her, of whom some Families of good Account are descended. Also one base Daughter, named Jone, married to Lewellin Prince of Wales.

K. John's Intemperance.

HE was of Stature indifferent tall, and somewhat fat, of a sower and angry Countenance; and concerning his Conditions, it may be said, that his Nature and his Fortune did not well agree: For naturally he loved his Ease, yet his Fortune was to be ever in Action. He won more of his Enemies by Surprizes than by Battels; which shews that he had more of Lightning in him than of Thunder. He was never so true of his Word as when he threaten'd, because he meant always as cruelly as he spake, not always as graciously; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to perform, must have looked upon his Promises. He was neither fit for Prosperity nor Adversity: For Prosperity made him insolent, and Adversity dejected; a mean Fortune would have suited best with him. He was all that he was by Fits: Sometimes doing nothing without Deliberation, and sometimes doing all upon a sudden: Sometimes very Religious, and sometimes scarce a Christian. His Unsatiableness of Money was not so much, as that no Man knew what he did with it: gotten with much Noise, but spent in Silence. He was but intemperate in his best Temper; but when distemper'd with Sickness most of all, as appeared at his last, when being in a Fever, he would needs be eating of raw Peaches, and drinking of sweet Ale. If we look upon his Works, we must needs think him a worthy Prince; but if upon his Actions, nothing less: For his Works of Piety were very many, as hath been shewed before; but as for his Actions, he neither came to the Crown by Justice, nor held it with Honour, nor left it in Peace. Yet having had many good Parts in him, and especially having his Royal Posterity continued to this Day, we can do no less but honour his Memory.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

Hail-stones as big as Goose-Eggs.

A strange Monster.

ONE Casualty we might count disastrous, if it had not had relation to our selves: For Hugh de Bones coming to aid K. John with 60000 out of Britain and Flanders, by Misfortune at Sea they were all drowned, to whom the King had granted Norfolk and Suffolk for the People he had brought with him to inhabit. In this King's Time were great Thunders and Lightnings, and Showers with Hail-stones as big as Goose Eggs. Fishes of strange Shape were taken in England, armed with Helmets and Shields, and were like unto armed Knights, saving that they were far greater in Proportion. About Maidstone in Kent, a certain Monster was found stricken with the Lightning, which Monster had a Head like an As, a Belly like a Man, and all other Parts far differing from any other Creature. Also in Suffolk was taken a Fish in Form like to a Man, and was kept six Months upon Land with raw Flesh and Fish; and then for that they could have no Speech of it, they cast it into the Sea again.

Of his Death and Burial.

WHEN Prince Lewis of France was come into England, and was received by the Lords, and by the Londoners, K. John with an Army went into the North Parts; and coming to Walpool, where he was to pass over the Wash, he sent one to search where the Water was passable, and there himself with some few passeth over, but the Multitude with all his Carriages and Treasure passing without Order, they cared not where, were all drowned. With the Grief of which Disaster, and perhaps distempered in his Body before, he fell into a Fever, and was let Blood; but keeping an ill Diet, (as indeed he never kept good) eating green Peaches, and drinking sweet Ale, he fell into a Loosness and grew presently so weak, that there was much ado to get him to Newark, where soon after he died. Tho' indeed it be diversly related; Caxton saith he was poisoned at Swineshead's Abbey by a Monk of that Covent; the Manner and Cause this: The King being there, and hearing it spoken how cheap Corn was, should say, He would ere long make it dearer, and make a Penny Loaf be sold for a Shilling. At this Speech the Monk took such Indignation, that he went and put the Poison of a Toad into a Cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him, There was such a Cup of Wine as he had never drank in all his Life, and therewithal took the Assay of it himself, which made the King to drink the more boldly of it; but finding himself presently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him, that he was fallen down dead; Then (saith the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much. Others say the Poison was given him in a Dish of Pears. But the Physician that disbowelled his Body found no Sign of Poison in it, and therefore not likely to be true. But howsoever the manner of his Death be uncertain, yet this is certain, that at this Time and Place he died, on the 19th Day of October, in the Year 1216, when he had reigned seventeen Years and six Months, lived one and fifty. He was buried, his Bowels at Croxton Abbey, his Body at Worcester, under the High Altar, wrapped in a Monk's Cowl, which the Superstition of that Time accounted sacred, and a Defensative against all evil Spirits.

King John thought by some to be poisoned.

A Monk's great Virtue.

Of the Prices of Things in his Time.

NEITHER is this unfit to be recorded in Chronicles, to the end Comparison may be made between the Time past and the present: As in the Time of K. Henry the Second, a Quarter of Wheat was sold for twelve Pence, a Quarter of Beans or Oats for a Groat. Neither is the Price of Silver it self it self much less altered; for an Ounce of Silver was then valued at twenty Pence, which is now valued at least at five Shillings. Whereof Philosophers must tell the Reason; for seeing Scarcity makes Things dear, why should not Plenty make them cheap?

Of Men of special Note in his Time.

Hubert Burgh a most loyal Servant to K. John.

Robert Fitz-Water, his Valour.

IN Military Matters there were many famous Men in his Time, as Robert Fitz-Roger, and Richard Mount-Fitcher, with many others; but chiefly two whose Acts make them specially memorable: The one was Hubert Burgh, whom K. John had left Governor of Dover-Castle; of whom it is related, that when the Prince Lewis of France came to take the Town, and found it difficult to be taken by Force, he sent to Hubert, whose Brother Thomas he had taken Prisoner a little before, That unless he would surrender the Castle, he should presently see his Brother Thomas be put to Death with exquisite Torments before his Eyes: But this Threatning moved not Hubert at all, who more regarded his own Loyalty than his Brother's Life. Then Prince Lewis sent again, offering him a great Sum of Money; but neither did this move, but he kept his Loyalty as inexpugnable as his Castle. The other was Robert Fitz-Water of whom it is related, That K. John being with an Army in France, one of his Knights in a great Bravery would needs make a Challenge to any of the French Camp, that durst encounter him in a Combat; when presently comes forth this Robert Fitz-Water, and in the Encounter threw Horse and Man down to the Ground: Whereof when K. John heard, By God's Tooth (saith he) he were a King indeed that had such a Champion; whereupon some that stood by, said to him, He is, Sir, a Servant of your own, it is Robert Fitz-Water, whom you have banished. Whereupon his Sentence of Banishment was presently reversed, and the King received him, as he well deserved, into special Favour. In Matter of Literature also there lived many famous Men in this King's Reign, as Geoffery Vinesaufe, Simon Fraxinus, alias Ash; Adam Dorensis, John de Oxford, Colman surnamed the Wise; Richard Canonicus, William Peregrine, Alane Tevicksbury, Gervasius Dorobernensis, John Hanwil, Nigel Worker, Gilbert Holland, Bennet de Peterborough, William Parvus a Monk of Newburgh, Roger Hoveden, Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Theologus, Gervasius Tilburiensis, Gyraldus Cambrensis, Johannes Devoniensis, Walter Mapis, Radulphus de Diceto, Gilbert Legly, Mauricius Morganius, John de Fordeham, William Leicester, Joceline Brakeland, Roger of Crowland, Hugh White, alias Candidus, who wrote an History intituled, Historia Petroburgensis; John de Saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray, an Historiographer, and Bishop of Norwich, Walter of Coventry, Radulphus Niger; and lastly, Simon Thurway, who for his Pride in Learning, but more for his Blasphemies against Moses and Christ, became at last so utterly ignorant, that hardly he could read a Letter of a Book. One yet remains that must not be forgotten, Hugo Caribufianus Bishop of Lincoln, whose Miracles, as Matthew Paris writes, made him famous in those Days: And the Works he hath left behind him, famous in these.

King HENRY III.

A.D. 1216.

KING John being dead, his eldest Son Henry was next to succeed: Who being but nine Years old, tho he were capable of having his Right, yet he was scarce capable of understanding his Right; especially there being another at that time, to whom a great part of the Kingdom had sworn Allegiance. But those Lords who had been constant to the Father, notwithstanding his Faults, were more tender of the Son, who was altogether Innocent, and whose gracious Aspect gave no small Hope of a better Disposition. Amongst all which Lords, there was none so eminent in Worthiness, none so near him in Alliance, as William Marshal Earl of Pembroke, who had married his Aunt; and he drawing the rest of the Lords together, with a solemn Oration in Behalf of the young Prince, so confirmed them, and so ordered the Matter, that on the 28th Day of October, in the Year 1216, he was crowned at Glocester, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Joceline Bishop of Bathe, in the Presence of Guallo the Pope's Legate, and many Lords and Bishops. Where besides the Oath usually taken by all Kings at their Coronation, to bear Reverence and Honour to God, and to his Holy Church, and to do Right and Justice to all his People, he did Homage besides to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent for his Kingdom of England and Ireland; and took his Oath for the true payment of the 1000 Marks which his Father had granted to the Church of Rome. This done, William Earl of Pembroke, by a general Consent was assigned Protector of the Realm during the King's Minority. In which Place the first thing he did, was to give Notice of the new King's Coronation to all the Countries round about; and to proclaim Pardon to all Offenders that within a time limited should come and submit themselves to him. In the mean time Prince Lewis of France, who at his hearing of K. John's Death, thought himself then sure of enjoying the Kingdom quietly, and that he should need to fear no more Opposition; now that he hears of the new King's Crowning, and that so solemnly, and with so unanimous a Consent, begins to think himself in worse case than before, and to grow jealous of the English Lords that had adhered to him, what they would do in this new World. And indeed a Conflict was already grown in their Minds, which of the two Obligations should be the greater, either that of their Oath to Prince Lewis, or that of their Allegiance to K. Henry. They could not but think it extream Ungratefulness to forsake Prince Lewis, whom they had themselves invited to come; and they could not but think it extream Undutifulness to stand out in Opposition against K. Henry their natural Sovereign. And that which added no small Weight to this Scale, was a Discovery lately made by the Viscount Melun a French Lord, at the time of his Death, who confessed, as a matter of Conscience, That Prince Lewis had vowed, if once he got the Kingdom, utterly to extirpate all the English Nobility, and to admit none but French to any Place of Dignity. Neither was it perhaps the least Cause that moved many to leave the Party of Prince Lewis, that Guallo the Pope's Legat had threatened to excommunicate him, and as many as should adhere unto him. But whether any of these Reasons, or any other, were their motives, certain it is, that many of them, of whom were principal, the Earls of Arundel, Warren, Salisbury, and William the eldest Son of the Protector, shrunk from Prince Lewis, and went to K. Henry, as thinking no Obligation so great as Allegiance: And many again continued constant to Prince Lewis, as thinking no Obligation so great as an Oath. And now Prince Lewis, to cast the Dice of Fortune before his Enemies, tho' they had gotten them a Head, should gather to a Head, and draw more Forces together, stayed himself at London, sent his Lieutenants with an Army of 20000, to take in as many Towns as they could; and many they took with small Opposition: But coming to Lincoln, where tho' they had the Town it self, yet the Castle stood out, and had been defended by a noble Lady a whole Year before, they found such Resistance, that their Proceedings were there arrested. For thither came presently, William the Protector, with his Son William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Earls of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Albemarle; William de Albinet, William de Cantilup, Thomas Bassett, Robert Vipont, Brent, de Lisle, Geoffery Lacy, and many other Barons, with all the Power of the young King; who with wonderful Violence assault the City. At which time it was propounded by the French, to sally forth and give them Battel, but conceiving their Army to be greater than indeed

A.D. 1216.

The Lords doubt to whom they would adhere.

Many Lords shrink from Prince Lewis.

A.D. 1216. it was (for the English had set double Ensigns to every Company, which made a Shew of twice as many as they were) they forbear that Course, and kept themselves within the Town: By which means being cooped up, and straitned in Place, so as they could not make use of their Forces, as otherwise they might, they were in Conclusion all defeated; and all the principal Men of the English that had adhered to Prince Lewis were taken Prisoners; as namely, Saer Earl of Winchester, Henry de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt, lately made Earl of Lincoln by Prince Lewis; Robert Fitz-Water, Richard Mount-Fitchet, William Mowbray, William Beauchamp, William Mandet, Oliver Harcourt, Roger de Cressley, William Solville, William de Ros, Robert de Ropsley, Ralph Chenduit, Barons; besides 400 Knights, or Men at Arms. Only the Earl of Perch their General, being compassed about, and willed to render himself, swore he would never become a Prisoner to any English; and thereupon was run thro' the Sight of his Helmet into the Brains, and instantly died. This was a main Blow to Prince Lewis, and the last of his Battels in England; and because the City was very rich in Merchandise, the English in Derision called it Lewis Fair. But Prince Lewis was not yet discouraged, for he had sent to K. Philip his Father to send him new Supplies out of France; and new Supplies were indeed sent, but Hubert de Burgh Governor of Dover, being as vigilant as he was valiant, watched their coming, and in a Sea-fight defeated them all, of whom but few escaped. And now this Blow at Sea was so much greater than that at Land; that where that made him only doubt, this made him despair, at least made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by Composition. Whereupon it was at last concluded, That Prince Lewis should have 15000 Marks for the Charges he had been at, and abjure his Claim to any Interest in the Kingdom; and withal to work his Father for Restitution of such Provinces in France as appertained to this Crown; and that when himself should be King, he should resign them in a peaceable manner. On the other part, K. Henry takes his Oath; and from him the Legate Guallo, and the Protector, to restore unto the Barons of the Realm, and other his Subjects, all their Rights and Privileges, for which the Discord began between the late King and his People. After this Prince Lewis is honourably attended to Dover, and departs out of England about Michaelmas, above two Years after his first Arrival.

And now the Kingdom is come to Unity within it self, one King and one People; and for a Year or two there was but little to be done, only some few there were, whom the Corruption of the Times had engendred, and who being born in a Storm, could not live in a Calm; of whom the principal were the Earl of Albemarle, Robert de Vipount, Foweke de Brent, Brian de Lisle, and Hugh de Baliol; who bustling about, got Possession of Castles: With what Intention all Men knew, but with what Hope of effecting their Intention, no Man could imagine; for being but a handful of Men to the Body of the Realm, they were easily suppressed; and either brought to acknowledge their Faults, or else punished for not acknowledging them. It was now the fourth Year of K. Henry's Reign; at which time William E. of Pembroke, Protector of the Realm died, and was buried in the new Temple at London, in whose Place came the Bishop of Winchester. And now was the King the second time crowned, and had granted him by Parliament for Escuage, two Marks of Silver of every Knight's Fee, for the Affairs of the Kingdom, and Recovery of his Transmarine Dominions, which is now designed: And Malleon de Saveroy, the Poictovin, with William Long-Sword Earl of Salisbury, sent over to try the Affections of that People, whom they find for the most part inclinable to the Obedience of this Crown. But the King of France being required peaceably to deliver them, made Answer, That having gotten them by the Sword, by the Sword he would hold them. But now the King being come to some Years of Understanding, was in a Parliament holden at London, put in mind by the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Oath he had taken for the Confirmation of the Liberties of the Kingdom; which tho' oppugned by some (and especially by William Brewer, and Hubert de Burgh, whom the King had now made his chief Justiciar) as having been an Act of Constraint; yet the King then again ratified, and twelve Knights, or other legal Men of every Shire, by Writs, were charged to examine what the Laws and Liberties were which the Kingdom enjoyed under his Grandfather, and that they should return them by a certain Day. And here the King by Parliament resumeth into his Hands such Alienations as had been made by his Ancestors of any Crown Land. The next Year after, another Parliament is held at Westminster, wherein is required the fiftieth part of all the Movables, both of the Clergy and Laity, for the Recovery of those Parts in France, withheld from the Crown by Lewis, now King, contrary to his Oath and Promise made here in England at his Departure; which tho' it concerned the honour and Dignity of the Kingdom, and the Estates of most of the Nobility; yet would it not be yielded to, but upon Confirmation of their Liberties, which in the end was obtained, in the same Words and Form as K. John had granted them in the two Charters before: And twelve Knights are chosen in every Shire to dispart the old Forests from the new, and the new to be laid open and ploughed, and improved to the great Comfort and Benefit of the Subject; and two Years they were accordingly enjoyed.

Of his Acts after he came to be of Age.

IT was now the tenth Year of K. Henry's Reign, and being about 19 Years of Age, he claimed to take the Government of the Kingdom into his own Hands, and no longer to be under a Protector: And now will presently appear the Difference between a Prince that is ruled by good Counsel, and a Prince that will do all of himself, and take no Advice.

For

A.D. 1220.

An. Reg. 4. The Protector dieth. In his Place the Bishop of Winchester is chosen.

K. Henry is the second time crowned.

K. Henry confirms the Liberties of the Kingdom.

He resumeth Crown Lands.

A.D. 1225.

An. Reg. 9.

He confirms the two Charters granted by K. John, Magna Charta, and Charter Foresta.

A.D. 1226.

An. Reg. 10. He takes the Government upon himself.

A.D. 1226. For 13 Years he was ruled by a Protector, all passed as it were in a Calm, without Noise or Clamour; but as soon as he took upon him the Government himself, there grew presently Storms and Tumults; no Quietness either to the Subject or to himself; nothing but Grievances all the long Time of his Reign. For at the Parliament now holden at Oxford, as soon as he was crowned again, he presently cancels and annuls the Charter of the Forests, as granted in his Nonage, and therefore he not bound to observe it: And then not using any longer the Seal which the Protector had used, he makes a new, and causeth Proclamation to be made, That whosoever would enjoy any Benefit of Grants under his Seal, should come and have them sign'd by his new Seal, by which Course he drew much Money from many; and this was the first Grievance.

He annuls the Charters which he granted before.

He makes a new Seal.

The Lords confederate against King Henry, and why.

King Henry makes a Journey into France, but without Success.

Shortly after, he commits the keeping of Barkhamstead Castle to one Walleran a Dutchman, which Castle belonged to his Brother Richard of Cornwall; but when Earl Richard required to have the Possession, as of Right he ought, it was then plotted by Hubert Burgh Chief Justice, and the King's chief Counsellor, to commit him to Prison; which the Earl understanding, or at least suspecting, flies presently to Marlborough, where he finds William Earl Marshal his vowed Friend, with whom he hastens to Stamford, and there meets with the Earls of Chester, Gloucester, Warren, Hereford, Ferrers, Warwick, and divers other Barons; who all confederate together, and send to the King, That unless he restore the Castle to his Brother, and to them the Liberties of Forests, which he had lately cancelled at Oxford, they would seek to recover them by the Sword. Hereupon K. Henry, to pacify his Brother, not only renders the Castle to him, but gives him besides all that his Mother had in Dower; and also great Possessions which the Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Bologna lately deceased, had in England: But to the Petition of the Lords he made a dilatory Answer; and this was another Grievance.

Not long after, K. Henry is persuaded by Hugh le Brun, Earl of March, who had married his Mother, to make a Journey into France, for Recovery of his Right there; but the Earl persuaded it for Ends of his own, which to have discover'd, had been no way to compass them: He must therefore lay some Colours upon his Work; and it was Colour enough that the Action would be of great Benefit to the King, if it might succeed; and the Likelihood of succeeding was most apparent, by reason of the great Inclination of the People to King Henry, and their great Averseness from K. Lewis. Upon those Colours K. Henry undertaking the Action, raiseth great Sums of Money from the Clergy, and from the Londoners, for Redemption of their Liberties, and takes the third part of all the Goods of the Jews; but when he returned home a Year after, without having done any thing but spent his Treasure and his Time, and that which was more worth than both these, the Lives of many Noblemen and others; this was another Grievance.

And now K. Henry bringing many Poitevins over with him, who had served him in his Wars, he was to reward them here; which he could not do, but by displacing and spoil of his Officers. First therefore he calleth Ralph Britton, Treasurer of his Chamber to Account, and grievously fines him for defrauding him in his Office. Then likewise is Hubert de Burgh, chief Justiciar, and his chief Counsellor, called to Account for such Treasure as passed his Office; who being farther charged with Crimes of Treason, flies to the Church of Merton for Sanctuary: From whence when the King commanded him to be drawn out by Violence, the Bishop of London hearing of it, commanded him to be returned back to Sanctuary, upon Pain of Excommunication: But the King commanding him to be kept from Sustenance, Hunger at last enforced him to render himself to the King's Mercy; all his Goods, which were very great, confiscate. Also Walter Bishop of Carlisle is thrust out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Rodon Knight, from his Place of Marshal of the King's House; and all the chief Counsellors, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom are removed as distrusted, and only Strangers preferred to their Rooms. Of which course, Peter de Ru-pibus, a Poitevin, Bishop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis, the King's special Favourite, were said to be the Authors; and this was another Grievance.

Poitevins placed in their Rooms.

Nine Years had thus passed, with divers Grievances in his Government; and being now about eight or nine and twenty Years old, a Consultation was had for a fit Wife for him. There was propounded a Sister of Alexander King of Scots; but it was not thought fit the King should marry the younger Sister, when Hubert de Burgh had married the elder: He therefore takes one of his own chusing, and marries Eleanor, Daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence; by which Match he neither had Portion by his Wife, nor Strength of Alliance by Friends; or if any were, it was all made vain by distance; only he had by her a number of poor Kindred, who to his great Cost lay hanging upon him: Yet was the Marriage solemnized with as great Charges, as if he had been to have Mountains with her: And this was another Grievance.

A.D. 1235. An. Reg. 19.

K. Henry marries to more Charge than Benefit.

And now is the Score of these Grievances called upon to be paid; for the Lords could no longer endure so many Indignities, to see themselves slighted, and only Strangers advanced, as Foulk de Brent, who held the Earldoms of Nottingham, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, and others the like: And to see their Persons exposed to Danger, and their Estates to Ruin; for which no Remedy could be, but only the King's confirming their Charter of Liberties: Wherein it is strange to observe upon what different Grounds the King and the Lords went. It seems the King thought, to confirm that Charter were to make himself to be less than a King; and the Lords thought, that as long as it was denied, they were no better than Slaves: And as the King could endure no Diminution, so the Lords could endure no Slavery; but the King might keep his own with sitting still, the Lords

A.D. 1235.

The Lords confederate again for their Charters.

The Lords summoned to a Parliament, refuse to come.

They threaten to chuse a new King.

The Lords proclaimed Out-Laws, and their Estates seised on.

Earl Marshal by a Train drawn into Ireland, is there by Treachery slain.

The Bishops threaten to excommunicate the King.

The King calls home the Lords, and removes Strangers.

Lords could not recover their own but by Motion. And seeing their strength must be in their Number, hereupon they confederate together; and of this Confederacy, Richard, now Earl Marshal, upon the Death of his Brother William, is chief; then they repair to the King, and boldly shew him his Error, and require Satisfaction. Hereupon the King sends presently over for whole Legions of Poictovins, and withal summons a Parliament at Oxford, whither the Lords refuse to come. After this, a Parliament is called at Westminster, whither likewise they refuse to come, unless the King would remove the Bishop of Winchester and the Poictovins from the Court: And more than this, they send him Word, that unless he did this, they would expel both himself and his evil Counsellors out of the Land, and create a new King. Upon this Threatening, Pledges are required of the Nobility for securing their Allegiance, and Writs are sent out to all who held by Knights-service to repair to the King at Glocester by a certain Day; which the Earl-Marshall and his associates refusing, the King without the Judgment of his Court and their Peers, causeth them to be proclaimed Out-Laws, seisseth upon all their Lands, which he gives to his Poictovins; and directs out Writs to attach their Bodies wheresoever in the Kingdom. But now of these confederate Lords, the Bishop of Winchester won the Earls of Chester and Lincoln with a 1000 Marks; and the King had so pleased his Brother the Earl of Cornwal, that he likewise left them. Whereupon they withdrew into Wales, and confederate with Llewellyn Prince of Wales; whither also came Hubert de Burgh, escaped out of Prison, and joins with them; taking intermutual Oaths, That no one without other should make their accord. Hereupon the King goeth himself in Person into Wales, where not prevailing, he returns to Glocester, implores new Forces of Strangers, but all without Success. At last a Friar is employed to persuade the Earl-Marshall to submit himself to the King, but all in vain; till at length a Train is laid to draw him over into Ireland, to defend his State there, being seisset upon by the King; where by Treachery circumvented he lost his Life, Militia flos temporum modernorum, saith Matth. Paris. Yet the King disavows the sending of any such Commission into Ireland, protesting he never knew thereof; and lays the Fault upon his Officers. An easy way for Princes never to be found in Fault.

After two Years Affliction, a Parliament is assembled at Westminster, wherein the Bishops admonish the King by his Father's Example to be at Unity with his People, and to remove from him Strangers, and to govern the Kingdom by Natives of the Realm, and by the Laws; otherwise they would proceed by Ecclesiastical Censure, both against his Counsellors and himself. The King seeing no way to subsist but by temporizing, consents to call home those Lords out of Wales; restores them to their Places and Possessions; removes all Strangers from about him; and calls his new Officers to account. Hereupon the Bishop of Winchester, Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen

Segrave, take Sanctuary; but afterward A.D. 1235. by Mediation they obtained with great Fines their Liberty, dearly paying for their two Years Greatness. After this, a Parliament is again called, which the King would have to be kept in the Tower, whither the Lords refusing to come, another Place of more Freedom is appointed; in which Parliament, Order is taken for removing all Sheriffs from their Places, upon Complaint of Corruption: And here the King displaceth his Steward, and offers to take from the Bishop of Chichester, then Chancellor, the great Seal, which he refuseth to deliver, as having received it by the Common-Council of the Kingdom: And now Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Segrave, are received again into Grace; by which may appear the Vicissitude of Fortune in Princes Favours. After this, in the 21 Year of his Reign, another Parliament is held at London, where the King requires the 13th part of all the Movable, as well of the Clergy as Laity; which being directly opposed, the King promiseth by Oath, never more to injure the Nobility, so they would but relieve him at that present. After four Days Consultation, the King promising to use only the Counsel of his natural Subjects, and protesting against the Revocation lately propounded, and freely granting the inviolable Observation of their Liberties, under Pain of Excommunication, a Subsidy is granted him; but so, that 4 Knights be appointed in every Shire to receive and deliver the same, either to some Abbey or Castle, where it may be safely kept; that if the King fail in Performance of his Grants, it may be restored to the Countrey from whence it was collected. And now the King to make a Shew of true Reconciliation for his part, suddenly calls the Earls Warren, and Ferrers, with John Fitz-Geoffery, to be sworn his Counsellors: Yet was neither of the points either for removing of Strangers, or for disposing the Money observed afterward by the King; for the Money he made bold to take at his Pleasure; and for Strangers, they were so far from removing, that they were drawn nearer to him. For now William Valentine, Uncle to the Queen, is grown the most inward Man with him, and nothing done but by his Counsel; also the Earl of Provence, the young Queen's Father, a poor Prince, had a good Share of the Money that was collected: And Simon de Mountford, a French-Man born, is entertained by the King, and preferred secretly in Marriage to Eleanor the King's Sister, Widow of William Earl of Pembroke, the great Marshal, and is made Earl of Leicester, by Right of his Mother Avis, Daughter of Blanchman Earl of Leicester. Which Courses so incense the Nobility, that it put them out into a new Commotion; and Richard the King's Brother becomes one of the Party, whom the other Lords make their Spokesman to the King, to aggravate his Breach of Promise, and to acquaint him with all the Disorders of the Kingdom, with whose Remonstrance the King is so moved, that after he had tried the Londoners, and found them also to partake with the Lords, he calls a Parliament at London, whither the Lords came arm'd for their own Safety.

The Chancellor refuseth to deliver the Seal.

A.D. 1237.
An. Reg. 21.

The King grants their Liberties, and thereupon hath a Subsidy granted, but with Conditions.

But the Conditions not performed.

The Lords thereupon confederate again.

They come armed to the Parliament.

A.D. 1237 Where, after long debating, the King taking his Oath to refer the matter to certain grave Men of the Kingdom, Articles are drawn, sealed, and publickly set up to the view of all, with the Seals of the Legate, and divers great Men: But before it came to be effected, the Earl of Cornwall, by the working of Simon Mountford, hath his Edge rebated, and is brought to be unwilling to meddle in the matter any more; which the other Lords seeing, they also grew cold, and so for that Time it rested, and no more was done in it. About this Time a certain fanatick Fellow had got into the King's Chamber in the Night, having a naked Knife in his Hand, with a resolved Purpose to kill him: But finding him not there (for the King lay that Night with the Queen) he then went looking about to find him out; but being taken, and confessing who were his Accomplices, he was afterward drawn in Pieces with wild Horses. So provident a Care hath God to protect his Anointed!

An. Reg. 22. And now is the King's Turn to play his Part in using his Authority, which he fails not to do to the uttermost; for upon a small Occasion he causeth the Gates of Gilbert, now Earl of Pembroke (the third Son of William the Great Marshal) to be shut against him at Winchester: Whereupon the Earl retires into the North. Also Simon Norman, Master of the King's Seal, and his greatest Favourite, is thrown out with Disgrace, and his Brother Geoffry, a Knight Templar, is put out of the Council; both of them for not yielding to pass a Grant from the King made unto Thomas Earl of Flanders, the Queen's Uncle, of four Pence upon every Sack of Wool. And now, that Load enough is laid upon those of the Laity, comes a new Load to be laid upon the Clergy. For the Pope nothing dainty to make use of the Power he had in the King, sends over three hundred Romans, requiring to have the first Benefices that should be vacant bestowed upon them: Which seemed so unreasonable a Request, and to the Clergy of England so damageable, that it made Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury to give over all, and betake himself to a voluntary Exile in the Abby of Pontignac in France; yet to shew his Respect to the Pope, gave him eight hundred Marks before his Departure. And to lay more Weight upon the Clergy, great Sums are also required of them for Maintenance of the Pope's War against the Emperor; which, though the Clergy opposed, and shewed many good Reasons of their Oppositions both to the King and the Legate; yet by Promises or Threatnings, they were won or forced to yield unto it. And now comes the Earl of March, and once again solicites the King to make another Journey into France; which being yielded to by the King, and assented to in Parliament, Aid presently was demanded towards it: But this Demand was not only opposed, but all the King's Taxations and Aids before granted, were now repealed; and thereupon an absolute Denial to grant any more. Upon this, the King comes to the Parliament himself in Person; earnestly, and indeed humbly craving their Aid for this once: But all prevailed not, they had made a Vow to the contrary; and the King is driven to get what he could of particular Men, of A.D. 1238 whom, partly by Gift, and partly by Loan, he gets so much, that he carries over with him thirty Barrels of Sterling Money. This Expedition had no better Success than the former; for after a whole Year's Stay, the King was driven to make a dishonourable Truce with the King of France, and return home. At his Return he put the Jews to another Redemption, and the Londoners to another Exaction; and to help on his Charge, his Wife's Mother, the Countess of Provence, comes now to visit him, who bringing her Daughter Zancha with her, a Marriage is solemnized between her and Richard Earl of Cornwal, whose Wife was lately dead, and he returned from the Holy Wars. The old Countess at her Return is presented with many rich Gifts, having besides received an annual Pension of four thousand Marks out of England, for five Years past, in Consideration of a Pact made, That King Henry, after her Decease, should have the Earldom of Provence: But shortly after her Return she disappoints him of that, and bestows it upon her youngest Daughter Beatrix, married to Charles the French King's Brother, who was after King of Naples and Sicily; so as this Countess lived to see all her four Daughters Queens: Richard Earl of Cornwal, coming after to be elected King of the Romans. Upon these Profusions, a Consultation is had for new Supplies, and no Way thought so fit as by Parliament; hereupon a Parliament is again assembled at Westminster, whither the King comes again himself in Person, urging his Necessities, yet nothing would be granted without the Assurance of Reformation and due Execution of the Laws. And here they desire to have it ordained, That four of the most grave and discreet Peers should be chosen as Conservators of the Kingdom, and sworn of the King's Council, both to see Justice administered, and the Treasure issued; and these, or two of them at least, should ever attend about the King. Also that the Lord Chief Justiciar, and the Lord Chancellor, should be chosen by the general Voices of the States assembled, or else be one of the Number of those four. Besides they propounded, that there might be two Justices of the Benches, two Barons of the Exchequer, and one Justice for the Jews; and those likewise to be chosen by Parliament. But while these Things were in debating, comes one Martin, a new Legate from the Pope, with a larger Commission than ever any before, to exact upon the State; but at the same Time, Letters coming from the Emperor Frederick, to entreat that the Pope might have no more Supplies out of England, the Pope's Mandate is rejected, and his Agent Martin disgracefully sent home. This Business took up so much Time, that nothing else was done in this Parliament, but only an Aid granted to the King for the Marriage of his Daughter to Alexander King of Scots, twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee, and that with much ado, and Repetition of his former Aids.

The Winter following he assembles another Parliament, wherein he moves for an Aid upon a Design he had upon Wales, and to pay his Debts, which were urged to be so great, that he

He returns out of France without Success.

The King again in Person demands a Subsidy, but is denied, without granting the Lords Demands.

That the Chief Justice and L. Chancellor should be chosen by the Parliament.

The Pope's Legate for Money rejected.

Aid to marry the King's Daughter granted.

The King sheweth his Necessity, and requires Relief, but could is denied.

A.D. 1238 could not appear out of his Chamber for the infinite Clamour of such to whom he owed for his Wine, Wax, and other Necessaries of his House; but they all to his Face refused to grant him any thing. Whereupon other violent Courses are taken; an antient Quarrel is found out against the City of London, for which they are commanded to pay fifteen thousand Marks; and Passeleve, the Clerk, is employed, with others, in a most peremptory Commission, to enquire of all such Lands as had been inforested, and either to fine the Occupiers thereof at their Pleasure, or else to take it from them, and sell the same to others; wherein such Rigour was used, that Multitudes of People were undone. But now to shew the King the Estate of his Kingdom, and the Oppression of Popes, Enquiry was made of the Revenues which the Romans and Italians had in England; which were found to be annually sixty thousand Marks; being more than the yearly Revenues of the Crown; which so moved the King, that he caused the same to be notified, with all other Exactions, to the General Council now assembled at Lions. And this (with the ill Usage of his Agent Martin) so vexed the Pope, that he is said to have uttered these Words: It is Time to make an End with the Emperor, that we may crush these petty Kings; for the Dragon once appeased, or destroyed, these lesser Snakes will soon be trodden down. But upon the Pope's rejecting the Consideration of these Grievances of England, and despising the King's Message (who he said began to Frederize) it was absolutely here ordained under great Penalty, that no Contribution of Money should be given to the Pope by any Subject of England: And the King for a Time assents unto it. But being of an irresolute and wavering Nature, and afraid of Threats, he soon gave over what he undertook, so as the Pope continued his former Rapine; and though he had promised never to send any more Legates into England, yet sent he other Ministers under the Title of Clerks, that had as great Power as Legates, and effected as much.

Hereupon he raiseth Money by violent Courses.

The King assents that no more Contribution be given to the Pope. But soon revokes.

And now for the other Part of the State; new Occasions also of Complaint were offered. Peter of Savoy, Earl of Richmond, comes into England, bringing with him certain Maids to be married to young Noblemen of this Country, the King's Wards, of whom Edmund Earl of Lincoln hath one, and Richard de Bourgh another; and the same Year three of the King's Brothers by the Mother, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Athelmar, a Clerk, are sent over to be provided of Estate in England. Also Thomas of Savoy (sometimes Earl of Flanders, by Right of his Wife) comes with his Sister Beatrix, Countess of Provence, the Queen's Mother, who are again feasted, and gifted; for which the King is taxed the next Parliament in Candlemas Term, and besides sharply reprehended for his Breach of Promise, having vowed and declared by his Charter never more to injure the State in that Kind: Also for his violent taking up of Provision of Wax, Silk, Robes, and especially of Wine, contrary to the Will of the Sellers, and many other Grievances they complain of. All which the King patiently hears, in hope to obtain his Desire; but yet nothing is effected: And the Parliament being prorogued till Midsummer A.D. 1238 following, and the King growing more obdurate than before, it afterward brake up in Discontent. But the Parliament not supplying him, he is advised to furnish his Wants with Sale of his Plate, and Jewels of the Crown, being told, that though they were sold, yet they would revert again unto him; and having with great Loss received Money for them, he asks who had bought them? Answer is made, the City of London. That City (said he) is an inexhaustible Gulph, if Octavius's Treasure were to be sold, they surely would buy it. In his two and fortieth Year a Parliament was held, which by some was called, Insanum Parliamentum, the Mad Parliament; for that, at this Parliament (to which the Lords came with great Retinues of armed Men) many Things were enacted contrary to the King's Pleasure, and his Royal Prerogative.

And now to vex them, he appoints a Fair to be kept at Westminster, forbidding under great Penalty all Exercise of Merchandize within London for fifteen Days, and all other Fairs in England; and namely, that of Ely: But this Novelty came to nothing; the Inconvenience of the Place, as it was then, and Foulness of the Weather, brought more Affliction than Benefit to the Traders. That Christmas also he requires New-years-Gifts of the Londoners; and shortly after writes unto them his Letters imperiously deprecatory to aid him with Money; and thereby gets of them twenty thousand Pounds, for which the next Year after he craves Pardon of them. And notwithstanding his continual taking up all Provisions for his House, yet he lessens his House-keeping in no honourable Manner: And then seeing he could get nothing of the States together, he calls unto him, or writes unto every Nobleman a-part, declaring his Poverty; and how he was bound by Charter in a Debt of thirty thousand Pounds to those of Bordeaux, and his Gascoyns (who otherwise would not have suffered him to depart home) at his last being in France: But failing herein of Temporal Lords, he addresseth his Letters to the Prelates, of whom he finds as little Relief; by much Importunity and his own Presence, he got of the Abbot of Ramsay a hundred Pounds, but the Abbot of Peterborough had the Face to deny him, though the King told him, It was more Alms to give Money to him than to a Beggar that went from Door to Door. The Abbot of St. Albans yet was more kind, and gave him threescore Marks. To such Lowness did the Necessity of this indigent King (through his Profusion) bring him. The Jews, ever exposed to his Will, feel the Weight of these his Wants. One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeems himself for seven hundred Marks; and Aaron, another Jew, protests, the King had, since his last being in France, taken from him at Times, thirty thousand Marks of Silver, besides two hundred Marks of Gold given to the Queen.

The Jews most of all taxed.

But now the Lords assemble again at London, and press him with his Promise made unto them, That the Chief Justiciar, Chancellor and Treasurer, should be appointed by the General Council of the Kingdom; but by the Absence of Richard Earl of Cornwal (which was thought

to

A.D. 1238 to be done on purpose) they return frustrate of their Desire. And now the Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, the King sends presently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church, to elect his Brother Athelmar; and because he would not be denied, he goes thither himself in Person, and there enters the Chapter-house as a Bishop or Prior, gets up into the President's Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes his Text, Justice and Peace have kissed each other; and thereupon used these Words: To me and other Kings who are to govern the People, belongs the Rigour of Judgment and Justice; to you who are Men of Quiet and Religion, Peace and Tranquillity; and this Day I hear you have (for your own Good) been favourable to my Request, with many such like Words; whereby the Monks finding the Earnestness of his Desire, held it in vain to deny him, and Athelmar is elected; but with this Reservation, if the Pope allow it. Shortly after follows the memorable Case of Sir Henry de Bathe, a Justiciar of the Kingdom, and a special Counsellor to the King, who by Corruption had attained to a mighty Estate, and is said in one Circuit to have gotten two hundred Pounds Land per Annum. He is accused by Sir Philip D'arcy of Falshood in the King's Court; and the King is so incensed against him, that in the Parliament at this Time holden in London, Proclamation is made, That whosoever had any Action or Complaint against Henry de Bathe, should come and be heard. One of his Justiciars accused him of acquitting a Malefactor for a Bribe. The King seeing Henry de Bathe's Friends to be many and strong, breaks out into a Rage, protesting, That whosoever would kill Henry de Bathe, should be acquitted for the Deed. But afterward, by the Intercession of the Earl of Cornwal, and the Bishop of London, the King becomes pacified; and Sir Henry is released, paying two thousand Marks; and after is restored to his former Place and Favour. The King keeping his Christmas at York, the Marriage is solemnized between Alexander King of Scots, and Margaret his Daughter; to the Feast of which Solemnity it is said the Archbishop gave six hundred fat Oxen, which were all spent at one Meal; and besides, the Feast cost him four thousand Marks.

Henry de Bathe Chief Justice fined for Corruption: Yet afterward restored to his Place.

A bountiful Feast.

K. Henry undertakes the Cross.

But few are moved by their Persuasions; only three Knights of small Note, whom thereupon the King in open View, embraceth, kisseth, and calls his Brethren, checking the Londoners as ignoble Mercenaries; and there himself takes his Oath for performing it, and to set forth upon Midsummer-day next. In taking his Oath, he lays his Right-hand on his Breast, according to the Manner of a Priest; and after on the Book, and kisseth it as a Lay-man. About this Tenth (granted by the Pope, but not by the People) a Parliament is called at London, where the Bishops are first dealt withal (as being a Work of Piety) and they absolutely refuse it; then the Temporal Lords are set upon, and they answer as the Bishops; which put the King into so great a Rage, that he drove out all that were in his Chamber, as if he had been mad. Then he falls to perswade them apart, sending first for the Bishop of Ely, and deals with him in all kind Manner, recounting the many Favours he had done him. The Bishop replies, dissuading him from the Journey by Example of the King of France; and to that Purpose useth many good Reasons: Which the King hearing, in great Passion commanded his Servants to thrust him out of Door, perceiving by this what was to be expected of the rest, and thereupon falls upon his former violent Courses. And first the City of London is compelled to the Contribution of a thousand Marks; and the Gascoyners being upon Revolt, unless speedy Succour be sent them, general Musters are made, and Commandment given, That whosoever could dispend thirteen Pounds per Annum, should furnish out a Horse-man. This occasions another Parliament, wherein, it seems, the State began wisely to consider, that all their Oppositions did no Good, the King's Turn must be served one Way or other. Therefore they agreed to relieve him rather by the usual Way, than force him to those extravagant Courses which he took; but yet so, as the Reformation of the Government, and the Ratification of their Laws and Liberties, might once again be solemnly confirmed. And after fifteen Days Consultation, to satisfy the King's Desire for his Holy Expedition, a Tenth is granted by the Clergy, and Scutage, three Marks of every Knight's Fee, by the Laity; and thereupon those often-confirmed Charters are again ratified, and that in the most solemn and ceremonial Manner that State and Religion could possibly devise. The King, with all the great Nobility of England, all the Bishops in their reverend Ornaments, with burning Candles in their Hands, assemble to hear the terrible Sentence of Excommunication against the Infingers of the same. And at the lighting of those Candles, the King having received one in his Hand, gives it to the Prelate that stood by, saying, It becomes not me, being no Priest, to hold this Candle, my Heart shall be a greater Testimony; and withal laid his Hand spread upon his Breast all the Time that Sentence was read, which was thus pronounced, Authoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. Which done, he causeth the Charter of King John, his Father, granted by his free Consent, to be openly read. In the End, having thrown away their Candles, which lay smoaking on the Ground, they cried out, So let them

But can get no Money.

Thereupon falls again to violent Courses.

For preventing whereof the Parliament grants him a Subsidy; but upon Condition to confirm their Charters.

Which are confirmed with the greatest Solemnity that could be devised.

A.D. 1238 them who incur this Sentence, be extinct, and have no better Savour than these Snuffs: And the King, with a loud Voice said, As God help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Christian, a Knight, a King crowned and anointed, inviolably observe all these Things: And therewithal the Bells rung out, and the People shouted for Joy.

Yet was not all so quieted by this Grant, but that there were Grievances still, whereof the first falls upon his Brother Richard, Earl of Cornwal: For the King having seven and twenty Years before given him the Province of Gascoine, now that he had a Son of his own, he would take it from his Brother and give it to his Son; and the Earl refusing to deliver his Charter, it is plotted to imprison him; but he escaping out of Bordeaux, comes over into England. The King to win the Nobility of Gascony to turn to him, promiseth them thirty thousand Marks, which they accept, so as he bindeth himself by Oath and Charter to perform it. This Request of theirs the King takes in ill Part, and thereupon sends Simon Mountford, Earl of Leicester, a stern Man, to be their Governor, who with his insolent Government so discontents them, that after three Years suffering, they send the Archbishop of Bordeaux, with other great Men, to complain of his Insolencies. Whereupon Mountford is sent for, and because the Lords took Part with him, the King takes Part with the Gascoiners, which Mountford took so ill, that he upbraids the King with breaking his Promise. To whom the King in great Rage replied, That no Promise was to be kept with an unworthy Traitor: At which Word Mountford riseth up, protesting that he lyed; and were he not protected by his Royal Dignity, he would make him repent those Words. The King commands his Servants to lay hold on him, but the Lords would not permit it. Yet after this great Affront to the King, is Mountford sent over again into Gascony, though with a more limited Authority; and shortly after the King with a Fleet of three hundred Ships goes thither himself, and soon composeth all Differences in the Country.

But now the King of Spain pretends a Title to Aquitaine; and to take him off, King Henry sends to treat of a Marriage between Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor: Which being accepted by the King of Spain, the Marriage is solemnized at Burgos, where the King of Spain Knights the Prince, and quits his Claim to Aquitaine for him and his Successors for ever: And King Henry invests the Prince and Wife in it, and gives unto him besides, Ireland, Wales, Bristol, Stamford, and Grantham. And from hence it came that ever after this, the King's eldest Son was immediately upon his Birth Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester. After this King Henry prepares to return home, and well he might, having spent in this and his former Journeys into those Parts, the Sum of seven and twenty hundred thousand Pounds; more than all the Lands, if they had been sold, were worth: Which when the King was told, he desired there might be no Words made of it for his Credit. And now being to return, he is desirous, with the King of France's Leave, to pass through France: And coming to Paris with a thousand Horse, where he stayed eight Days, is there most royally A.D. 1238 feasted by the King of France; and he as royally feasts the King of France again. But it is the Londoners and the Jews that are like to pay for all. For coming home about Christmas, when the Londoners presented him with a hundred Pounds in Money, and afterwards with two hundred Pounds in Plate, it was so slighted, and so ill taken, that a Hole was presently found in their Coat, for an Escape of a Prisoner, which cost them three thousand Marks: Yet was not this enough, but he takes good Fleeces from the Jews, and then lets them out to farm to his Brother Richard for a great Sum of Money, and he to make what more of them he could.

Yet after all this he complains of his Debts, which he saith are at least three hundred thousand Marks, which must needs be the heavier to him, because he had diminished his own Means, by the Allowance of fifteen thousand Marks per Annum to his Son the Prince. The only Hope is in the Parliament; but a Parliament being called, they fall presently upon their old Grievances, complaining upon the King for Breach of Charter; and renewing their Claim, to have the Chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer, to be chosen by themselves. So nothing was done for the King at this Time, and the Parliament being prorogued till Michaelmas after, as little then, by reason many of the Peers came not, as not being summoned according to the Tenor of Magna Charta. And now while the King was using Means to wind himself out of Debt, there happened Occasions to put him further in; for now Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queen's Brother, being at War with the City of Turin, must be supplied with Money towards it by the King of England. Now the Elect Bishop of Toledo, the King of Spain's Brother, comes into England, and must be sumptuously feasted, and have great Gifts presented him. Now Eleanor, the Prince's Wife, arrives with a Multitude of Spaniards, and must all be entertained at the King's Charge, and have no small Presents given them at their Departure. Now comes Rufandus from the Pope, with Power to collect the Tenth of the Clergy, for the Pope's Use and the King's, and to absolve him from his Oath of the Holy War, so he would come to destroy Manfred, Son to the Emperor Frederick, now in Possession of the Kingdom of Sicily and Apulia. And this Man likewise hath great Gifts bestowed upon him, besides a rich Prebend in York. But the Pope by too much seeking his Profit, loseth Credit and all; for the Clergy flights him, and will give him nothing: And when he would have borrowed of the Earl of Cornwal five hundred Marks, the Earl answered, He liked not to lend his Money to one upon whom he could not distrust. But King Henry's greatest Charge was his purchasing a Kingdom for his Son Edmund; for now comes the Bishop of Bononia from the Pope, with a Ring of Investiture to Prince Edmund in the Kingdom of Sicily, which he pretends to be at his disposing: And King Henry takes it in good Earnest, that after this he calls his Son Edmund by no other Name than King of Sicily. But all this was done by the Pope to angle away King Henry's Money, as indeed upon this Hope he had drawn the King into

Mountford giveth K. Henry the Lye to his Face;

Yet soon reconciled.

King Henry's eldest Son Edward marries Eleanor the King of Spain's Sister.

The King's eldest Son immediately Prince of Wales from this Time. King Henry spent seven and twenty hundred thousand Pounds in his Journeys to France.

The King lets the Jews out to farm.

The Parliament requires to have the choosing of the Chief Justice, Chancellor, and Treasurer,

The Earl of Cornwal likes not to lend the Pope Money, and why. The Pope promiseth to make the King's younger Son King of Sicily.

A.D. 1238 into the Engagement of an hundred and fifty thousand Marks. For to draw the King on, it was given out, That the Pope had defeated all Manfred's Forces, and was thereby in Possession of the Kingdom; when the Truth was, that Manfred had defeated the Pope's Forces, and was thereby himself established in the Kingdom.

Disorders committed by the Prince and his Followers.

In the Year 1257 the King keeps his Christmas at Winchester, where new Grievances arise. The Merchants of Gascoine having their Wines taken from them by the King's Officers without Satisfaction, complain to their Lord the Prince, he to his Father; and his Father having been informed beforehand by his Officers, that their Clamour was unjust, as relying upon the Prince's Favour, he falls into a great Rage with the Prince, and breaks out into these Words: See! now my Blood, and my Bowels impugn me: But afterwards pacified, he gives Order that the Injuries should be redressed. And now the Prince's Followers themselves come to be a Grievance, who relying upon their Master, commit many Outrages, and spoil and wrong Men at their Pleasure; and the Prince himself is not altogether free, of whom it is said, that meeting a young Man travelling by the Way, he caused one of his Ears to be cut off, and one of his Eyes to be put out. And many such Pranks play'd by him and his Followers in Wales, made the Welch break out into open Rebellion, which the Prince would fain have suppressed, but there was no Money to be had towards the doing it. And now the King falls to Shifts, he comes into the Chequer himself, and there lays Penalties upon Sheriffs that return not their Moneys in due Time; then he falls upon Measures of Wine and Ale, upon Bushels and Weights, and something he gets; but London is his best Chequer, and every Year commonly he hath one Quarrel or other with the Londoners, and they are sure to pay: And now falls out an Accident, seeming of great Honour, but certainly of no Profit to the Kingdom. Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, is elected King of the Romans; for although Alphonsus King of Spain, the great Mathematician, were his Competitor, yet Earl Richard's Money wrought more than his Learning, and the Archbishop of Colen comes over to fetch him, and crowned he is at Aix-la-Chapelle. This Earl of Cornwall is reported able to dispend a hundred Marks a Day for ten Years, besides his Revenues in England. But now a Man that pays dear for an Office, looks that his Office should pay him again: So Earl Richard having given infinitely to compass his Advancement, looked to help himself again by the Place; and this, and the Desire he had to revenge himself upon those that had opposed his Election, made him take such violent Courses, that he came soon to be dispossessed, forsaken, and forced to return into England a poorer King than he went out an Earl.

Acts done in the Contention between the King and his Barons.

NOW King Henry, very proud to have his younger Son a King as well as his Brother, calls a Parliament, wherein he brings his Son Edmund clad in Sicily Habit, and tells the Parliament, That for advancing this Son of his A.D. 1238 to the Kingdom of Sicily, he had bound himself under a Covenant of losing his Kingdom, in the Sum of an hundred and forty thousand Marks: And hoped they would not think much to aid him with Money for so great an Advancement. But the Parliament stood firm to their usual Condition of Magna Charta; so as that might be confirmed, they were content to give two and fifty thousand Marks: But this gave the King no Satisfaction. The Year after, another Parliament is holden at London, wherein, upon the King's pressing them again for Means to pay his Debts to the Pope, the Lords tell him plainly, they will not yield to give him any thing for any such Purpose; and give their Reasons, and withal repeat their own Grievances, his Breach of Promise, the Insolency of his Brothers, and especially William de Valence, who had given the Lye to the Earl of Leicester, and no Right done him in it; and many such Things. Which the King hearing, and not able to deny, humbles himself, and tells them how he had often by ill Counsel been seduced; but promiseth by his Oath, which he took on the Tomb of St. Edward, to reform all those Errors. But the Lords not well knowing how to deal in this Business, as being divided between a Desire to satisfy the King, and a Desire to be satisfied themselves; and knowing withal the Variableness of the King's Nature, they get the Parliament to be adjourned to St. Barnaby's Day, and then to assemble at Oxford. In which mean Time the Earls Gloucester, Leicester, Hereford, the Marshal, Bigot, Spencer, and other great Men, confederate, and provide by Arms to effect their Desire; and here is the Foundation laid of those bloody Wars that ensued between King Henry and his Barons.

K. Henry can get no Money of the Parliament to make his Son Edmund a King.

The Lords confederate again.

K. Henry useth Shifts to get Money.

The Liberty of the Subject.

The Lords require that the Chief Justice, the Chancellor and Treasurer may be chosen by Parliament.

And now the King being put to his Shifts for Money, gets the Abbot of Westminster to put his Seal, and that of his Covent, to a Deed obligatory, as a Surety for two hundred Marks, making Account, that by his Example others would be drawn to do the like; but his trusty Servant Simon Passeleve, being employed to other Monasteries, and telling them, amongst other Reasons to persuade them, That the King was Lord of all they had; they only answered, They acknowledged indeed the King to be Lord of all they had, but yet so, as to defend, not to destroy the same; and this was all he could get of them. The Prince also in no less Want than his Father, is driven to mortgage his Town of Stamford, and many other things, to William de Valence, a Poictovin, whereby appeared the Disorder of the Time when the Prince was in Want, and Strangers had such Plenty. And now is the Parliament assembled at Oxford, whither the Lords come attended with large Trains; and here they begin with the Expostulation of the former Liberties, requiring that the Chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer, may be ordained by publick Choice; and that the twenty-four Conservators of the Kingdom may be confirmed, twelve by the Election of the Lords, and twelve by the King: Some write there were but twelve in all, and were called, the Douze Peers, the Twelve Peers, who ruled all things at their Pleasure without

A.D. 1238 without Controulment. The King seeing their Strength, and in what Manner they required these Things, swears solemnly again to the Confirmation of them, and causeth the Prince to take the same Oath: But the Lords left not here; the King's Brethren, the Poistovins, and other Strangers, must presently be removed: And this also, though with some little Opposition, was at last concluded: And thereupon the King's Brethren and their Followers are despoiled of all their Fortunes, and exiled by Proscription under the King's own Hand directed to the Earls of Hereford and Surrey. But now Sickness and Mortality happening to many great ones, it is imputed by Poisons, supposed to have been prepared by those Strangers proscribed. The Earl of Gloucester in a Sickness suddenly lost his Hair, his Teeth, his Nails, and his Brother hardly escaped Death; which made many to suspect their nearest Servants, and their Cooks. Walter Scoyny, the Earl's Steward, is strictly examined, committed to Prison, and afterward, without Confession, is upon Presumptions only, executed at Winchester. Elias, a converted Jew, is said to have confessed, That in his House the Poison was concocted, but it was when he was a Jew, and not a Christian. Every Man that had received any Wrong by those Strangers, now put out their Complaints, and are heard. Guido de Rochfort, a Poistovin, to whom the King had given the Castle of Rochester, is banished, and all his Goods confiscate. William Bussey, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and most reproachfully used. Richard Grey, whom the Lords had made Captain of Dover Castle, is sent to intercept whatsoever the Poistovins conveyed that Way out of England: And much Treasure of theirs, and of the Elect of Winchester, is by him taken; besides great Summs committed to the new Temple, are found out, and seized for the King.

The Liberty of the Subject.

And now the Chief Justiciar, Hugh Bigot, Brother to the Earl Marshal (chosen this last Parliament by publick Voice) procures that four Knights in every Shire should enquire of the Oppressions of the Poor, done by great Men, and certify the same, that Redress might be made. Also Order was taken against corrupting of Justice: When yet, notwithstanding this pretended Care of the Publick, it is noted by the Writers and Records of that Time, how the Lords were themselves but as totidem tyranni, enforcing the Services of the King's Tenants that dwelt near them. But to make their Cause the more popular, it was rumoured, that the King stood upon it, that his Necessity might be supplied out of the Estates of his People, whether they would or no: Which the King hearing, sends forth Proclamation, declaring how certain malicious Persons had falsely and seditiously reported, That he meant unlawfully to charge his Subjects, and subvert the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, and by these false Suggestions, averted the Hearts of his People from him; and therefore desires them not to give Credit to such Perturbers; for that he was ready to defend all Right and Customs due unto them; and that they might rest of this secured, he caused his Letters to be made Patents. But now Mountford, Gloucester, and Spencer, enforce the King to call a Parliament at London, where A.D. 1238 they get the Authority of the Twenty-four to be estated wholly upon themselves, and they alone to dispose of the Custody of the Castles, and other Buſinesses of the Kingdom: And here they bind the King to lose their legal Obedience whensoever he infringed this Charter.

At this Time Intelligence was given to the Lords, that Richard, King of the Romans, had a Purpose to come into England; and the Lords suspecting he would come with Power to aid the King, his Brother, take Order for guarding the Ports, with Intent to hinder his Landing; but finding his Train to be but small, for he was accompanied only with his Queen, two German Earls, and eight Knights, upon his Promise to take their propounded Oath, they admit him to Land; but would neither permit the King (who came thither to meet him) nor himself to enter into Dover Castle. At Canterbury they bring him into the Chapter-house, where the Earl of Gloucester standeth forth in the midst, calls out the Earl, not by the Name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwal; who in reverend Manner coming forth, taketh his Oath in these Words: Hear all Men, That I Richard, Earl of Cornwall, do here swear upon the Holy Evangelists, that I shall be faithful and diligent to reform with you the Kingdom of England, and be an effectual Coadjutor to expel all Rebels and Disturbers of the same; and this Oath will inviolably observe, under Pain of losing all the Land I have in England: So help me God. But though this Earl came home both weak and poor; yet upon his Return the King takes Heart, and seeks all Means to vindicate his Power; and first sends Messengers secretly to Rome, to be absolved from his enforced Oath. And to have the more Assurance from the King of France, he makes an absolute Resignation of all his Right to the Duchy of Normandy, and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poitou, Touraine, and Main; in regard whereof the King of France gives him three hundred thousand Pounds (some say Crowns) of Anjovin Money, and grants him to enjoy all Guyenne beyond the River of Garonne, all the Country of Xaintoigne to the River of Charente, the Country of Limousin and Quercy, for him and his Successors, doing their Homage to the Crown of France as Duke of Aquitain.

And now was the King of France made Arbitrator of the Difference between King Henry and his Barons, who gives Sentence against the Barons concerning the Provisions of Oxford, but of their Side concerning King John's Charter; by which nice Distinction, though he did but leave the Matter as he found it (for those Provisions, as the Lords pretended, were grounded upon that Charter) yet did his Sentence draw many away from the Party of the Barons, amongst whom was Henry, Son to the Earl of Cornwal, Roger Clifford, Roger de L'eisbourn, Hamo L'estrage, and many others. But the Earl of Leicester, notwithstanding this Revolt, recovers the Town and Castle of Gloucester, constrains the Citizens to pay a thousand Pounds for their Redemption; goes with an Army to Worcester, possesseth himself of the Castle; thence to Shrewsbury, and comes about to the Isle of Ely, subdues

Four and twenty chosen to be Governors of the Kingdom; but Mountford and Gloucester get all the Authority to themselves, Richard King of the Romans returning.

Swears to assist the Lords.

K. Henry sends to Rome to be absolved of his Oath. He resigns his Right in Normandy for a Sum of Money.

The King of France is made Arbitrator of the Difference between the King and his Barons.

The Earl of Leicester takes many Castles. The King concludes a Peace with his Barons.

A.D. 1238 subdues the same, and grows exceeding powerful. The King doubting his Approach to London, falls to treat of a Peace, and a Peace is concluded upon these Conditions; That all the Castles of the King shall be delivered to the keeping of the Barons; the Provisions of Oxford should inviolably be kept; all Strangers by a certain Time should avoid the Kingdom, except only such as were licensed to stay. The Prince had fortified Windsor Castle; but Leicester coming to besiege it, he treats with him for Peace, which is refused, and the Castle is rendred to him.

Many Lords return to the King for Peace, but are denied.

The Earl of Leicester's Stratagem.

The Earl of Leicester takes the King, the Prince, and divers other Lords Prisoners.

Variance between the Earls of Leicester, and Gloucester.

The King at this Time, to win Time, convokes another Parliament at London, wherein he won many Lords to take his Part; as namely, the Prince Richard his Brother, Henry his Son, William Valence, with the rest of his Brothers lately returned; and with them the King marched to Oxford, whither divers Lords of Scotland repair to him, as John Commin, John Baliol, Lords of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others: Also many Barons of the North, Clifford, Piercy, Bassett, and others. From Oxford he goes to Northampton, where he took Prisoners, Simon Mountford the younger, with fourteen other principal Men; thence to Nottingham, making Spoil of such Possessions as pertained to the Barons in those Parts. And now the King's Side grows strong; which the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester seeing, they write to the King, protesting their Loyalty, and how they opposed only such as were Enemies to him and the Kingdom, and had belyed them. The King returns Answer, That themselves were the Perturbers of him and his State, and fought his and the Kingdom's Destruction; and therefore defies them. The Prince likewise, and the Earl of Cornwall send Letters of Defiance to them. Yet the Barons continue to mediate a Peace, and send the Bishops of London and Worcester, with Offer of thirty thousand Marks to the King for the Damages done in these Wars, so as the Statutes of Oxford may be observed; but this Offer is not accepted. The Earl seeing no Remedy, but it must be put to a Day, takes his Time to be earlier ready than was expected; and supplies his want of Strength with Policy, placing on the one Side of a Hill, near Lewis, where the Battle was fought, certain Ensigns without Men, in such Sort, as they might seem afar off to be Squadrons of Succours to second those he brought to the Encounter; whom he caused all to wear white Crosses, both for their own Notice, and the Signification of his Cause, which he would have to be thought for Justice. Here the Fortune of the Day was his; the King, the Prince, the Earl of Cornwall, and his Son Henry, the Earls of Arundel and Hereford, with all the Scottish Lords, are taken Prisoners; and of the English, five and twenty Barons and Bannerets; only the Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the King's Brother, with Hugh Bigot, Earl Marshal, save themselves by Flight: Five thousand (some say twenty thousand) are slain in the Battle. A Year and a Half is Simon Mountford in Possession of his Prisoner, carrying the King about with him to countenance his Actions, till he had gotten all the strongest Castles in the Kingdom.

And now comes Erinys and sets Debate between the two great Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, about their Dividend. Leicester is taxed to do more for his own Particular than the common Good; his Sons also presuming upon his Greatness, grew insolent: Whereupon Gloucester, discontented, forsakes that Side, and betakes him to the Prince, who lately escaping out of the Castle of Hereford, had gotten a Power about him to try the Fortune of another Battle. The Revolt of this Earl being great in it self, was greater by its Example; for now many others revolted likewise; and the Earl of Leicester, seeing the Improvement of the Prince's Forces, who was now with his Army about Worcester, tho' he saw his own Disadvantage, yet imbattles in a Plain near Evesham to encounter him; and noting the Manner of the Approach of the Prince's Army, said to those about him, These Men come bravely on, they learn it not of themselves, but of me. And seeing himself likely to be beset, and overlaid with Multitude, he advised his Friends Hugh Spencer, Ralph Bassett, and others, to shift for themselves; which when they refused to do, Then (saith he) let us commend our Souls to God, for our Bodies are theirs; and so undertaking the main Weight of the Battle, perished under it, and with him are slain his Son Henry, eleven Barons, with many Thousands of common Soldiers. And thus ended Mountford the great Earl of Leicester, highly honoured in his Life, and more highly should have been after his Death, if the People might have had their Will, who talk'd of Miracles enough to make him a Saint.

Gloucester joins with the Prince.

Mountford the great Earl of Leicester slain. Miracles reported of him, being dead.

And now is King Henry by this Victory of his Son, at Liberty; who together repair to Winchester, where a Parliament is convoked, and all who adhered to Earl Mountford are disinherited, and their Estates conferred on others at the King's Pleasure; the Londoners also have their Liberties taken from them. But though the Death of Mountford gave a great Wound to the Party of the Barons, yet it was not mortal, at least not mortal presently; for there remained Relicks that kept it alive a good while after. Simon and Guy de Mountford, Sons of the Earl of Leicester, and others of the Barons, take and defend the Isle of Ely. The Castle of Killingworth held out half a Year, till their Victuals failed; and then yielded upon Conditions to have their Lives and Goods saved: And many others there were, resolute and desperate Persons, strongly knit and fastned together, though now shortly upon dissolving. For after the Parliament at Westminster, the King with an Army going against them, and being at Northampton, Simon and Guy de Mountford submit themselves to him: but when the Earl of Gloucester opposed the restoring them to their Estates, they were fain to fly the Kingdom, and make their Fortunes in other Countries, as indeed they did; the younger in Italy, the elder in France, where they were Propagators of two great Families. Their Mother was banish'd shortly after the Battle of Evesham: A Lady of eminent Note, as being the Daughter and Sister of a King, and yet of more Note for her patient bearing of Adversity, or rather for her making a Benefit of Adversity; for by this means she took her self to the Veil of Piety, and died a Nun at Montargis in France. About this Time a great Slaughter was made of Jews in London:

Mountford's Sons fly the Kingdom.

A.D. 1238 don: and the Quarrel was, because a Jew would have forced a Christian to give him more than two Pence a Week for the Use of twenty Shillings; two Pence only being then allowed by the Law.

Three Years after this, the disinherited Barons held out; till at length, Conditions of Render are propounded; but here the Council are divided in Opinion: Mortimer and others stated in the Possessions of the Disinherited, are against Restauration, alledging it were Injustice to take from them the Rewards of their Service. Gloucester, and twelve ordained to deal for the Peace of the State, are earnest for Restauration; alledging, It were hard Measure to grant them their Lives, and not their Livelihoods: But not prevailing, in great Discontentment Gloucester retires from Court, sends Messengers to warn the King to remove Strangers from his Council, and observe the Provisions at Oxford, as he promised at Evesham; otherwise that he should not marvel if himself did what he thought fit. Hereupon John de Warren, Earl of Surrey, and William de Valentia, are sent to the Earl of Gloucester; who, though they could not persuade him to submit to the King; yet thus much they got of him under his Hand and Seal, that he would never bear Arms against the King, or his Son Edward, but only defend himself, and pursue Roger Mortimer, and his other Enemies. And now a Parliament is convoked at Bury, wherein many Demands are made by the King and the Legate, and all for Money from the Clergy, but all denied, that nothing but Denials are done in this Parliament. After this, the Legate employs Solicitors to persuade the disinherited Lords, which held the Isle of Ely, to return to the Faith and Unity of the Church, and to the Peace of the King, according to the Form propounded at Coventry. To which the Lords made Answer, That they never opposed the Unity of the Church, but the Avarice of Churchmen that were put in Authority; and that they never opposed the King, but for the Good of the Kingdom: And then required, that the Provisions at Oxford might be observed, and Pledges be given them for their Security. Hereupon the Year after, the King prepares a mighty Army, and Prince Edward with Bridges entering the Isle of Ely, shuts them up, so that he constrains them at last to yield. Also the Earl of Gloucester coming to London with an Army, is by the Legate once again persuaded to render himself to the King; and upon Forfeiture of twelve thousand Marks, if ever he should raise any Commotion, is again reconciled. Now remains Lewellin and the Welch to be chastned for aiding of Simon Mountford; but the King going against them with an Army, they gave him two and thirty Pounds Sterling, and so made the Peace; and here was an End of the first Wars between the Kings of England and their Barons.

The King's Sons, Edward and Edmund undertake the Holy War.

The next Year after, the Pope's Legate Ottobon, signs with the Croyfado both the King's Sons, Edward and Edmund; the Earl of Gloucester, and divers Noblemen, induced to undertake the Holy War by the Sollicitation of him and the King of France; who, notwithstanding his former Calamities endured in that Action, would once again adventure it. And because Prince Edward wanted Means to furnish himself out, the King of France lends him thirty thousand Marks A.D. 1238 upon a Mortgage of Gascoine. And now whilst this Preparation is in Hand, King Henry labours to establish the Peace of the Kingdom, and to reform the Excesses which the War had bred: And the same Year assembles his last Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes of that Title were enacted. Near two Years it seems to have been after the undertaking of the Cross, before Prince Edward set forth; but then taking his Wife Eleanor with him, though young with Child, he set forward, and in the Voyage, when many of his People seemed desirous to leave him and return home, he is said to have stricken his Breast, and sworn, That if all his Followers forsook him, he would yet enter Acon, or Ptolemais, though but only with his Horse-keeper Fowin. Shortly after Richard King of the Romans died, and the Year following King Henry.

Of his Taxations, and Ways for raising of Money.

NEVER Son was more like a Father in any thing, than King Henry was like his Father, King John, in this Point, for raising of Money; for he trod directly in all his Steps, if he added not something of his own. King John had great Subsidies granted him by Parliament for any great Action he undertook, so had King Henry. King John resumed the Lands aliened from the Crown, so did King Henry. King John made Benefit of the Vacancy of Bishopricks and Abbies, so did King Henry. King John took great Fines of many for Crimes not proved, but only supposed, so did King Henry. King John made Benefit of a new Seal, so did King Henry. King John extorted great Sums from the Jews, so did King Henry. And one Way more he had to get Money, which perhaps his Father had not; and that was by Begging, as he told the Abbot of Peterborough, It was more Alms to give Money to him, than to the Beggar that went from Door to Door. Indeed Taxations in this King's Reign may be reckoned amongst his annual Revenues, for scarce any Year passed without a Parliament; and seldom any Parliament without a Tax: Or if any sometimes without, it was then cause of the greater Taxation some other Way; as when he took of the Londoners for having aided the Barons, twenty thousand Marks.

K. Henry gets Money by Begging.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN this King's Reign were ratified and confirmed the two great Charters of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta. Also in his Time were enacted the Statutes called of Merton, of Oxford, and of Marlborough. Also stealing of Cattle, which before was but pecuniary, he made capital; and the first that suffered for the same, was one of Dunstable, who having stolen twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colne, and being pursued to Redburn, was by a Bailiff of St. Albans, according to the King's Proclamation, condemned and beheaded. And it may seem strange, that in these Times so much Blood should be shed in the Field, and none upon the Scaffold; for till the twenty sixth Year of the King, that one William Maraisc, the Son of Geoffrey Maraisc, a Nobleman

A.D. 1238 bleman of Ireland, being condemned for Piracy and Treason, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered: There is no Example of that kind of Punishment to be found in our Histories. Particularly in this King's Reign was made that Statute, by which the Ward and Marriage of the Heirs of Barons within Age is given to the King. Also in this King's Reign the Pleas of the Crown were pleaded in the Tower of London. All Wears in the Thames are in this King's Time ordained to be plucked up and destroyed. Also the Citizens of London are allowed by Charter, to pass Toll-free through all England, and to have free Warren about London: Also to have and use a common Seal. Also it is ordained that no Sheriff of London should continue in his Office longer than one Year, which they did before for many. In the five and twentieth Year of this King, were Aldermen first chosen within the City of London, which then had the Rule of the City, and of the Wards of the same, and were then Yearly changed, as now the Sheriffs are. It was in this King's Time allowed to the City of London to present their Mayor to the Barons of the Exchequer to be sworn; which before was to be presented to the King, wherefoever he were. In his Time the Clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up by the King in his Grants and Writings. Also in this King's Time, William Bishop of Salisbury first caused that Custom to be received for a Law, whereby the Tenants of every Lordship are bound to owe their Suit to the Lord's Court of whom they hold their Tenements. Also in the 32d. Year of this King's Reign, the Wharf of London, called Queen-Hithe, was let to farm to the Citizens for fifty Pounds the Year, which is since grown scarce worth fifteen. In this King's Time a Proclamation was set forth, that all such as might dispend fifteen Pounds in Land, should receive the Order of Knighthood; and those that would not, or could not, should pay their Fines.

AFFAIRS of the Church, for matter of Doctrine, were never more quiet than in this King's Reign; for now all Heresies accounted of the Time, especially the Albigenses, were in a manner suppressed by the Arms of the King of France, not without the Vote of the King of England, who forbore to make War upon them in Tenderneſs to his Service: But for matter of Manners they were never more turbulent; for now Abbies were fleeced, Sanctuaries violated, Clergy-men outraged, Bishops themselves not spared: And all for greedineſs of Money, or for Revenge.

Othobone the Pope's Legate here in England lying at the Abby at Oſeney, there happened a Difference between his Servants and the Scholars at Oxford, in which Contention a Brother of his was slain, and the Legate himself fain to flie into the Steeple for the Safeguard of his Life. Whereupon afterwards being gotten thence by the King's safe Conduct, he thundered out Curſes againſt the Scholars, and interdicted the University; ſo as the Colleges grew deſolate, and the Students were diſperſed abroad into other Places for the Space of half a Year, till the Monks of Oſeney, and the Regent Maſters of Oxford, were fain to go bare-footed and bare-headed through London, as far as Durham-Houſe, were the Legate lay; and there, upon their humble Submiſſion, and great Mens Interceſſion, they were abſolved, and the University reſtored to its former Eſtate. But of this Othobone it may not be impertinent to relate a little further; that going afterward out of England, he came by Degrees, after the Death of Innocent the fifth, to be Pope of Rome himſelf, by the Name of Adrian the fifth, and died within fifty Days after his Election. Amongſt the Affairs of the Church, may be reckoned the Ulcers of any Member of the Church; ſuch a one as in this King's Time broke out moſt loathſome. For one procuring five Wounds to be made in his Body, in Reſemblance of the five Wounds in Chriſt's Body, took upon him to be Chriſt; and had gotten a Woman that took upon her to be the Virgin Mary: Who continuing obſtinate in their Madneſs, were adjudged to be immured and ſhut up between two Walls, to the end (no doubt) the Contagion of this Filthineſs ſhould ſpread no further. In this King's Time a little Novelty was brought in by Pope Innocent the fourth, who ordained that Cardinals ſhould wear Red Hats: Something perhaps for Myſtery, and ſomething for Diſtinction. Also in this King's Time the Grecians forſook their Obedience to the Church of Rome; and the Archbiſhop of Antioch claims to have Precedence and Authority above the Biſhops of Rome, becauſe the Apoſtle Peter had firſt governed the Church of Antioch ſeven Years together. Also in the fifth Year of this King, the Friars Minors (as ſome write) came firſt into England; but it is not like they came ſo ſoon, for they were Grey Friars of the Order of St. Francis: and St. Francis had no Grace till Pope Honorius the third, which was ſome Years after. And it is miraculous which is related here of St. Francis, that fifteen Days before his Death appeared Wounds in his Hands and Feet, like to thoſe which Chriſt received there upon the Croſs; and as ſoon as he was dead, there remained not ſo much as any Marks of the ſaid Wounds upon him.

Works of Piety by this King, or by others in his Time.

THIS King cauſed a Cheſt of Gold to be made for laying up the Relicks of King Edward the Confeſſor, in the Church of Weſtminſter. He builded a Church for converted Jews in London; alſo an Hoſpital at Oxford, for Paſſengers, and diſeaſed Perſons; alſo the new Conventual Church and the Chappel of our Lady at Weſtminſter, whereof he laid himſelf the firſt Stone; alſo the Houſe of Black-Friars in Canterbury. In his Time, Elo Counteſs of Salisbury founded the Abby of Lacock in Wiltſhire: Richard Earl of Cornwal, founded Hails, a Monastery of Ciftercian Monks near to Winchcomb in Glouceſterſhire: Reginald de Mohun, Earl of Somerſet, and Lord of Dunſter, founded the Abby of Newham in Devonſhire: Ranulph the third Earl of Cheſter, and Lord of Little Britain, builded the Cattles of Chartley, Beſtone, and the Abby of De la Croſs: Sir John Maſſel, the King's Chaplain, founded the Houſe of Regular Canons near to Rumney in Kent: William de Albiſeto, Earl of Arundel, founded the Priory of Wimondham: William Brunc, a Citizen of London, and Rofia his

Also in this King's Time the new Work of Saint Paul's Church in London was begun. If it were

A Jew falling into a Privy, would not be taken out on the Sabbath Day.

St. Peter's College in Cambridge by whom founded. Whitehall to whom it antiently belonged.

Piety in the Jew, who falling into a Privy upon a Saturday, would not be taken out that Day, because it was the Jews Sabbath; it was as much Piety in the Earl of Gloucester, that would not suffer him to be taken out the next Day, because it was the Christian Sabbath; and when the third Day was come, he was taken out dead. Whose Piety was the greater? A strange Accident upon an Act of Piety is related in this King's Time, which if true, is a Miracle; if not true, is yet a Legend, and not unworthy to be read; that in the Time of Dearth, one Man in a certain Parish, who allowed poor People to relieve themselves with taking Corn upon his Ground, had at Harvest a plentiful Crop, where others that denied them had their Corn all blasted, and nothing worth. In this King's Time also, Hugh Balsamus, Bishop of Ely, founded St. Peter's College in Cambridge. Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent, was buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers in London, to which Church he gave his Palace at Westminster, which afterward the Archbishop of York bought, and made it his Inn; since commonly called York-place, now Whitehall.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

AT one Time there fell no Rain in England from the first of March to the Assumption of our Lady; and at anothe Time there fell so much Rain, that Holland and Holderness in Lincolnshire were overflowed and drowned. In the 17th Year of his Reign were seen five Suns at one Time together; after which followed so great a Dearth, that People were constrain'd to eat Horseflesh, and Barks of Trees; and in London 20,000 were starved for want of Food. Also in his Time the Church of St. Mildred in Canterbury, and a great Part of the City was burnt; also the Town of Newcastle upon Tine was burnt, Bridge and all. And though it may seem no fit Place to tell it, yet here, or no where, it must be told, that in this King's Time there was sent by the King of France the first Elephant that ever was seen in England. In this King's Time, Mat. Paris relates of a Maid in Leicester-shire, that being exactly watched, was found in seven Years together neither to eat nor drink, but only that on Sundays she received the Communion, and yet continued fat and in good liking. Which if it be true, we may well believe that in the Resurrection our Life may be maintained without Meat or Drink; also in this King's Time there was found a plentiful Mine of Tin in Germany, which before this Time was never known to be any where found but only in Cornwal, which much abated the Price A.D. 1238 of Tin in England. In his Time also the Sea, by the Space of four five Days, flowed not up to her usual Height, which was never known to happen at any Time before. Also in his Time a Child was born in Kent, that at two Years old cured all Diseases. Also in his 56th Year, a Lamb was yeaned at Greenwich beside London, that had two perfect Bodies and but one Head. Also in his Time a Child was born in the Isle of Wight, who at 18 Years old was scarce grown to be three Foot high; and therefore brought to the Queen; she carried him about with her as a Monster of Nature.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE married Eleanor, the second of the five Edmund Daughters of Raymond Earl of Provence, Crouchback the first Ancestor of the House of Lancaster. who lived his Wife 37 Years, his Widow 19, died a Nun at Amesbury, and was buried in her Monastery; by her he had six Sons and three Daughters: Of his Sons, the four youngest died young, and were buried, three of them at Westminster, and the fourth in the new Temple by Fleet-street. His eldest Son Edward, surnamed Longshank, of his tall and slender Body, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second Son Edmund, surnamed Crouchback, of bowing in his Back (as some say) but more likely of wearing the Sign of the Cross (antiently called a Crouch) upon his Back, which was usually worn of such as had vowed Voyages to Jerusalem, as he had done. He was invested titular King of Sicily and Apulia, and created Earl of Lancaster; on whose Person originally the great Contention of Lancaster and York was founded. He had two Wives, the first was Avelin, Daughter and Heir of William Earl of Albemarle, by whom he left no Issue. The second was Queen Blanch, Daughter of Robert Earl of Artois, Brother of St. Lewis King of France, Widow of Henry of Champagne King of Navarre; by her he had Issue three Sons and one Daughter. His eldest Son Thomas, who after his Father was Earl of Lancaster, and having married Alice, Daughter and Heir of Henry Lacy Earl of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pomfret without Issue. His second Son Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his Brother's Death was Earl of Lancaster, and Father of Henry the first Duke of Lancaster; his third Son John, who died unmarried. His Daughter Mary married to Henry Lord Piercy, Mother of Henry the first Earl of Northumberland. This Edmund died at Bay in Gascoin, in the Year 1296. when he had lived fifty Years, whose Body half a Year after his Death was brought over into England, and entombed at Westminster. Of King Henry's three Daughters, the eldest, Margaret, was married to Alexander the third, King of Scotland, by whom she had Issue two Sons, Alexander and David, who died both before their Father without Issue; and one Daughter, Margaret Q. of Norway, Wife of K. Ericke, and Mother of Margaret the Heir of Scotland and Norway, that died unmarried. The second Daughter of King Henry was Beatrice, born at Bordeaux, married to John the first Duke of Britain, and had Issue by him Arthur Duke of Britain, John Earl of Richmond, Peter, and Blanch married to Philip Son of Robert Earl of Artois; Eleanor a Nun at Amesbury, and Mary married to Guy Earl of St.

A.D. 1238 St. Paul; she deceased in Britain, and was buried at London, in the Quire of the Gray-Friers within Newgate: The third Daughter of King Henry named Katharine, died young, and lies buried at Westminster, in the Space between the Chappels of King Edward and St. Bennet.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of Stature but mean, yet of a well compacted Body, and very strong, one of his Eye-lids hanging down, and almost covering the Black of his Eye. For his inward Endowments it may be said, he was wiser for a Man, than for a Prince; for he knew better how to govern his Life than his Subjects. He was rather pious than devout, as taking more Pleasure in hearing Masses than Sermons, as he said to the King of France, he had rather see his Friend once, than hear from him often. His Mind seemed not to stand firm upon its Basis; for every sudden Accident put him into Passion; he was neither constant in his Love, nor in his Hate; for he never had so great a Favourite whom he cast not into Disgrace, nor so great an Enemy whom he received not into Favour: An example of both which Qualities was seen in his Carriage towards Hubert de Burgh, who was for a Time the greatest Favourite, yet cast out afterward in miserable Disgrace, and then no Man held in greater Hatred, yet received afterward into Grace again: And it is memorable to hear with what Crimes this Hubert was charged at his Arraignment, and especially one; that to disswade a great Lady from Marriage with the King, he had said the King was a squint-eyed Fool, and a kind of Leper, deceitful, perjured, more faint-hearted than a Woman, and utterly unfit for any Ladies Company. For which, and other Crimes laid to his Charge in the King's Bench, where the King himself was present, he was adjudged to have his Lands confiscate, and to be deprived of his Title of Earl; yet after all this, was restored to his Estate again, and suffered to live in quiet: He was more desirous of Money than of Honour, for else he would never have sold his Right to the two great Dukedoms of Normandy and Anjou, to the King of France, for a Sum of Money: Yet he was more desirous of Honour than of Quietness, for else he would never have contended so long with his Barons about their Charter of Liberty, which was upon the Matter, but a Point of Honour: His most eminent Virtue, and that which made him the more eminent, as being rare in Princes, was his Continency; for there is nothing read, either of any base Children he had, or of any Concubine he kept.

Of his Death and Burial.

THOUGH he had lived a troublesome life, yet he died a quiet Death; for he had settled Peace in his Kingdom, and in his Conscience: For being at St. Edmunds-Bury, and finding himself not well at Ease, he made the more hast to London; where calling before him his Lords, and especially Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, he exhorted them to be true and faithful to his Son Prince Edward, who was at that Time far from Home, and therefore had the more need of their Care, which consisted chiefly in their Agreement one with another: And then his Sickness encreasing, he yielded up his Soul to God on the sixteenth Day of November, in the Year 1272, when he had lived threescore and five Years, reigned six and fifty, and was buried at Westminster, which he had newly built.

Men of Note in his Time.

OF Martial Men famous in his Time there were many, but three especially who obscured the rest; the first was William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, memorable for the great Care he had of King Henry in his Minority, and more memorable for the little Care that Destiny had of his Posterity; for leaving his five Sons behind him, they all lived to be Earls successively, yet all died without Issue: So as the great Name and numerous Family of the Marshals came wholly to be extinct in that Generation. And this happened (if we may believe Matthew Paris) by reason of a Curse of an Irish Bishop, from whom he had taken two Manors belonging to his Bishoprick; and neither he, nor all his Sons, upon any Entreaties would be gotten to restore them. The second was Richard de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, who in a Battle against Baldwin de Gifnes, a valiant Fleming, employed by King Henry, himself alone encountered twelve of his Enemies, and having his Horse slain under him, he pitched one of them by the Leg out of the Saddle, and leaped into it himself, and continued the Fight without giving Ground, till his Army came to rescue him. An act, that may seem fitter to be placed among the Fictions of Knights Errant, than in a true Narration. The third was Simon Mountford, a Man of so audacious a Spirit, that he gave King Henry the Lie to his Face, and that in Presence of all his Lords, and of whom, it seems, the King stood in no small Fear: For passing one time upon the Thames, and suddenly taken with a terrible Storm of Thunder and Lightning, he commanded to be set on shore at the next Stairs, which happened to be at Durham House, where Mountford then lay; who coming down to meet the King, and perceiving him somewhat frightened with the Thunder, said unto him, Your Majesty need not fear the Thunder, the Danger is now past: No, Mountford (said the King) I fear not the Thunder so much as I fear thee. Of Men famous for Sanctity of Life, there were likewise many in his Time, but three more eminent than the rest, Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of Chichester, and Thomas Archdeacon of Hereford; all three either Canonized, or at least thought worthy to be Canonized for Saints. To these may be added Robert Grosbead or Grosteste Bishop of Lincoln, who translated the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs out of Greek into Latin, which through Envy of the Jews never came to the Knowledge of Saint Hierome, wherein are many Prophecies of our Saviour Christ. Of Men famous for Learning there were likewise many in his Time, of whom some left Works behind them for Testimonies of their Knowledge in divers kinds, as Alexander Hales, a Frier minor, who wrote many Treatises in Prince Edward poisoned in the Holy Land.

The Poison suck'd out of his Wounds by his Wife.

He takes the Death of his Father more heavily than of his Son.

Prince Edward's Valour.

As soon as King Henry was dead and buried, the great Lords of the Land caused his eldest Son, Prince Edward, to be proclaimed King: And assembling at the new Temple in London, they there took Order for the quiet governing of the Kingdom till he should come home. For at this Time he was absent in the Holy Land, and had been there above a Year when his Father died. But we cannot bring him home without telling what he did, and what he suffered in all that Time, and in his Return. For at his first coming thither he rescued the great City of Acon from being surrendered to the Souldan; after which, out of Envy to his Valour, one Anzazim, a desperate Saracen, who had often been employed to him from their General, being one Time, upon Pretence of some secret Message, admitted alone into the Chamber, with a poisoned Knife gave him three Wounds in the Body, two in the Arm, and one near the Arm-pit, which were thought to be mortal, and had perhaps been mortal, if out of unspeakable Love the Lady Eleanor, his Wife, had not suck'd out the Poison of his Wounds with her Mouth; and thereby effecting a Cure, which otherwise had been incurable. It is no Wonder, that Love should do Wonders, which is it self a Wonder. And now being disappointed of Aids that were promised to be sent him, and leaving Garrisons in fit Places for Defence of the Country, he, with his Wife Eleanor, takes his Journey homewards: And first passing by Sicily, was there most kindly received by Charles, King of that Island, where he first heard of his Father's Death; which he took more heavily, far, than he had taken the Death of his young Son Henry, whereof he had heard a little before. At which when King Charles marvelled, he answered, That other Sons might be had, but another Father could never be had. From hence he passeth through Italy, where much Honour is done him by the Pope, and other Princes; and then descends into Burgoyne, where, by the Earl of Chalons, a stout Man at Arms, he is challenged at a Turnament, with a Pretence to solemnize his Presence; but with a Purpose indeed to disgrace his Person. And though Prince Edward in many Respects might justly have refused it, yet the Nobleness of his Mind would not suffer him to pass by any Occasion of shewing his Valour: And in this Encounter he so foiled the Earl, as he made it appear, that Fame had been no Liar in the Report it had made of him. And here a great Part of his English Nobility met him, from whence he passed into France, where the King Philip, his near Cousin (as being Sisters Sons) entertains him with great Solemnity, and graceth his Solemnity with so much Courtesy, that it won Prince Edward voluntarily to do him Homage for the Territories he held in France: And this Voluntariness in Prince Edward won the King of France again to grant quietly unto him all the Lands in France that belonged to him; and so these two great Kings by reciprocal Courtesy, effected that which their Predecessors by Force could never effect. From hence he passed through Aquitain, and having there taken Homage of his Subjects, and set all Things in Order, he set sail and arrived in England, about a Year after the Death of his Father: A long Time for plotting of Mischief, and a strong Temptation to Plotters of Mischief, if all Causes of Quietness had not concurred: But such was the Worthiness of Prince Edward's Person, and such the Undoubtedness of his Title, that as there could be no Competitor, so there would be no Oppugner. And indeed the Divine Providence had shewed a special Care over him from his Childhood; whereof one or two Examples will not be unfit to be related. One was this; that being yet but young, and playing one time at Chels with a Friend, in the midst of his Game, without any apparent Occasion, he removed himself from the Place where he sat, when suddenly there fell from the Roof of the House a great Stone, which, if he had stayed in the Place but ever so little, had beaten out his Brains. Another Example of the Divine Providence over him (though it happened afterwards) was this: Having prepared a great Fleet of Ships for a Journey into Flanders, and being at Winchelsey, where the Ships were to meet, it happened, that riding about the Harbour, his Horse, frightened with the Noise of a Wind-mill, which the Wind drove violently about, scrambled up, and leap'd over the Mud-wall of the Town, so as neither the King nor the Horse was to be seen, but every one judged, the King could not choose but be thrown and killed; yet such was the Divine

A.D. 1272 vine Providence over him, that the Horse lighted upon his Feet, and the King keeping the Saddle returned safe. And under the Wing of this Divine Providence, he had now passed all the Dangers of this tedious Journey; and being safely come to London, was on the fifteenth Day of August, in the Year 1274, crowned at Westminster, together with his Wife Queen Eleanor, by Robert Kilwarby, Archbishop of Canterbury, where five hundred great Horses were let loose for any that could take them; and yet the outward Solemnity was not more great than the inward Joy was universal; every Man rejoicing, not only at a Change, which of it self is pleasing, but at a Change so much for the better as this was like to be.

Of his Acts done after he was crowned.

THE Acts of this King after he was Crowned, may not unfitly be divided into five Parts: His Acts with his Temporal Lords, his Acts with his Clergy; then with Wales; then his Acts with Scotland; and lastly with France: And first concerning his Lords, he gave them good Contentment in the Beginning of his Reign, by enlarging their Liberties, and granting them easier Laws; for which Purpose he called a Parliament, wherein were made the Statutes called of Westminster the first: So as he had no Difference with them till toward the End of his Reign, as shall be shewed hereafter. In the next Place, concerning his Acts with his Clergy, he began with them betimes; for having lived to be of good Age, three or four and thirty Years old, in his Father's Reign, he observed in that Time, that their Power was too predominant, and therefore thought fit to clip their Wings, at least to keep them farther from growing; which he did by these Means: First, in the sixth Year of his Reign he deprived many chief Monasteries of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Convent of Westminster, the Return of Writs granted them by the Charter of his Father, King Henry the Third. The next Year after, he got to be enacted the Statute of Mortmain, to hinder the Encrease of their temporal Possessions. In the second Statute of Westminster, he defaulted the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Judges; and growing more upon them, he required the Moiety of all their Goods, as well Temporal as Spiritual, for one Year. Then calls he a Parliament of his Nobles at Salisbury, without Admission of any Churchmen in it. And it is worth the noting, that Marchian, his Treasurer, acquainting him that in Churches and religious Houses there was much Treasure to be had, if it might be taken, he made no Scruple of it, but caused it to be taken and brought into his Exchequer. But finding his Prelates not well contented with it, to please them again, he bids them ask something of him, wherein they should see how much he favoured them. And they asking of him to repeal the Statute of Mortmain, that had been made so much to their Hinderance; he answered, That this was a Statute made by the whole Body of the Realm, and therefore was not in his Power, who was but one Member of that Body, to undo that which all the Members together had done. And perhaps whatsoever they should have asked else, he would have had an Answer A.D. 1274 to redeem his Offer. And thus much concerning his Clergy.

In the next Place are the Welch, who had themselves begun with the King. For their Prince Leolin being summoned to attend at his Coronation, refused to come; and afterwards at more Leisure, being required to come and do him Homage, he stood upon Terms of safe Conduct, pretending Doubt to be used as his Father Griffith had been, who upon hard Usage in the Tower, seeking to make Escape, fell from the Walls and broke his Neck. But indeed it was always a Custom with this Nation, at every Change of Princes in England, to try Conclusions, hoping at one Time or other to have a Day of it, and to change their Yoke of Bondage into Liberty: For which they were never better provided than now; especially (which is the greatest Matter in War) having a valiant Prince to their Leader. But there happened an Accident which took off their Edge at this Time: For the Lady Eleanor, a Daughter of the late Earl Simon Mountford, whom Prince Leolin extremely loved, passing out of France into Wales, was by the Way upon the Sea taken by English Ships, and brought to King Edward; and for the Love of her, Prince Leolin was content to submit himself to any Conditions; which besides Subjection of his State, was to pay fifty thousand Pounds Sterling, and a thousand Pounds per Annum during his Life. And upon these Conditions the Marriage with his beloved Lady was granted him, and was solemnized here in England; whereat the King and Queen were themselves present. Three Years Leolin continued loyal, and within the Bounds of Obedience; in which Time David, one of his Brothers, staying here in England, and found by the King to be of a stirring Spirit, was much honoured by him, knighted, and matched to a rich Widow, Daughter of the Earl of Derby; and had given him by the King besides, the Castle of Denbigh, with a thousand Pounds per Annum; though (as it was afterwards found) he lived here but in the Nature of a Spy. For when Prince Leolin's Lady was afterward dead, and that he (contrary to his Conditions formerly made) brake out into Rebellion, then goes his Brother David to him, notwithstanding all these Favours of the King; and they together enter the English Borders, surprize the Castles of Flint and Ruddlan, with the Person of the Lord Clifford, sent Justiciar into those Parts; and in a great Battle overthrew the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with the Slaughter of Sir William Lindsey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many others. King Edward advertised of this Revolt and Overthrow, being then at the Devizes in Wiltshire, prepares an Army to repress it; but before his setting forth, goes privately to his Mother Queen Eleanor, lying at the Nunnery of Amesbury, with whom whilst he conferred, there was one brought into the Chamber, who feigned himself (being blind) to have received his Sight at the Tomb of King Henry the third. As soon as the King saw the Man, he remembered he had seen him before, and knew him to be a most notorious lying Villain, and wished his Mother in no Case to believe him: But his Mother, who much rejoiced

Prince Leolin delays to do his Homage.

For the Love of his Lady he submits himself.

She dead, he falls to Rebellion.

An Impostor discovered by the King.

A.D. 1274 to hear of this Miracle, for the Glory of her Husband, finding her Son unwilling that his Father should be a Saint, grew suddenly into such a Rage against him, that she commanded him to avoid her Chamber; which the King obeys; and going forth, meets with a Clergy-man, to whom he tells the Story of this Impostor, and merrily said, He knew the Justice of his Father to be such, that he would rather pull out the Eyes (being whole) of such a wicked Wretch, than restore them to their Sight. In this mean Time the Archbishop of Canterbury had gone of himself to Prince Leolin, and had laboured to bring him and his Brother David to a Re-submission, but could effect nothing; for besides other Reasons that swayed Prince Leolin, the Conceit of a Prophecy of Merlin, that he should shortly be crowned with a Diadem of Brute, so overweighed him, that he had no Ear for Peace, and shortly after no Head. For after the Earl of Pembroke had taken Bere-Castle, which was the Seat of Prince Leolin, he was himself slain in Battle; and his Head, cut off by a common Soldier, was sent to King Edward, who caused the same to be crowned with Ivy, and to be set upon the Tower of London. And this was the End of Leolin, the last of the Welch Princes, betrayed (as some write) by the Men of Buelth. Not long after his Brother David also is taken in Wales, and judged in England to an ignominious Death; first drawn at a Horse's Tail about the City of Shrewsbury, then beheaded, the Trunk of his Body divided, his Heart and Bowels burnt, his Head sent to accompany his Brother's on the Tower of London, his four Quarters to four Cities, Bristol, Northampton, York, and Winchester. A manifold Execution, and the first shewed in that Kind in this Kingdom, in the Person of the Son of a Prince, or any other Nobleman, that we read of in our History. It is perhaps something which some here observe, that at the sealing of his Conquest, King Edward lost his eldest Son Alphonfus, of the Age of 12 Years (a Prince of great Hope) and had only left to succeed him his Son Edward, lately born at Carnarvan, and the first of the English entitled Prince of Wales, but no Prince worthy of either Wales or England. And thus came Wales to be united to the Crown of England, in the eleventh Year of this King Edward's Reign; who thereupon established the Government thereof, according to the Laws of England, as may be seen by the Statute of Rutland, in the twelfth Year of his Reign.

The last of the Welch Princes. His Brother David's ignominious Death.

The Work of Wales being settled, King Edward passeth over into France, upon Notice of the Death of Philip the Hardy, to renew and confirm such Conditions as his State in those Parts required with the new King Philip the Fourth, entitled Fair; to whom he doth Homage for Aquitain, having before quitted his Claim to Normandy for ever. After three Years and a Half, being away in France, he returns into England; and now in the next Place comes the Business with Scotland, and will hold him Work at Times as long as he lives, and his Son after him. Alexander the Third, King of Scots, as he was running his Horse, fell Horse and Man to the Ground, and broke his Neck, and died immediately; by reason whereof (he leaving no Issue, but only a Daughter of his Daughter A.D. 1283 Margaret, who died also soon after) there fell out presently great Contention about Succession.

Ten Competitors pretend Title, namely, Erick, The King of Norway, Florence, Earl of Holland, Robert Bruce, Earl of Anandale, John de Baliol, Lord of Galloway, John de Hastings, Lord of Abergavenny, John Cummin, Lord of Badenaw, Patrick de Dunbarre, Earl of March, John de Vescy, Nicholas de Sules, William de Ross; all, or most of them, descending from David, Earl of Huntington, younger Brother to William King of Scots, and great Uncle to the late King Alexander. This Title King Edward takes upon him to decide, pretending a Right of Superiority from his Ancestors over that Kingdom, and proving it by Authority of old Chronicles, as Marianus Scotus, William of Malmesbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and others; which, though the Scotish Lords who swayed the Inter-regnum opposed, yet are they constrained for avoiding of further Inconveniencies, to make him Arbitrator thereof, and the ten Competitors bound to stand to his Award. Two are especially found, between whom the Right lay, John de Baliol, Lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruce; the one descended from an elder Daughter; the other from a Son of a younger Daughter of Alan, who had married the eldest Daughter of this David, Brother to King William. The Controversy held long: Twelve of either Kingdom learned in the Laws are elected to debate the same at Berwick; all the best Civilians in the Universities of France are solicited to give their Opinions: All which brought forth rather Doubts than Resolutions. Whereupon King Edward, the better to sway this Business by his Presence, takes a Journey Northward, where, being come as far as Lincolnshire, he lost his beloved Wife Queen Eleanor, and thereupon went back to see her Funeral performed at Westminster; that done, he returns presently to his Scotish Business. And now six Years were passed since the Death of King Alexander, and yet nothing concluded in this Controversy; whereupon King Edward deals privately with Bruce (who had the weaker Title, but the more Friends) and promiseth him, if he would swear Fealty and Homage to the Crown of England, he would invest him in that of Scotland. But Bruce answers, He was not so desirous to rule, as thereby to infringe the Liberties of his Country. Whereupon, with the like Offers he sets upon Baliol, who having better Right, but less Love of the People, and more greedy of a Kingdom than Honour, accepts the Condition; and thereupon is crowned King at Scone, hath Fealty done him by all the chief Nobility, except Bruce; comes to Newcastle upon Tyne, where King Edward then lay, and there, with many of his Nobles, swears Fealty, and doth Homage to him as his Sovereign Lord. Which act done to secure him, overthrew him; for being little beloved before, hereby he became less. Such as stood for Bruce, and others of the Nobility (tender of the Preservation of their Countries Liberty) took Stomach against him; and not only for this, but shortly after for his Injustice in the Case of the Earl of Fife, one of the six Governours in the Time of the Inter-regnum.

The Competitors for the Crown of Scotland.

K. Edward Arbitrator, in whom is the Right.

1291. K. Edward's Queen Eleanor dieth.

K. Edward arbitrator: eth the Crown to Baliol.

A.D. 1291 regnum, who had been slain by the Family of Alberneth, the Brother of which Earl prosecuting Law before King Baliol, in his high Court of Parliament, and having no Right done him (King Baliol giving Judgment of the Side of the Alberneths) he appeals to the Court of the King of England. Whereupon Baliol is summoned, appears, sits with King Edward in his Parliament till his Cause was to be heard, and then is cited by an Officer to arise, and to stand in the Place appointed for Pleading; then he craves to answer by a Procurator, but is denied, and thereupon descends to the ordinary Place, and defends his Cause himself. Which Indignity (as he took it) so incenseth him, that he returns home with a Breast full charged with Indignation, meditates Revenge, renews the antient League with France, confirms it with Marriage of his Son Edward to a Daughter of Charles, Brother to King Philip, glad in regard of late Offences taken against the King of England to embrace the same; which done, Baliol defies King Edward, renounceth his Allegiance, as unlawfully done, being not in his Power, without Consent of the State, to do any such Act. Hereupon brake out the mortal Dissention between the two Nations, which consumed more Christian Blood, and continued longer than ever Quarrel we read of did between any two People in the World: For he that began it, could not end it; but it lasted almost three hundred Years, and was never thoroughly abolished till the late blessed Union. And now the fatal Chair in which the Kings of Scotland used to be inaugurated, seems to recover its secret Operation, according to antient Prophecy, that whithersoever that Chair should be removed, the Kingdom should be removed with it; and this Chair King Edward caused to be brought out of Scotland to Westminster, and to be placed there amongst the Monuments, where it still continues. But now King Baliol, being summoned to appear at Newcastle, and refusing to come, King Edward enters Scotland with an Army consisting of four thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot, besides five hundred Horse, and one thousand Foot of the Bishop of Durham. Berwick is first won, with the Slaughter of fifteen thousand Scots (our Writers say more) and after that, the Castles of Dunbar, Roxborough, Edinburgh, Sterling, and St. John's Town; and King Baliol sues for Peace, submits himself, takes again his Oath of Fealty to King Edward as his Sovereign Lord. Which done, a Parliament for Scotland is held at Berwick, where the Nobility likewise did Homage to him, confirming the same by their Charter, under their Hands and Seals; only William Douglas refuseth, content rather to endure the Misery of a Prison, than yield to the Subjection of the King of England. But King Baliol, notwithstanding his Submission, is sent Prisoner into England after his four Years Reign in Scotland; and King Edward returns home, leaving John Warren, Earl of Sussex and Surrey, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Cressingham Treasurer, and Ormesly Chief Justice, with Commission to take in his Name the Homages and Fealties of all such as held Lands of that Crown. But this continued not long; for King Edward being absent in France, the Scots fell upon the Officers he had left, slew Sir Hugh A.D. 1291 Cressingham with six thousand English, recovered many Castles, and regained the Town of Berwick; and all by the Animation and Conduct of one William Walleis, a poor private Gentleman (though nobly descended) who seeing his Country without a Head, and thereby without a Heart (all the great Men either in Captivity or Subjection) assembles certain of as poor and desperate Estate as himself, and leads them to attempt upon whatsoever Advantages they could find to annoy the English; and having therein good Success, it so encreased both his Courage and Company, that he afterward came to be the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom, and was in Possibility to have absolutely redeemed his Country from the Subjection of the English, if the speedy coming of King Edward had not prevented him. For now King Edward, to bring his Work near together, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Justice to York, where they continued above six Years; and thither he calls a Parliament, requiring all his Subjects that held of him by Knight's Service, to be ready at Roxborough by a peremptory Day; where they assemble three thousand Men at Arms on barded Horses, and four thousand other armed Men on Horses without Bards, with an Army of Foot answerable, consisting most of Welsh and Irish, besides five hundred Men at Arms out of Gascoin: And with this Power he makes his second Expedition into Scotland; the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Vanguard at the famous Battle of Fonkirk, where the Shouts of the Scots were so great, that King Edward's Horse frightened withal, cast him off, and brake two of his Ribs; which notwithstanding he gets up again, goes on, and gets Victory; wherein are reported to be slain two hundred Knights, and forty thousand Foot of the Scots; but William Walleis, with some few escaped to make more Work. And here again that Kingdom might seem as if quite overthrown. Most of the Estates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their Titles) that had stood out, were bestowed on the English; and a Parliament is called at St. Andrews, where all the great Men of the Kingdom, except only Walleis, once again swear Fealty to the King of England. It seems swearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a Ceremony without Substance, as good as nothing; for this is now the third Time they swore Fealty to King Edward; yet all did not serve to make them loyal: For not long after comes the News of a new King made and crowned in Scotland. Robert Bruce, Earl of Carrick, Son to that Bruce who was Competitor with Baliol, escaping out of England, becomes Head to the confused Body of that Kingdom, and perceiving John Cummin (who had a Title himself) to go about to bewray his Intentions to King Edward, he finding him at Dumfries, sets upon him, and murders him in the Church: Whereof as soon as King Edward heard, he sends Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and the Lords Clifford and Piercy with a strong Power to revenge the Death of Cummin, and to relieve his Wardens of Scotland; who upon Bruce's Revolt, were all retired to Berwick, whilst himself prepares an Army to follow; wherein to be the more nobly attended, he caused Proclamation to be made,

Baliol is incensed against Edward, and why.

Baliol is sent Prisoner into England.

Robert Bruce attempts for the Crown.

A.D. 1298 made, that whosoever ought by their paternal Succession, or otherwise had Means of their own for Service, should repair to Westminster, at the Feast of Pentecost, to receive the Order of Knight-hood, and a military Ornament out of the King's Wardrobe. Hereupon three hundred young Gentlemen, all the Sons of Earls, Barons, and Knights, assemble at the Day appointed, and receive Purples, Silks, Sindons, Scarfs wrought with Gold or Silver, according to every Man's Estate. For which Train (because the King's House was too little, by reason a Part of it had been lately burnt) room is made, and the Apple Trees cut down at the New Temple for their Tents, where they attire themselves, and keep their Vigil. The Prince (whom the King then likewise knighted, and gave him the Dutchy of Aquitain) kept his Vigil with his Train at Westminster; and the next Day he girded these three hundred Knights with the military Belt, in such manner as he himself had received it. Which done, the King before them all, makes a Vow, that alive or dead he would revenge the Death of Cummin upon Bruce, and the perjured Scots; adjuring his Son and all the Nobles about him, upon their Fealty, that if he died in his Journey, they should carry his Corpse with them about Scotland, and not suffer it to be interred till they had vanquished the Usurper, and absolutely brought the Country to Subjection. The Prince and all the Nobles promise upon their Faith, to employ their utmost Power to perform his Vow: And herewithal he sets forth with a potent Army presently after Whitsuntide, and makes his last Expedition into Scotland, in the four and thirtieth Year of his Reign; at which Time he made above two hundred Knights.

1306. The Earl of Pembroke, with that Power sent before, and Aid of the Scotch Party, had before the King arrived in Scotland, defeated in a Battle near St. John's Town, the whole Army of the new King, and narrowly missed the taking of his Person; but he escaping in Disguise, and sheltering himself in obscure Places, was reserved for greater Battles: his Brothers Nigel, Bruce, and shortly after Thomas and Alexander a Priest, were taken and executed after the manner of Traitors at Berwick. And now K. Edward had done for fighting, all was now for Executions; and indeed his Desire of Revenge made him inexorable, and vowed to spare none of what Degree soever. The Earl of Athol (though of Royal Blood, and allied unto him) was sent to London, where all his Preferment was, to have a higher Pair of Gallows than the rest. The Wife of Robert Bruce, taken by the Lord Ross, is sent Prisoner to London, and his Daughter to a Monastery in Lindsey. The Countess of Boughan, who had been aiding at Bruce's Coronation, is put into a wooden Cage, and hung out upon the Wall of Berwick for People to gaze on. But though Bruce's Party was thus dejected, and himself at this Time appeared not, but shifted privily from Place to Place in a distressed manner (attended only with two noble Gentlemen, who never forsook him in his Misfortunes, the Earl of Lenox, and Gilbert Hay) yet gives he not over, but gathers new Forces, with which he suddenly assails the Earl of Pembroke at unawares, gives him a great Defeat, and within three Days after chaseth the Earl of Gloucester into the Castle A.D. 1306 of Aire, where he besieged him, till by the King's Forces he was driven again to his former Retire. Whereupon King Edward, who had spent his Winter at Carlisle, in July following, with a fresh Army enters Scotland himself; but falling into a Dysentery or Bloody-flux at Borough upon the Sands, he ended his Life. And thus ended King Edward's Troubles with Scotland, but not England's Troubles, which are more to come than yet are past.

But though this Business of Scotland never left King Edward till his dying Day, yet it had been upon him but as an Ague, sometimes putting him into violent Heats, and sometimes leaving him in a quiet Temper with such a Vicissitude, that when he had Quietness with Scotland, he had Troubles with France, whereof the Time is now to speak. It is well known that Philip King of France, Father of the present King, and Edward King of England were near Cousins, the Sons of two Sisters; and it hath been shewed before at King Edward's returning from the Holy Land, and passing through France, what extraordinary Kindness and mutual Courtesy passed between them, that one would have thought neither they nor theirs should ever have fallen out; and perhaps never should, if they had been private Men, and not Princes. For private Men may easily continue Friends, as having none to confider but themselves; but Princes hardly, as having besides themselves, their Subjects to confider. And though they be the Subjects oftentimes that make the Quarrel, yet they are the Princes that must maintain it. And besides, between Princes there can never be but Jealousies, and where Jealousies are, every Trifle makes a Quarrel. And this was the Case of these two Kings. Certain of the King of England's Subjects had upon the Coast of Normandy done Spoil to some Subjects of the King of France; and this Difference of the Subjects made a Difference between the Kings, while each of them standing in Defence of his own, fall out themselves; and for a Beginning the King of France summons King Edward, as owing Homage to that Crown, to appear and answer it in his Court: And King Edward, though voluntarily before he had done it in a way of Courtesy, yet being now imperiously commanded, he refuseth it; upon which Refusal, all his Territories in France are condemned to be forfeited, and an Army is presently sent to seize upon the same, led by Charles Valois, and Arnold de Neale, Constable of France. Bourdeaux, with divers other Places of Importance, are taken from him. And now King Edward well knowing what Danger it was to have so powerful an Adversary, endeavours first to strengthen himself with Friends abroad, seeks to match his Son Edward with a Daughter of Guy Earl of Flanders, marries one of his Daughters to the Duke of Barre, who pretended Title of Campaigne; another to John Duke of Brabant, sends fifteen thousand Pounds Sterling to Adolph de Nassau, the Emperor, for recovery of certain Lands which he claimed in France; and with all these, and many other confining Princes, he set upon the King of France, and then sends over his Brother Edmund Earl of Lancaster, the Earl of Lincoln, and Richmond, with eight and twenty Banners, seven hundred Men at Arms,

The Order of Knight-hood imposed upon Men of Means.

K. Edward makes a Journey into Scotland to revenge the Death of Cummin.

He defeats the Scotch Army.

The King of England and France fall out, and why.

A.D. 1306 Arms, and a Navy of three hundred and sixty Sail. In the mean Time the King of France having had Intelligence of the intended Alliance between King Edward and Guy Earl of Flanders, sends for the said Earl (as if knowing nothing thereof) to come with his Wife and Daughter, to make merry with him at Paris; where, instead of feasting him, he makes him Prisoner, and takes from him his Daughter, in regard he sought (being his Vassal) to match her with his capital Enemy. The Earl excuseth it the best he could; and by much Mediation is released himself, but not his Daughter. Whereupon the Earl presuming upon Aid from King Edward, takes Arms and defies the King of France: Who thereupon comes with an Army of sixty thousand against him; which caused King Edward with all speed possible to relieve this distressed Earl; and so leaving the Government of the Kingdom in his Absence to the Bishop of London, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lords Raynold, Gray, and Clifford, with five hundred Sail, and eighteen thousand Men at Arms, he passed over into France. But finding the Country distracted into many popular Factions, and the King of France daily getting upon them (having already won Lisle, Douay, Courtray, Bruges, and Dam) and the Emperor Adolph failing to send him Aid as he had promised, he fell into great Perplexity, and having staid the whole Winter at Gaunt, where by reason of many Outrages committed by his Soldiers, he was so affronted by the Gauntois, that his own Person was not without some Danger. He thereupon in the Spring of the Year concludes a Truce with the King of France for two Years, takes his Sister Margaret to Wife, and affianceth the Daughter of the same King to his Son Prince Edward, and so returns into England. And these were all the Troubles King Edward had with France.

A Truce is concluded between them. K. Edward marries his Son Edward to a Daughter of the King of France.

The Lords refuse to attend the King, unless he went himself in Person.

But now must something be spoken of the Troubles with his Lords at home, whereof this was the Beginning. In a Parliament at Salisbury the five and twentieth Year of his Reign, the King requires certain of his Lords to go to the Wars in Gascoin, which needed a present Supply, by reason of the Death of his Brother Edmund; but the Lords make all their Excuses, every Man for himself: Whereupon the King in great Rage threatened they should either go, or he would give their Lands to others that should. Upon this Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, High-Constable, and Roger Bigot Earl of Norfolk, Marshal of England, make their Declaration, that if the King went in Person, they would attend him, otherwise not. Which Answer offended the King more; and being urged again, the Earl Marshal protested he would willingly go thither with the King, and march before him in the Vanguard, as by Right of Inheritance he ought to do: But the King told him plainly, he should go with any other, though he went not himself in Person. I am not so bound (saith the Earl) neither will I take that Journey without you. The King swore, by God, Sir Earl, you shall either go or hang. And I swear by the same Oath (saith the Earl) I will neither go nor hang; and so without Leave departs. Shortly after the two Earls assemble many Noblemen, and other their Friends to the Number of thirty Bannerets; so as they were fifteen hundred Men at Arms, well appointed, and stood upon their Guard. The King like a prudent Prince, who knew his Times, prosecutes them not as then, but lets the Matter pass in regard that his Business called him presently into Flanders. When being ready to take Ship, the Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons and the Commons send him a Roll of the Grievances of his Subjects, concerning his Taxes, Subsidies, and other Impositions, with his seeking to force their Services by unlawful Courses: To which the King sends Answer, that he could not alter any thing without the Advice of his Council, who were not now about him: and therefore required them, seeing they would not attend him in his Journey (which they absolutely refused to do, though he went in Person, unless he had gone into France or Scotland) that they would yet do nothing in his Absence prejudicial to the Peace of the Kingdom; and that at his Return he would set all things in good Order to their Contentment. But having taken his Journey, and being held there with long Delays, to his exceeding great Expences, he was forced to send over for more Supply of Treasure; and thereupon gave Order for a Parliament to be held at York by the Prince, and (because of his Minority, for he was then but sixteen Years of Age) by such as had the managing of the Kingdom in his Absence; and to the End he would not be disappointed of Aid, he condescends to all such Articles as were demanded, concerning the great Charter; promising from thenceforth never to charge his Subjects otherwise than by their Consents in Parliament, and to pardon all such as had denied to attend him in this Journey. After this, in the 27th Year of his Reign, a Parliament is called at Westminster, wherein the promised Confirmation of the two Charters, and the Allowance of what Disafforestation had heretofore been made, was earnestly urg'd, and in the end with much ado granted, and that with Omission of the Clause, Salvo Jure Corona nostre, which the King laboured to have inserted, but the People by no means would agree; and the Perambulation of the Forests of England was then committed to three Bishops, three Earls, and three Barons. But some Years after, in the two and thirtieth Year of his Reign, King Edward began to shew his Resentment of the stubborn Behaviour of his Nobles towards him in Times past; and so terrifies Roger Bigot, Earl Marshal, that to recover his Favour the Earl made him his Heir in Possession (though he had a Brother of his own living) reserving only to himself a thousand Pounds per Annum during his Life. Of others likewise he got great Sums for the same Offence. The Earl of Hereford escaped his Fine by Death; but the Archbishop of Canterbury (whom he accused to have disturbed his Peace in his Absence) he sends over to Pope Clement the Fifth (who succeeded Boniface) that he might be crushed with a double Power. This Pope was Native of Bourdeaux, and so the more regardful of the King's Desire, and the King the more confident of his Favour; which to entertain and encrease, K. Edward sends him a whole Furnish of all Vessels for his Chamber of clean Gold; which great Gift so wrought with the Pope, that he untied the King from the Covenant made with his Subjects

K. Edward condescends to the Lords demands.

K. Edward confirms two Charters,

Is released of his Grant by the Pope.

A.D. 1306 jects concerning their Charters, confirmed unto them by his last three Acts of Parliament, and absolved him from his Oath. A safe Time for Princes, when they might tie themselves by any Obligation to their Subjects, and afterward, for a Bribe to the Pope, be untied again!

His Taxations and Ways for raising Money.

IF Taxations may suffer Degrees of Comparison, it may not unfitly be said of these three last Kings, that King John was in the Positive; his Son Henry the Third, in the Comparative; and this King Edward in the Superlative: For not only he far exceeded the two former, but he hath left a Spell to all that come after, for ever coming near him. But then under the Name of Taxations, we must include the Ways he took for raising of Profit; but first in the way of Parliament. In the first Year of his Reign was granted him a Tenth of the Clergy for two Years, besides a fifteenth of them and the Temporalty. In his fifth Year, a twentieth of their Goods towards the Welsh Wars: In his seventh the old Money was called in, and new coined; in regard it had been much defaced by the Jews, for which 297 were at one Time executed in London; and this brought in Profit of no small Value. In his eleventh Year he had a thirtieth of the Temporalty, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for his Wars in Wales. In the thirteenth, Esuage, forty Shillings of every Knight's Fee. In his fourteenth Year, he had a thousand Marks of certain Merchants fined for false Weights. In his nineteenth, the eleventh Part of all Moveables of the Clergy, and shortly after a Tenth for six Years. In his twentieth, William Marchian, then Lord Treasurer of England, perceiving great Riches to be in Churches and Religious Houses, put it so into the King's Head, that they were all brought into the King's Treasury. In the eighth Year of his Reign, he sent out his Writ Quo Warranto, to examine by what Title Men held their Lands, which brought him in much Money; till John Earl of Warren, being called to shew his Title, drew out an old rusty Sword, and then said he held his Land by that, and by that would hold it to Death; which though it made the King desist from his Project, yet he obtained at that Time a fifteenth Part of the Clergy. In his seventeenth Year he fined all his Judges for Corruption: Sir Ralph de Hengham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in seven thousand Marks; Sir John Lovetot, Justice of the Common-Pleas, in three thousand Marks; Sir William Brompton, in six thousand Marks; Sir Solomon Rochester, in four thousand Marks; Sir Richard Boyland, in four thousand; Sir Walter Hopton, in two thousand; Sir William Sabam, in three thousand; Robert Lithbury, Master of the Rolls, in one thousand; Roger Leicester, in one thousand; Henry Bray, Escheator, and Judge for the Jews, in one thousand: But Sir Adam Stratton, chief Baron of the Exchequer, in four and thirty thousand; and Thomas Wayland (found the greatest Delinquent, and of the greatest Substance) had all his Goods and whole Estate confiscated to the King, and himself banished out of the Kingdom. In his eighteenth Year he banished the Jews; of whom there was at that Time above fifteen thousand in the A.D. 1306 Kingdom, who had all their Goods confiscate, leaving them only Means to bear their Charges in going away.

In his four and twentieth Year, he commanded a Subsidy to be levied upon all Sarplars of Wool going out of England; as likewise with Fells and Hides. In his five and twentieth Year, he calls a Parliament at St. Edmondsbury, where is granted the eighth Part of the Goods of good Towns, and all other People the twelfth. As for the Clergy, they desire to be excused, and refuse to contribute, in regard of their many late Payments; as in the two and twentieth Year of his Reign, they payed the Moiety of their Goods: And in his three and twentieth Year he seisseth into his Hands all Priories, Aliens, and their Goods; besides, he had a Loan of the Clergy, which amounted to an hundred thousand Pounds: But notwithstanding, upon this Refusal of the Clergy, the King puts all Clergy-men out of his Protection, whereby they were to have no Justice in any of the Courts (a Strain of State beyond any of his Predecessors) which so amazed them, that in the End, the Archbishop of York, with the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury, and Lincoln, yielded to lay down in their Churches the fifth Part of all their Goods towards the Maintenance of the King's Wars; whereby they appeased his Wrath, and were received into Grace. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, by whose Animation the rest stood out, had all his Goods seised on, and all the Monasteries within his Diocess taken into the King's Hands; and Wardens appointed to minister only Necessaries to the Monks, converting the rest to the King's Use: At length, by much Suit, the Abbots and Priests giving the fourth Part of their Goods, redeem themselves and the King's Favour. In the six and twentieth Year of his Reign, at a Parliament holden at York, is granted him the ninth Penny of the Goods of the Temporalty, the tenth Penny of the Clergy of the Diocess of Canterbury, and of York the fifth; and in this Year also he raised the Imposition upon every Sack of Wool, from a Noble to forty Shillings. In his two and thirtieth Year he sends out a new Writ of Inquisition, called Trailbaston, for Intruders on other Mens Lands; who, to oppress the right Owner, would make over their Land to great Men; Batteries hired to beat Men, for Breakers of Peace, for Ravishers, Incendiaries, Murtherers, Fighters, false Assisers, and other such Malefactors; which Inquisition was so strictly executed, and such Fines taken, that it brought in exceeding much Treasure to the King: As likewise did another Commission at the same Time, sent forth to examine the Behaviour of Officers and Ministers of Justice; wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. At this Time also he called his Lords to account for their Stubbornness some Years before, in denying to attend him in Flanders; which brought him in Profit answerable to their Greatness that were called. After all this, in his four and thirtieth Year, there is granted him the thirtieth Penny of both Clergy and Laity, and the twentieth of all Merchants towards his Journey into Scotland. And this may be sufficient to shew his Taxations.

The Clergy is put out of the King's Protection.

The Writ of Trailbaston sent forth.

He banisheth the Jews.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN the first Year of his Reign were made the Statutes called Westminster the First. In his twelfth Year were made the Statutes of Acton Burnel. In the fourteenth Year of his Reign were made Statutes called Additamenta Gloucestriae. He ordained such Men to be Sheriffs in every County as were of the same County where they were to be Sheriffs. He ordained that Jews should wear a Cognisance upon their upper Garment, whereby to be known, and restrained their excessive taking of Usury. In his Time was also enacted the Statute of Mortmain. In his Time new Pieces of Money were coined, and Half-pence of Silver, which were before of base Metal. In his Time, three Men for Rescuing of a Prisoner, arrested by an Officer, had their Right-hands cut off by the Wrists. In his Time all Jews were banished out of the Realm. This King by Proclamation prohibited the Burning of Sea-coal in London and the Suburbs, for avoiding the noisom Smoak. In his eleventh Year the Bakers of London were first drawn upon Hurdles, Henry Walleis Mayor, and Corn was then first sold by Weight. In this King's Time, the Title of Baron, which had before been promiscuous to Men of Estate, was first confined to such only as by the King were called to have Voice in Parliament. In the sixth Year of this King, Michaelmas Term was kept at Shrewsbury. In his twelfth, he divided Wales into Shires, and ordained Sheriffs there as used in England.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN his Time, at a Synod holden at Reading by the Archbishop of Canterbury, it was ordained according to the Constitutions of the General Council, that no Ecclesiastical Person should have more than one Benefice, to whom belonged the Cure of Souls: And that every Person promoted to any Ecclesiastical Living, should take the Order of Priesthood within one Year after. In his Time lived and died Pope Boniface the Eighth, of whom his Predecessor had prophesied: Ascendes ut Vulpes, regnabis ut Leo, morieris ut Canis.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his Time.

THIS King founded the Abby of the Vale Royal in Cheshire, of the Cisteaux Order. In his Time John Baliol King of Scots, builded Baliol Colledge in Oxford: Also in his Time, Walter Merton Lord Chancellor of England, and after Bishop of Rocheſter, founded Merton College in Oxford, who was drowned passing over the Water at Rocheſter, there being at that time no Bridge, as now there is. In his Time was finished the new Work of the Church at Westminster, which had been threescore and six Years in building. In his Time was laid the Foundation of the Black-Friers beside Ludgate, by Robert Kikwarby Archbishop of Canterbury: Also A.D. 1306 in his Time, his second Wife Queen Margaret began to build the Quire of the Gray-Friers in London. In his Time was begun to be made the great Conduit in London, standing against the Church called Acres in Cheap. In his Time Henry Walleis, Mayor of London, caused the Ton upon Cornhil, to be a Prison for Nightwalkers; and also builded a House called the Stocks, for a Market of Fish and Flesh, in the midst of the City. In this King's Time, Edmund Earl of Leicester, the King's Brother, founded the Minories, a Nunnery without Aldgate. This King builded the Castle of Flint in Wales, and the Castle of Beaumaris in the Isle of Anglesey, and the Castle of Carnarvan by Snowdon. Also in this King's Time, John Pickham, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a College of Canons at Wingham in Kent.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN the second Year of this King's Reign, there happened the greatest Rot of Sheep in England that ever was known, which continued five and twenty Years; and came (as was thought) by one infected Sheep of incredible Greatness, brought out of Spain by a French Merchant into Northumberland. In the fifteenth Year of this King's Reign, Wheat was sold for ten Groats a Quarter; when the next Year after there was so great a Dearth, that it was sold for eighteen Pence the Bushel. In the seventeenth Year of his Reign there fell so much Rain, that Wheat was raised from three Pence the Bushel, to sixteen Pence; and so encreased Yearly, till at last it was sold for twenty Shillings the Quarter. And this Year the City of Carlisle, and the Abby, with all the Houses belonging to the Friers Minors, was consumed with Fire. In his one and twentieth Year a great Part of the Town of Cambridge, with the Church of our Lady, was also burnt. In the seven and twentieth Year of his Reign his Palace at Westminster, and the Monastery adjoining, were consumed with Fire. The Monastery of Gloucester also was burnt to the Ground. In this Year also an Act of Common-Council by Consent of the King, was made concerning Victuals; a fat Cock to be sold for three-half Pence, two Pullets for three-half Pence, a fat Capon for two pence half Penny, a Goose four Pence, a Mallard three-half Pence, a Partridge three-half Pence, a Pheasant four Pence, a Heron six Pence, a Plover one Penny, a Swan three Shillings, a Crane twelve Pence, two Woodcocks three-half Pence, a fat Lamb from Christmas to Shrovetide, sixteen Pence, and all the Year after for four Pence; and Wheat was this Year so plentiful, that a Quarter was sold for ten Groats. In his sixteenth Year it chanced in Gascoin, that as the King and Queen sate in their Chamber, upon a Bed talking together, a Thunderbolt coming in at the Window behind them, passed betwixt them, and flew two of their Gentlemen that stood before them.

She was buried in Westminster, at the Feet of King Henry the Third, under a fair Marble Tomb, adorned with her Pourtraiture of Copper gilt. By this Wife King Edward had four Sons, and nine Daughters; his eldest Son, John; his second, Henry; his third, Alphonfus, died all young in their Father's Time; his fourth Son, Edward, called of Carnarvon, because born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom. Of his Daughters, the Eldest, named Eleanor, was first married by Proxy to Alphonfus King of Arragon; but he dying before the Marriage solemnized, she was afterward married at Bristol to Henry Earl of Bury in France; by whom she had Issue Sons and Daughters. Joan the second Daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, born at Acon, in the Holy-Land, and thereof called Joan de Acres, was married to Gilbert Clare, called the Red Earl of Gloucester and Hereford, by whom she had Issue Sons and Daughters. She survived her Husband, and was re-married to the Lord Ralph Montbermere, Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, from whom the now Viscount Montacute is descended. Margaret, the third Daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, was married to John Duke of Brabant. Berenger and Alice their fourth and fifth Daughters, dying young and unmarried. Mary their sixth Daughter, at ten Years of Age was made a Nun in the Monastery of Amesbury in Wiltshire, at the Instance of Queen Eleanor her Grandmother, who lived there. Elizabeth their seventh Daughter, was first married to John Earl of Holland, Zealand, and Lord of Freezland: He dying within two Years, she was afterward married to Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford and Essex, Lord of Brecknock, and High-Constable of England, by whom she had Issue Sons and Daughters. Beatrice and Blanch, their eighth and ninth Daughters, died young and unmarried. King Edward's second Wife was Margaret, eldest Daughter of Philip King of France, called the Hardy, and Sister to Philip called the Fair: At eighteen Years old she was married to King Edward, being above Threescore; yet at these unequal Years she had Issue by him two Sons and a Daughter: Their eldest Son was born at a little Village in Yorkshire called Brotherton, and was thereof called Thomas of Brotherton: He was created Earl of Norfolk, and Earl-Marshal of England, after Roger Bigot, who died without Issue. Their second Son Edmund was born at Woodstock in Oxfordshire, and of the Place was so called: He was created Earl of Kent, and married Margaret Daughter of John, and Sister and sole Heir of Thomas Lord Wakes, of Lydel in the County of Northampton; by whom he had Issue two Sons and one Daughter: His Sons Edmund and John died without

This Earl Edmund was beheaded at Winchester, in the fourth Year of King Edward his Nephew. Eleanor the Daughter of King Edward by his second Wife Margaret, died in her Childhood.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of Stature, higher than ordinary Men by Head and Shoulders, and thereof called Longshank; of a swarthy Complexion, Strong of Body, but Lean; of a comely Favour; his Eyes in his Anger sparkling like Fire; the Hair of his Head black and curled. Concerning his Conditions, as he was in War peaceful, so in Peace he was warlike, delighting especially in that Kind of Hunting, which is to kill Stags or other wild Beasts with Spears. In Continency of Life, he was equal to his Father; in Acts of Valour, far beyond him. He had in him the two Wisdoms, not often found in any single, both together seldom or never; an Ability of Judgment in himself, and a Readiness to hear the Judgment of others. He seemed to be a great Observer of Opportunity (a great Point of Wisdom in any, in Princes greatest) and that he could bear an Injury long, without seeking to revenge it, as appeared by his Carriage toward the Earl Roger Bigot, whom when he saw his Time, he called to Account for an Affront he had offered him divers Years before. He was not easily provoked into Passion; but once in Passion, not easily appeased, as was seen by his Dealing with the Scots, towards whom he shewed at first Patience, and at last Severity. If he be censured for his many Taxations, he may be justified by his well bestowing them; for never Prince laid out his Money to more Honour of Himself, or Good of his Kingdom. His greatest Unfortunateness was in his greatest Blessing; for of four Sons, which he had by his Wife Queen Eleanor, three of them died in his own Life-time, who were worthy to have outlived him; and the fourth outlived him, who was worthy never to have been born.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN his last Expedition into Scotland, being at Carlisle, he fell sick; and lying on his Death-bed, he sent for his Son Edward; to whom, besides many Admonitions to Piety, he commended three Things specially; That he should carry his Bones about with him through Scotland, till he had subdued it; That he should send his Heart into the Holy-land with Sevenscore Knights to that War, and the two and thirty thousand Pounds he had provided for that Purpose; And that he should never recal Gaveston from Banishment. And soon after, of a Dysentery or Bloody-flux, he died at Borough upon the Sands,

L I F E and R E I G N of King E D W A R D II.

Of his Acts before, and at his Coronation.

A.D. 1307 EDWARD of Caernarvon, eldest Son of King Edward the First, succeeded him in the Kingdom; and never did Prince come to a Crown with more Applause of Nobility and People: And there was good Cause for it, for he had been trained up in all good Courses for Piety and Learning; he had seen the Government of his Father, from whose Example he could not but have learned many good Lessons; he had been initiated in the Ways of State, having been left Governour of the Realm, and presiding in Parliament in his Father's Absence; and he was now three and twenty Years old, a fit Age for bearing the Weight of a Scepter. And yet, for all these Advantages, there wanted not Fears of him in the Minds of many, who could not but remember what Pranks he had played not long before; how he had broken the Bishop of Chester's Park, and in most disorderly Manner had killed his Deer, for which both himself had been committed to Prison, and his Friend Pierce Gaveston banished the Realm; and if he did such Things, being but Prince, what might not be feared of him coming to be King? For seldom doth Advancement in Honour alter Men to the better; to the worse often, and commonly then when it is joined with an Authority that sets them above Controulment. Neither yet was their Fear more out of what they had seen, than out of what they saw; for where he should have endeavoured to accomplish the Charge his Father had given him on his Death-bed, he seemed to intend nothing less, nothing more than wholly to break it; for he presently called home Pierce Gaveston from Banishment; and the two and thirty thousand Pounds which his Father had specially appointed for the Holy War, either all, or the most of it, he bestowed upon Gaveston. And for carrying his Father's Bones with him about Scotland, it had been well if he had suffered them quietly to be laid at Rest in England. For after the Corpse had been kept above Ground sixteen Weeks in the Abby of Waltham, and that the Bishop of Chester, Walter Langton, the then Lord Treasurer, and the Executor of his Father's Will, was busy in preparing for his Funeral, he sent the Constable of the Tower to arrest him, and imprison him at Wallingford, seizing upon all his Goods, and giving them to Gaveston; and all for old Grudges. And (that which seemed a high Strain of Incongruity) before he had seen performed his Father's Funerals, which was not till the 27th of October following, he entred into a Treaty of his own A.D. 1307 Nuptials; for going over to Boloigne on the two and twentieth of January, he married Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France; which Marriage was honoured with the Presence of four Kings, the King of France himself, the King of Navarre his Son, the King of the Romans, and the King of Sicily; and three Queens, beside the Bride, Mary Queen of France, Margaret the Dowager Queen of England, and the Queen of Navarre; and yet did Gaveston exceed them all in Bravery. This was observed by the Lords of England; and thereupon when his Queen and he came afterward to be crowned, they went unto him, signifying what a heinous Transgression of his Father's Will it was to call home Gaveston; and seeing the Charge was no less given to them than to him, if he did not perform it, they would; and therefore unless he would remove Gaveston from the Court and Kingdom, they would hinder his Coronation from proceeding; which struck such a Damp to Prince Edward's Spirits, to think what Disgrace it would be to him, if so many of his great Friends being present, Charles of Valois the King of France's Brother, the Dukes of Britany and Brabant, the Count of Luxemburg, who was afterward Emperor, the Duke of Savoy, the two Dutcheffes of Brabant and Artois, with many other Princes and great Ladies, if now his Coronation should be called in Question, that he solemnly swore he would do what they desired in the next Parliament, so they would be quiet now. And thereupon on the 24th Day of February, in the Year 1307, his Queen and he were both crowned at Westminster, by the Hands of Henry Bishop of Winchester, by Commission from Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, being then in Exile, and out of the Kingdom; at which Solemnity there was so great a Press of People, that Sir John Blackwel, Knight, was crowded to Death. And now in the very Act of his Coronation, there was given another Provocation to the Lords against Gaveston; for the King had appointed him to carry the Crown of Saint Edward before him (the greatest Honour could be done to a Subject) which added to the other Honours the King had done him (for he had made him Earl of Cornwal, Lord of Man, and Lord Chamberlain) so incensed the Lords, that they entred into Consultation how to suppress this Violence of the King's Affection; which shortly after they put in Execution. Portion in Money, King Edward had none with his Wife; but

WE shall have here no Quinquennium Nerois, no such five Years as Nero afforded in the Beginning of his Reign; but this King at the first Entrance will shew what he is, and what he will continue to be as long as he lives; for though he took some great and grave Men to be of his Council, yet (as appeared afterward) he did it rather to the End they should be pliant to him, than that he had any Meaning to apply himself to them. For let them say what they would, Gaveston must be the Oracle; all the King's Actions were but Gaveston's Impressions. And now Gaveston presently after the Coronation, to let the World be a Witness of his Worthiness, and that the King had not bestowed his Favours upon him without Cause, caused to be published a Tournament at Wallingford, whither came all the great Lords of the Kingdom, as Thomas Earl of Lancaster, Humphry Earl of Hereford, Aymer Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Warren, with many others, all valiant Men at Arms: Yet Gaveston gets the Prize in a publick Tournament.

He casts Scoffs upon all the Lords.

Articles required by the Lords of the King.

1308. Gaveston is banished into Ireland, where he doth many good Services.

none had the Honour of the Day like to Gaveston. And thus far he did well, if he could have stayed here, if having gotten true Glory, he had not fallen into Vain-glory: For the Lords envied him not so much for his Advancement in Honours, as they hated him for his Insolency in Manners; for in a scornful Pride he would be casting Scoffs upon them all, calling Thomas Earl of Lancaster, the Stage-player; the Earl of Lincoln, Bursten-belly; Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, Joseph the Jew; and Guy Earl of Warwick, the black Dog of Arden; which Scoffs, together with his other Insolencies, drew such a Party upon him, that in the next Parliament the whole Assembly obtains of the King to draw Articles of their Grievances, of which the Chief were; That the great Charter of Magna Charta should be observed; That all Strangers should be banished the Court and Kingdom; That the Bu-sineses of the State should be treated of by the Council of the Clergy and the Nobles; And that the King should not begin any War, nor go out of the Kingdom without Consent of the Parliament. Which Articles, though seeming harsh to the King, yet for avoiding of further Inconvenience, he yields unto them, and especially to the Banishment of his Minion Gaveston, as hoping that would excuse him for all the rest: And Robert of Winchelsea, Archbishop of Canterbury, lately called home from Exile, pronounceth Excommunication against all such as should oppose the Articles. Hereupon Gaveston is sent away into Ireland, where he lived a while, not as a banished Man, but as Lieutenant rather of the Country; and indeed not unworthily. For in the Time of his being there, he is said to have made a Journey into the Mountains of Dublin, and to have broken and subdued the Rebels there; built Newcastle in the Kerns Country, repaired the Castle of Kervyn, and passed up to Munster and Thomond, performing every where much Service, with great Valour and Worthiness; that if he had stayed there but a while longer, he might perhaps by his Deserts in Ireland have redeemed his Defects in England. But the King impatient of Absence, and asking Advice what Means might be used to recal him, it was told him, that if he could but match him with the Earl of Gloucester's Sister, a Man of such Greatness, and so beloved of the People, for his Sake certainly no Man would grudge at his coming home. Hereupon the King sends for Gaveston; and makes up the Match between them; and married they were at Bark-hamstead. But this did no good; for Gaveston still working upon the King in such Manner, that he scarce left him Means to sustain himself, and as little to maintain the Queen, nothing being done, but as Gaveston would have it, put the Lords into a new Discontentment; who thereupon went again to the King, and told him plainly, that unless he would put Gaveston out of the Court and Kingdom, they would rise up in Arms against him as a perjured King. This put the King into a great Strait; loth he was to leave Gaveston, and fearful he was to provoke the Lords; in the End, his Fear prevailing over his Love, he was content he should be banished; and in such sort banished, that if ever he returned, or were found in the Kingdom, he should be held and proceeded against as an Enemy of the State. So once again is Gaveston sent packing out of the Kingdom, and goes into France, but found no safe harbouring there; for the King of France hearing of it, gave a strait Charge, if he were found in his Dominions, to apprehend him. Then he passeth into Flanders, but is no safer there than in France. After waving about, and finding no Place to rest in safety, he returns secretly into England, relying upon the King's Love, and the Duke of Gloucester's Favour. The King receives him as an Angel sent from Heaven; and to be out of the Lords Eye, goes a Journey to York, taking Gaveston along with him; and there thinks to be in quiet: But the Lords hearing of it, follow him thither, choosing for their General Thomas Earl of Lancaster, a Man possessed of five Earldoms, Lancaster, Leicester, Ferrers, Lincoln, and Salisbury, besides the Liberties of Pickering, and the Honour of Cockermore, and other Lands in Wales; and there was not a Man of the whole Nobility that was not of the Party, but only Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, the King's Sister's Son. These Lords sent to the King, either to deliver Gaveston into their Hands, or at least to send him peremptorily out of the Kingdom. But the King led by ill Counsel, and little regarding the Lords Messuage, takes Gaveston with him to Newcastle upon Tyne, thence to Tinnmouth, where the Queen then lay; who though great with Child, and intreating the King with Tears to stay with her, yet such was his Desire to see Gaveston put into some Place of Security, that hearing of the Lords approaching, he took a Ship, and passed with Gaveston to Scarborough, and leaving him there in a strong Castle, not easy to be won, he went himself into Warwickshire, perhaps that the Lords might see he had not Gaveston with him. But the Lords hearing where

But soon returns again. The King seeks to shelter him.

A.D. 1310 where Gaveston was, assaulted the Castle with such Violence, that Gaveston seeing no Means to escape, was content to render himself; requesting only that he might but once be allowed to see the King's Face; and the King hearing he was taken, desired as much: To which the Earl of Pembroke consented; and taking Gaveston into his Custody, promised, upon Forfeiture of all he had, to have him forth-coming: But desiring to be with his Wife that Night, who lay not far off, at Dedington, he delivers him to his Servants to carry to Wallingford; from whom, as they pass by Warwick, the Earl of that Place hearing of it, took him forcibly from his Keepers, and brought him to his own Castle. Where, after long Deliberation, whether it were Wisdom to suffer Gaveston to speak with the King or no, it was at last concluded to take off his Head; which at a Place thereby, called Blacklow, was presently put in Execution. His Corpse was carried to Oxford, and kept there two Years, till the King caused it to be brought to Langley, and there builded a Monastery on purpose, where his Soul should be prayed for.

Is beheaded at Blacklow.

The King builds a Monastery on purpose to pray for his Soul. Gaveston's Parentage.

This Gaveston was the Son of a Gentleman of France, who had done good Service for King Edward the First in France; and for his Sake this Son of his was taken and brought up with the Prince. A Man of excellent Parts of Body, and of no less Endowments of Mind; valiant and witty; to which, if we might add vertuous, he had been compleat. Though the Lords (whether they had heard so, or whether they said it to wean the King from him) told the King, that his Father was a Traytor to the King of France, and for the same was executed, and that his Mother was burnt for a Witch; and that this Gaveston was banished out of France for consenting to his Mother's Witchcraft; and that he had now bewitched the King himself. But why should the Lords be so violent against Gaveston? Might not the King place his Affection where he pleased? Might not he make his own Choice of what Companion he liked? No doubt he might, and fit he should; but yet in this Case the Lords had great Cause to do as they did, both in regard of the King, of themselves, and of the Commonwealth. It is true, if the Valour of Gaveston could as well have made the King valiant, as his Riot made him riotous, there might some Good have come of their extraordinary Conjunction: But seeing Virtues are but personal, Vices only are communicative; it now made the King not only more vicious than otherwise he would have been, but vicious where otherwise he would not have been; and therefore great Cause, in regard of the King, to remove Gaveston from his Company, and no less in regard of the Lords themselves: For Gaveston's Advancing was their Debasing; his Greatness with the King, made them but Cyphers; but in regard of the Commonwealth, most Cause of all; for while the King was altogether ruled by Gaveston, and Gaveston himself was altogether irregular, the Commonwealth could have but little Hope of Justice, but was sure to suffer as long as Gaveston was suffered. And this may be sufficient to justify the Lords, that it be not interpreted to be Rebellion, which was indeed but Providence.

Of his Troubles with Scotland.

A ND now we have seen two of the Charges of his Father's Will broken by the King, and punished in him; the two and thirty thousand Pounds appointed for the Holy War, bestowed upon Gaveston, and the King for it punished himself with Want; Gaveston called home from Banishment, and the King for it punished with the Loss of his Subjects Love. It remains to see how well he performed the third Charge of his Father's Will for subduing of Scotland. It was now the sixth Year after the Death of his Father King Edward, and Robert Bruce now gotten to be King of Scotland, had stayed all this while to see how this new King Edward would prove. And when he found, by the Courses he held, that he was like to prove a good easy Enemy, he thereupon took Heart, and began to stir, and in a very short Time had brought almost all Scotland under his Obedience; and finding no Opposition, entred the English Borders, took and burnt Towns: That now King Edward, unless he would sit still, and suffer Bruce to come and pull his Crown from his Head, he could not choofe but do something to stop his Proceedings. Hereupon he prepares an Army, but, like himself, fitter for a Court than for a Camp. Many Men, and great Bravery; but readier to take Spoils, than to make Spoil; and accordingly they speed. For going to raise the Siege at Striveling, defended for King Edward by the valiant Knight Philip Mowbray, the King's Army, consisting of an 100,000, was defeated and overthrown by the Scots Army, consisting of scarce 30,000: So true is that Saying of an antient Soldier, There is more Hope of an Army where the General is a Lion, though the Soldiers be but Sheep, than of an Army where the General is a Sheep, though the Soldiers be Lions. But indeed the Scots, beside Valour, used Policy; for having in their own Army none but Foot, no Horse at all, they had made Trenches in the Ground three Foot deep, covering them with Twigs and Hurdles, where the English Horsemen were to pass; who floundring in those Trenches, were killed no less by their own Fellows, than by the Enemy. In this Battel, called of Bannocks-Bourn, were slain the Lord Marble, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Tiptoft, the Lord William Marshal, Sir Giles, Doctor Argenton, and seven hundred Knights and Esquires, especially Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, who had shewed much Valour that Day, and whom the Scots would willingly have kept for Ransom, if they had known him, but he had forgotten to put on his Coat of Arms, whereby to be known. The Slaughter of common Soldiers was certainly great, though perhaps not so great as Hector Boetius speaks of, who saith they were fifty thousand. There were taken Prisoners Humphry de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, John Seagrave, John Claveringham, William Latimer, and Sir Roger Northbrook, Bearer of the King's Shield; the King himself, with the Bishops, the Earls of Hertford and Pembroke, and Hugh Spencer, saved themselves by Flight: Humphry de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, was afterward released in Exchange for for Bruce's Wife, who had been long kept a Prisoner in England. After this many English fell away to the Scots; and all the North Parts from Carlisle to York, came under their Subjection: And the English grew so faint-hearted, and into such Contempt, that three Scots durst venture upon a hundred English, when a hundred English durst scarce encounter with three Scots. And what can be thought the Cause of this great Disaster to this King, but the want of his Father's Blessing, for not performing the Charge he gave him dying, which is commonly accompanied with the want of a higher Blessing, without which a Vacat is set upon the Labours of Men that makes them all frustrate? But Bruce, not satisfied with his Acquests in England, sends his Brother Edward into Ireland also; who so far prevailed, that many Irish came in unto him, and in the End crowned him King of a great Part of that Island; and so he continued the Space of three Years, till the Primate of Armagh, and the Lord Brinningham, Justiciar of Ireland, gathering Forces together, opposed him, and in a Battel taking him Prisoner, at Dundalk cut off his Head, with the Slaughter of many thousands of the Scots besides: With which the Scots are so incensed, that they invade again the English Borders, foraging as far as York. Whereupon a Parliament is assembled at London, wherein an Aid is granted of armed Men to go against them. London sets forth two hundred, Canterbury forty, Saint Albans ten, and so proportionably for all Cities and Boroughs, whereby a great Army was levied: Which coming to York, through Mutiny, Emulation, and other Impediments, was soon dissolved, and returned back without effecting any thing. Not long after the Town of Berwick was betrayed to the Scots, through the Treason of Peter Spalding the Governor, and other English Men; whom the King of Scots, to make them an Example, caused to be hanged for being Traitors to their Country. King Edward hearing of the surrendring of Berwick, raiseth an Army, and beleaguers it; but the Scots, to divert his Forces, enter upon England by other Ways, and were like to have surprised the Person of the Queen, lying then near York. The Siege of Berwick is notwithstanding eagerly continued, and the King in great Possibility to have regained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaster with his Followers withdrawn himself upon Discontent, hearing the King say he would give the keeping thereof to Hugh Spencer the younger, who was now grown a special Favourite of the King's, and therefore not to be endured by the Earl. In the mean Time the Scots won the Castles of Harbottle, Wark, and Midford, so as they possessed the greater Part of all Northumberland, burning all before them till they came to Rippon, which Town they spoiled; and tarrying there three Days, they received a thousand Marks to save the Town from burning, as they had done the Towns of Northallerton, Borough-Briggs, and others. In their returning back they burnt Knaresborough, and Skipton in Craven, and all other before them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous Number of Cattle, besides Prisoners, Men and Women. The Yorkshire Men thus grievously endamaged, gather together the Number of ten thousand, and at the Town of Mitton, ten Miles from York, encounter the Scots, where they lost three thousand of their Men, and were defeated: Which Battel, because of the many spiritual Men that were in it, was called the White Battel. Whereof when the King heard, he left the Siege of Berwick to follow the Scots; but they returned another Way. The Year following King Edward once again with a great Army entered Scotland; but the Scots having destroyed all afore, the King oppressed with Famine, was forced to return, whom the Scots followed, and in a Place of the Forest of Blackmore set upon him, that he hardly escaped; where were taken John Earl of Britany, and the French King's Embassador, and many others. After this King Edward finding the Scots either too strong, or too wily for him, made a Truce with them for two Years, some say for thirteen. And this was the Success of this unfortunate King in his Wars with Scotland.

Of his Troubles at Home.

BUT his Troubles abroad were not so grievous as those at home; or rather they were those at home that made his Troubles abroad so grievous. For though the Lords having made an End of Gaveston, and cut off his Head, thought they had made an End of their Need to bear Arms, and had cut off the Head of all their Discontents; yet, as if Gaveston had been a Phoenix, as it were out of his Ashes another Phoenix riseth presently up, and puts the Lords to as much Trouble as ever Gaveston did. For now the younger Spencer upon a sudden grows as great a Favourite of the King's as ever Gaveston was, and indeed in all Points just such another, equal to him in Goodliness of Personage, in Favour of the King, and in abusing the Lords. For though they were the Lords themselves that brought him at first to be the King's Chamberlain, the rather (as was thought) because he was one whom the King did not love; yet being once in the Place, he so won upon the King by diligent Service, and by complying with the King's Humour, that he brought the King at last to comply with his Humour, and nothing must be done but as Spencer would have it. It seems it was the King's Nature, that he could not be without a Bosom-friend, one or other to be an alter idem; and to seek to remove such a one from him, was to seek to remove him from himself; as impossible a Thing as to alter Nature. Yet the Lords being more sensible of their own Grievance, to be insulted on by a Favourite, than of the King's Grievance to be affronted by his Subjects, are more intente to work their own Ends than the King's; and therefore to remove Spencer and his Father from the King, which they knew was a Work not to be done but by a strong Hand, they continue their Arms; and confederating together, they send to the King, peremptorily requiring the Confirmation and Execution of the Articles formerly granted; threatening withal, That unless he presently perform the same, they would constrain him to it by Force of Arms; and thereupon assemble strong Forces about Dunstable, where the King then

A.D. 1318 then lay. The great Prelates of the Kingdom, with the Earl of Gloucester, labour to appease them; and with two Cardinals sent lately by the Pope, to reform these Disorders, they repair to Saint Albans, and desire Conference with the Lords, who receive them peaceably: But the Letters which the Pope had written to them, they refuse to receive, saying, they were Men of the Sword, and cared not for reading of Letters; that there were many worthy and learned Men in the Kingdom, whose Counsel they would use, and not Strangers, who knew not the Cause of their Commotion: So the Cardinals with this Answer returned to London. But the Prelates of England so labour the Business, that the Lords were content to yield up to the King such Horses, Treasure, and Jewels, as they had taken of Pierce Gaveston at Newcastle, so as the King would grant their Petitions; and thereupon John Sandal, Treasurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Warle Keeper of the Wardrobe, are sent to Saint Albans to receive those Things at their Hands.

Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains of the great Contempt was had of him by the Barons; their rising in Arms, their taking and murdering Pierce Gaveston, and such other Affronts, whereunto with one Accord they answer, that they had not offended therein, but rather merited his Love and Favour, having taken Arms, not for any Contempt of his Royal Person, but to destroy the Publick Enemy of the Kingdom, which otherwise would never have been done. Which stout Resolution of theirs, the Queen with the Prelates and the Earl of Gloucester seeing, they seek by all means to qualify their Heat; and at length so prevailed with them, that they humble themselves to the King, and crave Pardon for that they had done, which they obtained; and the King receives them into Grace, as his loyal Subjects, grants them their Articles, and particular Pardons by his Charter, for their Indemnity concerning the Death of Gaveston. And for the greater Shew of true Reconcilement, Guy de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, is made of the King's Council, though shortly after he ended his Life, not without Suspicion of Poison; as being a Man much envied by such as possess'd the King. The King kept his Christmas at Clipston, and his Easter at Clarendon; and they seemed to be all good Friends: But this Reconcilement of the King with his Barons, was but as the covering of Fire with Ashes, every little Wind that blew, made it break out into Flames afresh; and the Time being so unsettled as it was, it was impossible but such Winds would continually be blowing. It was such a Wind blew, when the great Earl of Lancaster had his Wife (a Lady who had lived with him always in good Fame) taken out of his House at Canford in Dorsetshire, by one Richard Saint Martin, a deformed lame Dwarf, who challenged her to be his Wife, and had lain with her before the Earl married her. And this Wind was made to blow the stronger, by the Lady's own Confession; for upon Examination, she voluntarily averred, it was all true: And thereupon the ugly Fellow in her Right, claimed the two Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, which he durst not have done, if he had not been backed with great Abettors; A.D. 1318 and it was not without Asperision upon the King himself. It was another such Wind blew, when at the Feast of Pentecost, at Dinner in the open Hall at Westminster, a Woman fantastically disguised, entred on Horseback, and riding about the Table, delivered the King a Letter, wherein was signified the great Neglect he shewed of such as had done him and his Father noble Services, taxing him for advancing Men of unworthy Parts, and such other Complaints: Which Letter read, and the Woman departed, put the King into a great Rage; they who guarded the Door being sharply reprehended for suffering her to enter in such a Manner, answered, It was the Fashion of the King's House in Times of Festivals, to keep out none that came as this Woman did, to make Sport: Search being made for the Woman, she is found, and examined who set her on: She confessed a Knight gave her Money to do it; the Knight is found, and upon Examination, boldly answered, He did it for the King's Honour, and to no other End; and thereupon escaped without farther Trouble. It was such another Wind blew, when a Knight was taken passing by Pomfret, with Letters sealed with the King's Seal directed to the King of Scots, about murdering the Earl of Lancaster; which Messenger is executed, his Head set upon the top of the Castle, and the Letters reserved to witness the intended Plot: Which whether it were feigned or true, the Report thereof reflected upon the King, and made many to take the Earl's Part. It was such another Wind blew, when a fanatick Fellow, one John Powdras, a Tanner's Son of Exeter gave forth, that himself was the true Edward, eldest Son of the late King Edward the First, and by a false Nurse was changed in his Cradle; and that the now King Edward was a Carter's Son, and laid in his Place: But this Wind was soon blown over, when at his Death, being drawn and hanged, he confessed he had a familiar Spirit in his House in the Likeness of a Cat, that assured him he should be King of England; and that he had served the said Spirit three Years before to bring his Purpose about: But most of all, it was such a Wind blew, when a Baron, named William Brewis, having wasted his Estate, offers to sell unto divers Men a Part of his Inheritance called Powis: Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, obtains Leave of the King to buy it, and bargains for it. The two Roger Mortimers, Uncle and Nephew, great Men likewise in those Parts, not understanding, it seems, any thing of the former Bargain, contract also for the same Land with the said Sir William Brewis: Hugh Spencer the Younger, hearing of this Sale, and the Land adjoining to Part of his, obtains a more special Leave of the King, being now his Chamberlain, and buys it out of their Hands: The Earl of Hereford complains hereof to the Earl of Lancaster, who thereupon at Sherbourn enters into a new Confederation with divers Barons there assembled, taking their Oaths intermutually, to live and die together in maintaining the Right of the Kingdom, and to procure the Banishment of the two Spencers, Father and Son, whom they now held to be the great Seducers of the King, and the Oppressors of the State, disposing of all Things in

The King returns Answer, that Hugh Spencer the Father was now beyond the Seas, employed in his Business, and his Son was guarding the Cinque-ports, according to his Office; and that it was against Law or Custom they should be banished without being heard: And withal swore he should never violate the Oath made at his Coronation, by granting Letters of Pardon to such notorious Offenders who contemned his Person, disturbed the Kingdom, and violated the Royal Majesty. Which Answer so exasperated the Lords, that presently they approached to London, and lodged in the Suburbs, till they had Leave of the King to enter into the City, where they peremptorily urge their Demands. To which at length by Mediation of the Queen, and the chief Prelates, the King is brought to condescend; and by his Edict, published in Westminster-Hall, by the Earl of Hereford, the Spencers are banished the Kingdom. Hugh the Father hearing it, keeps beyond the Seas; but the Son secretly hides himself in England, expecting the Turn of a better Season. And indeed shortly after the Archbishop of Canterbury, in a Council holden at London, pronounceth the Banishment of the Spencers to have been erroneous; and thereupon the Edict is revoked, and the Spencers are called Home, and set in as great Authority as they were before. But the Lords having thus obtained their Desire, with the King's Letters of Indemnity, return Home; but yet not with such Security as to give over the Provision for their own Defence. Not long after there fell out an unexpected Accident, that suddenly wrought the Lords Confusion. The Queen making her Progress towards Canterbury, intended to lodge at the Castle of Leeds, belonging to the Lord Badlesmere (who had been long the King's Steward, but now took Part with the Lords) and sending her Marshal to make ready for her and her Train, they who kept the Castle told him plainly, That neither the Queen nor any else should enter there without Letters from their Lord. The Queen her self goes to the Castle, and receives the like Answer; whereupon she is driven to take such Lodging elsewhere as could be provided. Of which Indignity she complains to the King, who took it so to Heart, that presently with a Power of armed Men out of London, he lays Siege to the Castle, takes it, hangs the Keeper Thomas Colepeper, sends the Wife and Children of the Lord Badlesmere to the Tower, and seifeth upon all his Goods and Treasure: And having this Power about him, and warmed with Success and the Instigation of the Queen, suddenly directs his Course to Chichester, where he keeps his Christmas, and there provides for an Army against the Barons: Whereof many (seeing the King's Power encreasing) left their Associates, and yield themselves to his Mercy: Amongst whom were the two Roger Mortimers, Men of great Might and Means; the Lord Hugh Audeley, the Lord Maurice Berkley, and others: Who notwithstanding contrary to their Expectation were sent to divers Prisons. The Earls of Lancaster and Hereford seeing this sudden Change, withdrew themselves and their Company from about Gloucester, towards the North Parts; whom the King follows with an Army, wherein were the Earls of Athol and Angus: And at Burton upon Trent, where they had made a Head, discomfited their Forces, and put them to Flight. In the mean Time the Earl of Lancaster had sent into Lancashire a Knight of his, named Robert Holland (one whom he had brought up of nought) to raise more Forces amongst his Tenants; but he hearing of this Flight of his Lords, goes with his Forces to take the King's Part. Which so dismays the Earl, that he began now to think of suing to the King for Grace: But being in the way, at a Town called Borough-Bridge, was there set upon by Sir Simon Ward, Sheriff of York, and Sir Andrew Harkely, Constable of Carlisle, who utterly defeat his Forces. In which Fight was slain the Earl of Hereford (who fighting valiantly upon a Bridge, was by a Varlet skulking under the Bridge, thrust with a Spear into the Fundament) Sir Roger Benefield, Sir William Sulyard, and others. There was taken the Earl of Lancaster, Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Tucket, Sir William Fitz-Williams, with divers others, and were led to York. This Field was fought the fifteenth Day of March, in the Year 1320. It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniel, Sir Bartholomew de Badlesmere were taken. Three days after the Earl of Lancaster is brought to Pomfret, where the King sitting himself in Judgment with Edmund Earl of Kent, his Brother, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl Warren, Hugh Spencer, lately created Earl of Winchester, and others; Sentence of Death is given against him, to be drawn, hanged, and beheaded as a Traitor. The two first Punishments are pardoned, in regard he was of Royal Blood; and beheaded he was the same Day without the Town of Pomfret, before his own Castle. To speak of the Miracles said to be done by him after his Death, might be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle; and therefore I omit them. By the like Judgment were condemned the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Lisle, the Lord William Tutchet, Thomas Maudit, Henry Bradburn, William Fitz-William, Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Mowbray, Joceline Lord Daniel; all which were executed at York. Shortly after the Lord Henry Teyes is taken, drawn, hanged and quartered at London; William the Lord Aldenharn at Windfor; the Lords Badlesmere and Asburton at Canterbury; at Cardiffe in Wales, Sir William Fleming; at Bristol, Sir Henry Womington, and Sir Henry Mountford Bannerets; at Gloucester, the Lord Clifford, and Sir William Elmingbridge, principal Men in principal Places. The first Blood of Nobility shed since the Conquest. The King grieveth for the Earl of Lancaster's Death.

But not long after, the King in a calmer Humour, began to have Sense of the Earl of Lancaster's Execution, which he discovered upon this Occasion. Some about him making earnest Suit for a Pardon to one of the Earl's Followers, and pressing the King hard to it, he fell into a great Passion, exclaiming against them as unjust and wicked Counsellors, who would urge him to save the Life of a notorious Varlet, and would not speak one Word for his near Kinsman the Earl of Lancaster, who (said he) had he lived, might have been useful to me, and the whole Kingdom; but this Fellow, the longer he lives the more Mischief he will do: And therefore by the Soul of God he should die the Death he had deserved. Sir Andrew Harkley, who was the Man that took the Earl of Lancaster Prisoner, being advanced for his Service to the Earldom of Carlisle, enjoyed his Honour but a while; for the next Year after, either thrust out in Discontent by the Spencers envying his high Preferment, or combining with the Scots, upon hope of a great Match (as he was accused) he is degraded of all his Honours, drawn, hanged, and quartered at London for Treason.

K. Edward summoned into France.

But now the King of France summons King Edward to come and do his Homage for Gascoin; and he not coming, all his Territories in France are adjudged to be forfeited, and many Places of Importance are seized on by the French. Hereupon a Parliament is called; and it is by common Consent of all agreed, that the King should not go in Person himself, in regard of the Distraction of the Times, but should send some special Men to excuse his Appearance: Whereupon Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Brother, is sent, but to little Effect. Then it is thought fit the Queen should go, and indeed the Queen went; but what was the Cause of her going, there is amongst Writers great Variance. Some say she was sent by the King to accommodate this Business; which she negotiated so well, as that all Quarrels were ended, upon Condition the King should give to his Son Edward the Duchy of Aquitain, with the Earldom of Ponthieu, and send him over to do his Homage for them. Which after many Consultations, the King is wrought to yield unto; and the Prince is sent, with the Bishop of Exeter and others, to the Court of France accordingly: But others say, she went out of Discontent, to complain to her Brother the King of France for Wrongs offered her by the Spencers, who had so alienated the King's Mind from her, that he would scarce come where she was, nor allow her fit Maintenance for her Calling. But whatsoever was the Cause of her going, there appeared no Cause of her staying, but that she had gotten into her Company, Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, a gallant young Gentleman, whom she specially favoured, lately escaped out of the Tower of London, by giving his Keepers (as was said) a sleeping Drink. And withal, the Bishop of Exeter perceiving some Plots to be in Hand, and their close Consultations made without him, withdraws himself secretly, and discovers to the King what he observed in their Courses. Whereupon the King A.D. 1325 sends presently for the Queen and Prince, and solicits the King of France to hasten their Return; which when he saw was neglected and delayed, he caused them openly to be proclaimed Enemies to the Kingdom, banished them and all their Adherents out of the Land; and withal caused all the Ports to be strongly kept, and sends three Admirals to attend in several Coasts to hinder their Landing. It was not without Suspicion, that as the King for love of the Spencers, had his Mind alienated from loving the Queen; so the Queen for love of Mortimer had her Mind alienated from loving the King: And therefore having him with her, cared not how long she stayed. However it was, when the Queen heard of the King's Proclamation, she knew there was no returning for her into England without some good Assistance. Whereupon soliciting her Brother the King of France, he aided her with Men and Money, say some; but others, that he refusing to aid her, as being wrought under Hand by the Spencers against her, she left the French Court, and went into Heynault, to the Earl of that Country, who upon a Contract between her Son Prince Edward and Philippa the Earl's Daughter, aided her with a competent Army under the Conduct of his Brother John; and with them and her beloved Mortimer, she took Shipping and landed at Orwell, a Port near unto Harwich in Suffolk; where presently came to her the Earl-Marshal, Henry Earl of Leicester, and Henry Earl of Lancaster with the wry Neck, called Torcoll, with many other Lords and Bishops. The King at this Time being at London, and hearing of the Queen's Landing with such Forces, and chiefly how all the Realm ran flocking to her, was suddenly struck into a great Amazement; and tho' he had his great Counsellors the Spencers about him, yet now he found what little good their Counsel could do him: And indeed in this Case what should he, or what could he do? To stay in London was apparent Danger, for he plainly saw the Londoners to be more enclining to take the Queen's Part than his; and to go from London to any other Place was as unsafe, all Places being possessed either with certain Enemies, or uncertain Friends: At last the Isle of Lundy is thought of, a Place plentiful of Provision, abounding with Conies, Fish and Fowl, and the Island of hard Access, as having but one Place in it where it could be entered, and that so narrow that a few might easily keep out many. Upon this Place he resolves, and taking with him the Earl of Gloucester, the Spencers and Robert Baldock, with some few others, he takes Shipping, but by contrary Winds is driven back, and fain, through Tempests, to land in Wales; and there in the Abby of Nethe in Glamorganshire kept himself close. In the mean Time the Queen was come to Oxford, when Adam Bishop of Hereford took for his Text, Caput meum doleo; and thereupon inferred, that the Kingdom being now deadly sick of its Head, it was fit to remove that Head, and put a sounder in the Place. At this Time also, the Londoners, to shew their Love to the Queen, seized upon Walter Stapleton, the good Bishop of Exeter, and Lord Treasurer of England, left Governor there by the King; and with great Despight but is driven into Wales.

The Londoners Favour to the Queen.

A.D. 1326 Despight beheaded him, as also divers others, only because they favoured the King. In the mean Time the Queen went from Oxford to Gloucester, and from thence to Bristol, where Hugh Spencer the Father was, a Man of fourscore and ten Years old; who is there taken, and without Examination of Judgment, in most cruel Manner executed, having his Heart pulled out of his Body being yet alive, and his Body left hanging upon the Gallows. After this the Queen stayed at Hereford the Space of a Month, and then dividing her Army, she sends one Part of it under the Conduct of Henry Earl of Lancaster, and Rice ap Powel, a Clerk, to find out the King: And this Rice being a Welshman, and knowing the Country well, brought the Earl to the Monastery of Nethe, where the King was, whom they there take, together with Spencer the Son, Robert Baldock, and Simon of Reading. The King is by the Bishop of Hereford committed to the Custody of the Earl of Leicester; where all that Winter he was used no worse than was fit for a captive King: But Edmund Earl of Arundel, John Daniel, and Thomas Micheldene, at the Instance of Mortimer, are all three beheaded. Presently after is Hugh Spencer the Younger, who was now Earl of Gloucester, drawn, hanged, and quartered; his Head sent up to be set upon London-Bridge, and his four Quarters bestowed in several Cities. The like is done with Simon of Reading; but Robert Baldock is committed to Newgate, against whom, when no just Cause of Death could be found, there was used so much Cruelty in his Imprisonment, that he shortly after died.

Presently after Christmas a Parliament is called, wherein it was agreed to depose the King, and set up his Son; which he hearing, refused it, unless his Father would freely resign. Whereupon are appointed three Bishops, two Earls, two Abbots, four Barons, and of every City a Burgess to go to the King (in Custody then at Kenelworth) the Bishops were John of Stratford Bishop of Winchester, Adam Tarleton Bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bishop of Lincoln. But the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, getting to the King before the rest came, persuade the King to resign his Crown to his eldest Son; craftily promising him he should have as good Maintenance afterward, as ever he had when he was King: And contrarily threatening him, that if he did not, the People would exclude both him and his Son too, and make a King of another Race. By these Promises and Threatnings, the meek King is drawn to yield to the Bishop's Motion: But when afterward the Bishop of Hereford and the other Commissioners came, and were sat in a Place appointed to take his Resignation, the King coming forth amongst them in Mourning Robes, upon a sudden fell down in a Swoon, in whom the Earl of Leicester, and the Bishop of Winchester, had much ado to recover Life: But then the Bishop of Hereford rising up, delivered the Cause of their Coming, as the other Bishops before had done. To which the King answered, That as he much grieved his People should be so hardened against him, as utterly to reject him, so it was some Comfort to him, that they would yet receive his Son to be their Sovereign. After this, Thomas Blunt Knight,

Steward of the King's House, brake the Staff of his Office; and William Trussel, Speaker of the Parliament, in the Name of the whole Kingdom, pronounced a Form of renouncing all Allegiance to Edward of Carnarvon. Here Caxton writes, that from the Time of this King's Deposing, which was in December, to the Time of his Son's Crowning, which was not till Candlemas following, all Pleas of the King's Bench were stayed, and all Prisoners arrested by Sheriffs, commanded to be set at Liberty, which seems to have little Probability, seeing his Son Edward presently upon his Deposing was received for King. But howsoever, so great a Dowry was then assigned to Queen Isabel, that scarce a third Part of the Revenues of the Crown is left for the new King and his Wife. And to the late King is allowed a hundred Marks a Month for his Maintenance, with which he lived with his Cousin Earl of Leicester, in good Plenty and Contentment for a Time; only this grieved him most of all (he said) that the Queen his Wife would never be gotten to come to see him: For he swore most devoutly, that from the Time he first saw her Face, he could never like of any other Woman. By which it may appear, that neither Gaveston, nor the Spencers had so debauched him, as to make him false to his Bed, or to be disloyal to his Queen. But the Queen being hardened against him, and conceiving he had too great Liberty under the Earl of Leicester, by Advice of her pestilent Counsellor, Adam Tarleton Bishop of Hereford, appoints Thomas Gurney, and John Matrevers Knights, to take him from the Earl into their own Custody, and to carry him whither they thought good. Who thereupon take him from Kenelworth, and carry him first to Corf Castle, and from thence to Bristol; where they shut him in the Castle: Till upon knowledge of a Plot laid to get him out, and send him beyond Sea, they took him in the Night and carried him to Berkley Castle, where by the Way they abused him most inhumanely, as Sir Thomas de la More a Knight of Gloucestershire in his Life relateth. For to the End he should not be known, they shaved his Head and Beard, and that in most beastly Manner; for they took him from his Horse, and set him upon a Hillock, and then taking Puddle Water out of a Ditch there by, they went to wash him, his Barber telling him that cold Water must serve for this Time: Whereat the miserable King looking sternly upon him, said, That whether they would or no, he would have warm Water to wash him; and therewithal to make good his Word, he presently shed forth a Shower of Tears. Never was King turned out of a Kingdom in such a Manner. Many Kingdoms have been lost by the Chance of War, but this Kingdom was lost before any Dice were cast; no Blow struck, no Battel fought; done forcibly, and yet without Force; violently, and yet with Consent; both Parties agreed, yet neither pleased; for the King was not pleased to leave his Kingdom, and the Queen was not pleased to leave him his Life. It was not safe to leave him a Part, by which he might afterward recover the whole: And therefore this was the Mark now aimed at, haven taken away his Kingdom openly, how they might take away his Life secretly; be the

Of his Taxations.

BY this King it appears there is something else besides the Grievances of Taxations, that alienates the Minds of English Subjects from their King; for never were fewer Taxations than in this King's Time, yet never were the Subjects Minds more alienated from their King, than they were from him. Before his Coronation in a Parliament holden at Westminster, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Clergy, and a twentieth of the Temporalty. In his fifth Year, in a Parliament at London, was granted him a twentieth of the Temporalty. In his fifteenth Year was granted the sixth Penny of Temporal Mens Goods, through England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his Wars with Scotland. And more than these we read not of; but then at the Defeat of the Earl of Lancaster, there were Confiscations that supplied the Place of Taxations, by which (as one saith) he became the richest King that had been since the Conquest.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE ordained that the Money of his Father, though counted base by the People, should be currant. In the eighth Year of his Reign, by reason of a Dearth which raised the Price of all Victuals, it was ordained by Parliament, that an Ox fatted with Grass should be sold for fifteen Shillings; fatted with Corn, for twenty; the best Cow for twelve Shillings; a fat Hog of two Years old, three Shillings four Pence; a fat Sheep shorn fourteen Pence; with the Fleece, twenty Pence; a fat Goose for two Pence Half-penny; a fat Capon two Pence; a fat Hen a Penny; four Pidgeons a Penny: Whofoever sold for more, should forfeit their Ware to the King. But after these Rates imposed, all kind of Victuals grew so scarce, that Provision could hardly be made for the King's House: Whereupon shortly after, the Order was revoked, and Market-folks permitted to make the best of their Wares. In this King's Time, an Ordinance was made against Knights Templars, accused of Heresy and other Crimes; and they were all apprehended, and committed to divers Prisons. The like was done by all the Kings of Christendom, at one Instant being condemned in a general Council at Vienna. In the fourteenth Year of his Reign, on the 15th of October, the Clerks of the Exchequer went towards York with the Book called Doomsday-Book, and other Records, and Provisions, that laded one and twenty Carts; but in half a Year they were brought back again.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the 17th Year of his Reign the Bishop of Hereford was arrested, accused of High Treason, for aiding the King's Enemies in their late Rebellion; but he refused to answer (being a consecrated Bishop) without Leave of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose Suffragan he was (and who he said was his direct Judge, A.D. 1326 next the Pope) or without the Consent of his fellow Bishops, who then all arose, and humbly craved the King's Clemency in his Behalf: But finding the King implacable, they took him away from the Bar, and delivered him to the Custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Shortly after he was again taken and convented as before; which the Clergy understanding, the Archbishops, Canterbury, York, and Dublin, with ten other Bishops, all with their Crosses erected, went to the Place of Judgment, and again took him away with them; charging all Men, upon Pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent Hands upon him. With which audacious Act, the King was so much displeased, that he presently commanded Enquiry to be made ex Officio Judicis, concerning those Objections against the Bishop: Wherein he was found guilty, though absent, and had all his Goods and Possessions seized into the King's Hands. In this King's Time the Crouched-Friers came first into England. In his Time Pope John the two and twentieth, first instituted the Feast of Corpus Christi, begun before by Urban the Fourth.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his Time.

THIS King founded Oriel-College, and St. Mary-Hall in Oxford. He builded a Church of Friers at his Mannor of Langley, where the Soul of Gaveston should be prayed for. In this King's twentieth Year, Richard Rothing, Sheriff of London, builded the Parish Church of Garlick-Hithe in London; Ralph Baldock, Bishop of London, gave two thousand Marks to the Building of the new Work of the Chappel on the South-side of St. Paul's Church, and left much more by his Testament.

Casualties.

IN the eighth Year of this King's Reign, was so great a Dearth, that Horses and Dogs were eaten, and Thieves in Prison plucked in Pieces those that were newly brought in amongst them, and eat them half alive; which continuing three Years, brought in the End such a Pestilence, that the Living scarce sufficed to bury the Dead. In the fourth Year of his Reign, the Church of Middleton in Dorsetshire, with all the Monuments, was consumed with Lightning, the Monks being at Matins. In this King's Time, digging the Foundation of a Work about St. Paul's, were found more than a hundred Heads of Oxen and Kine, which confirmed the Opinion, that of old Time it had been the Temple of Diana, and that there was the Sacrifice of Beasts.

Of his Wife and Children.

A.D. 1326 Quire in London. By her he had Issue two Sons and two Daughters: His eldest Son named Edward of Windsor, because born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second Son named John of Eltham, because born there, was at twelve Years old created Earl of Cornwal: He died in Scotland in the Flower of his Youth, unmarried. His eldest Daughter Joan, being a Child, was married in the fourth Year of King Edward her Brother, to David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert Bruce, at seven Years old; who coming afterward into England to visit her Brother, died here, and was buried at the Gray-friers in London. His second Daughter Eleanor, was married to Reginald the Second, Earl of Gelder, with a Portion of fifteen thousand Pounds; and had Issue by him two Sons, who were Earls successively.

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was fair of Body, and of great Strength, but given much to drink, which made him oftentimes bewray his own Secrets. For his other Conditions, his greatest Fault was, he loved but one; for if his Love had been divided, it could not have been so violent. He was extream in nothing but in loving; and though Love moderated be the best of Affections, yet the Extremity of it is the worst of Passions. He was rather unfortunate than unhappy: Seeing Unfortunateness is in the Event, Unhappiness in the Cause: And if his Fortune had been to love good Men, his own Goodness would have made him happy. Two Virtues were eminent in him above all his Predecessors, Continnence and Abstinence: So continent, that he left no base Issue behind him; so abstinent, that he took no base Courses for raising of Money. They who despised him being alive, so much honoured him being dead, that they could have found in their Hearts to make him a Saint.

Of his Death and Burial.

Ways devised to take away his Life.

MANY Ways were attempted to take away his Life. First, they vexed him in his Diet, allowing him nothing he could well endure to eat; but this succeeded not. Then they lodged him in a Chamber over Carrion and dead Carcasses, enough to have poisoned him; and indeed he told a Workman at his Window, He never endured so great a Misery in all his Life: But neither did this succeed. Then they attempted it by Poisons; but whether by the Strength of his Constitution, or by the Divine Providence, neither did this succeed. At last the pestilent Achitophel, the Bishop of Hereford, devised a Letter to his Keepers, blaming them for giving him too much Liberty, and for not doing the Service which was expected from them: And in the End of his Letter wrote this Line, Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est: Craftily contriving it in this doubtful Sense, that both the Keepers might find sufficient Warrant, and himself might find sufficient Ex- A.D. 1326 cuse. The Keepers, guessing at his Meaning, took it in the worst Sense, and accordingly put it in Execution. They took him in his Bed, and casting heavy Bolsters upon him, and pressing them hard down, stifled him; and not content with that, they heated an Iron red hot, and through a Pipe thrust it up into his Fundament, that no Marks of Violence might be seen: But though none were seen, yet some were heard; for when the Fact was doing, he was heard to roar and cry all the Castle over. Gourney and Matrevers, his Murtherers, looking for Reward, had the Reward of Murtherers: For the Queen and Bishop Tarleton disavowing the Command, threatned to question them for the King's Death; whereupon they fled beyond Sea: And Gourney after three Years being taken in France, and sent into England, was in the Way upon the Sea, beheaded. Matrevers flying into Germany, had the Grace to repent, but lived ever after miserably. Thus died this King in the Year 1327, more than half a Year after his Deposing, when he had reigned almost 19 Years, lived 43. His Body was carried to Gloucester, and there, without any Funeral Pomp, buried in the Monastery of St. Peter, by the Benedictine Monks.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

IN this King's Time, of Martial-men were many, whose Acts have been spoken of in the late King's Life. Of learned Men also many, as John Duns the great Logician, called Doctor John Duns, Subtilis, born in Northumberland, at Emildune, called Doctor Subtilis, when he lived, a Village three Miles distant from Alnwick, though both the Scots and the Irish challenge him for theirs; Robert Walsingham a Carmelite-frier, who wrote divers Treatises; Robert Baſton born in Nottinghamshire, a Carmelite-frier of Scarborough, whom King Edward took with him into Scotland, to write some Remembrances of his Victories: But being taken by the Scots, was constrained by Robert Bruce to write Remembrances of his Overthrows; William Rishanger, a Monk of St. Albans, and Historiographer; Ralph Baldock, Bishop of London, who wrote a History intituled, Historia Anglica; John Walsingham a Carmelite-frier, who wrote divers Treatises; Nicholas de Lira, a Jew by Birth, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity; William Ockham, a Frier Minor, who wrote divers Treatises, and namely against John Duns, and also against Pope John the 23d, in favour of the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria; Thomas Halſewood, a Canon of Leeds in Kent, who wrote a Chronicle called Chronicum Compendiarium; Robert Perſcrutator, born in Yorkshire, a Black-frier and a Philosopher, or rather a Magician; and last, though not least worthy to be remembred, John Mandevile, the great Traveller, a Doctor of Physick, lived, and a Knight.

THE LIFE and REIGN of King EDWARD III.

A.D. 1327

K. Edward the Third crowned.
A general Pardon at the King's Coronation, when first begun.

His first Action was an Expedition against the Scots, but without Success, and why.

EDWARD of Windsor, eldest Son of King Edward the Second, by the Order of Parliament, upon his Father's Resignation, was proclaimed King of England on the five and twentieth Day of January, in the Year 1327. And because he had not yet received the Order of Knighthood, he was by Henry Earl of Lancaster girt solemnly with the Sword; and on the first Day of February following, was crowned at Westminster by Walter Reginald, Archbishop of Canterbury: And thereupon a general Pardon is proclaimed, which hath since been used as a Custom with all succeeding Kings; that at their first Coming to the Crown, a general Pardon is always granted. And because the King was under Age, scarce fifteen Years old (though Froissard saith he was then eighteen) there were twelve appointed Governours of him and the Kingdom; namely, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Winchester, Hereford, and Worcester; Thomas of Brotherton, Earl Marshal, Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncles; John Earl Warren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Pierce, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Rosse: But though these were appointed and bore the Name, yet the Queen and Roger Mortimer took all the Authority to themselves. The first Action that was undertaken, was an Expedition against the Scots. For Robert Bruce, though now old and sickly, and (as was said) leprous, yet considering the Youth of the new King, and the Distractions of the Kingdom, thought it now a fit Time to do some Good upon England; and entering the English Borders with an Army, sent Defiance to King Edward. Whereupon an Army is raised, and the Heynaulters (whom the Queen had brought over) are joined with the English: But a Variance falling out between the two Nations, made the Action not successful. For the King's Army encountering the Scots at Stanhope Park in Weredal, in the Bishoprick of Durham, though three times as many as the Scots, as being thirty thousand; yet through this Variance, but more through Treason of some great Men, suffered them all to escape their Hands, and the Scots returned home in Safety, the English with Dishonour: And after this, the English seeing the Heynaulters could do them no Good, sent them away to their own Country. In King Edward's second Year, his Marriage with Philippa of Heynault is solemnized (a Dispensation being first gotten, because of their Nearness in Blood) and a Parliament is holden at Northampton, where the King made three Earls; John of Eltham, his Brother, Earl of Cornwall; Roger Mortimer, Earl of March; and James Butler of Ireland, Earl of Ormond. And in this Parliament a dishonourable Peace is concluded with the Scots, and confirmed by a Match between David Bruce, Prince of Scotland, being but seven Years old, and Jane, Sister to King Edward, not so old. At which Time, by the secret Working of Queen Isabel, Roger Mortimer, and Sir James Douglass, the King surrenders by his Charter all his Title of Sovereignty to the Kingdom of Scotland, restores divers Deeds and Instruments of their former Homages and Fealties, with the famous Evidence called Ragmans-Roll, and many antient Jewels and Monuments, amongst which was the Black Cross of Scotland; and besides, any English-man is prohibited to hold Lands in Scotland, unless he were a Dweller there. In Consideration whereof K. Bruce was to pay 30,000 Marks, and to renounce his Claim to the Counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, and any other Place possessed by him in England. This was no good Beginning, and yet worse followed after. For another Parliament being holden at Winchester, 1329. Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle, is there accused, and condemned upon his Confession, for intending to restore his Brother, the late King Edward. An Intention only without any Fact, yet condemned he was, and brought to the Scaffold: But generally so beloved of the People, that he stood on the Scaffold from one o'Clock till five, before any Executioner could be found that would do the Office; till at last a filly Wretch of the Marshalsea was gotten to cut off his Head. But the Authors of his Death escaped not long themselves; for in the third Year of the King's Reign, another Parliament is holden at Nottingham, wherein the Queen hath all her great Jointure taken from her, and is put to her Pension of a thousand Pounds a Year, and her self confined to a Castle, where she remained the rest of her Days, no fewer than thirty Years. A Time long enough to find that her being the Daughter of a King, the Sister of a King, the Wife of a King, and the Mother

A.D. 1330 not worth the Liberty of a mean Estate. And as for Mortimer (lying then in the Castle of Nottingham, and lately created Earl of the Marches in Wales) he was seized on in this Manner: The King taking with him William Montacute, Robert Holland and others, goes secretly one Night by Torch-light, thro' a privy Way under Ground, till they come to the Queen's Chamber; where, leaving the King without, they entred and found the Queen with Mortimer, ready to go to Bed: Then laying Hands on him, they led him forth, after whom the Queen followed, crying, Bel fits ayes pitie du gentil Mortimer; Good Son, good Son, take Pity upon the gentle Mortimer, suspecting that her Son had been amongst them. This Course was taken to apprehend him for avoiding of Tumult, having no fewer than nine Score Knights and Gentlemen, besides other meaner Servants continually about him. But thus seized on, he is committed presently to the Tower, accused of divers great Crimes, whereof these were chief: That he had procured the late King's Death; That he had been the Author of the Scots safe escaping at Stanhope Park, corrupted with the Gift of thirty thousand Pounds; That he had procured the late Marriage and Peace with Scotland, so dishonourable to the King and Kingdom; That he had been too familiar with the Queen, by whom she was thought to be with Child. Of which Articles he was found guilty, and condemned, and thereupon is drawn and hanged upon the common Gallows, at the Elms, now called Tyburn; where his Body remained two Days, as an opprobrious Spectacle for all Beholders.

Seizeth upon Mortimer, and in what Manner.

Who is hanged at Tyburn.

K. Edward claims the Crown of France, but Philip of Valois is preferred, and why.

K. Edward doth Homage to the King of France for his Duchy of Guyenne, and the Manner of doing it.

After these Busineses in England, there comes a new Business upon him from the King of France; for about this Time Philip le Bel, King of France, the Queen's Brother, dying without Issue, the Right of Succession to the Crown is devolved upon the Heir to Charles, a former King, wherein are Competitors Philip Duke de Valois, and Edward King of England. Edward is the nearer in Blood, but draws his Pedigree by a Female; Philip the farther off, but descending by all Males: And because the Law Salique excluding Females, was conceived as well to exclude all Descendants by Females, therefore is Philip's Title preferred before King Edward's, and Philip is received and crowned King of France: To which Preferment of his, Robert de Artois, a Peer of great Power, gave no small Furtherance. And now as soon as Philip was invested in the Crown, he summons Edward to come and do his Homage for the Duchy of Guyenne, and his other Lands in France, held of that Crown, according to the Custom; which, though it were some Prejudice to King Edward's Claim afterward, yet in regard his Kingdom of England was scarce well settled, and himself was young, he was contented to do it: And thereupon the sixth of June, in the Year 1329, K. Edward in a Crimson Velvet Gown, embroidered with Leopards, with his Crown on his Head, his Sword by his Side, and golden Spurs on his Heels, presents himself in the Body of the Cathedral Church of Amyens before King Philip, sitting in his Chair of State, in a Velvet Gown of a violet Colour, embroidered with Flowers de Lis of Gold, his Crown on his Head, A.D. 1330 and his Scepter in his Hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him. The Viscount Melun, Chamberlain of France, first commands King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and to kneel down, which he did on a crimson Velvet Cushion before King Philip; and then the Viscount putting both his Hands together between the Hands of the King of France, pronounced the Words of the Homage, which were these: You become Liege-man to my Master here present, as Duke of Aquitain, and Peer of France; and you promise to bear Faith and Loyalty to him: Say, Yea. And King Edward said Yea, and kissed the King of France on the Mouth, as Lord of the Fee. The like Homage also he did for the Earldom of Ponthieu. But this Act of Submission left a Rancor in King Edward's Heart, which afterwards brake so out, that it had been good for France it had never been exacted.

This done, King Edward returns home, and there finds a new Business with Scotland upon this Occasion. Edward Baliol, Son to John Baliol, (sometime King of Scotland) two and thirty Years after his Father's Deposition, began now to shew himself, attempting the Recovery of that Crown; and coming out of France, where he had all that while remained, and getting Aid under-hand in England, with them he suddenly assails those who had the Government of Scotland during the Non-age of the young King David (being at that Time with the King of France) and in a Battel overcame them, with the Slaughter of many Noblemen, and Thousands of the common People; and thereupon was immediately crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But notwithstanding this great Defeat, K. Baliol was forced to retire himself into England, to get more Aid of K. Edward; who now shews himself in the Action, joins with Baliol against his Brother-in-Law, K. David; goes in Person with a strong Army to recover Berwick, which, after three Months Siege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, is taken, and the Army of the Scots, which came to the Rescue thereof, at Hallidown-Hill, utterly defeated: Where were slain seven Earls, ninety Knights and Bannerets, four hundred Esquires, and about two and thirty thousand common Soldiers, as our Writers report: As theirs, but fourteen thousand. And with this Effusion of Blood is Baliol returned to his miserable Kingdom; and to hold good Correspondence with the King of England hereafter, doth him Homage for his Realm of Scotland, and the Islands adjacent. But though he had a Kingdom, yet he had not Quietness; for many of the Scots, aided by the French, made War upon him divers Years after; during all which Time, King David, with his Wife, remained in France. If any Man marvel why King Edward would aid Baliol against K. David, who had married his Sister, he may consider that Alliances, how near soever, weigh but light in the Scales of State.

About this Time, the Isle of Man is conquered by William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, for which Service King Edward gave him the Title of King of Man.

Edward Baliol is crowned King of Scotland. K. Edward aids Baliol against his Brother-in-Law, King David. 1333. The Scots defeated at Hallidown-Hill.

William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, hath the Title given him to be King of Man.

A.D. 1330

K. Edward is persuaded by Robert d' Artois to make War upon France.

AND now Robert of Artois banished out of France, comes into England, whom King Edward makes Earl of Richmond, and of his Council. This Robert persuades King Edward to make War upon France, to which Crown (he said) he had more Right than he that held it. With whose Persuasions, King Edward is at last resolved to undertake the Enterprize; and to furnish himself with noble Chieftains, he at one Time in a Parliament at Westminster, the eighth Year of his Reign, creates six Earls: Henry of Lancaster he made Earl of Derby, William Montacute he made Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Audeley Earl of Gloucester, William Clinton Earl of Huntington, and Robert Clifford, or Ufford, Earl of Suffolk: Also twenty Knights, of whom Thomas de la Moore, who writ the Life of the King's Father, was one. Withal, he sends the Bishop of Lincoln to procure Leagues of Amity with divers Princes abroad: Where it is scarce worth remembring what Froissard mentions here; That certain young Gentlemen covered one of their Eyes with a Piece of Silk, and vowed to see but with one Eye, till it might be seen what great Deeds of Arms they performed; but for all this Vow of theirs, we hear nothing of their Exploits. And as the King of England laboured to procure himself Friends, so likewise the King of France got to take his Part the Bishop of Liege, with the Dukes and Earls of Gelders, Juliers, Cleve, Heynault, and Brabant; and with the Archbishop of Colen, and Valeran, his Brother, John, King of Bohemia, Earl of Luxemburg, Henry Count Palatine, Aubert, Bishop of Mentz, Otto Duke of Austria, Ame Earl of Geneva, with many other Princes and Captains out of Germany, Spain, and other Countries. King Edward thus resolved in himself, and furnished with Friends abroad, goes over into Flanders, with his Queen and Children, makes his Residence at Antwerp; where, by Persuasion of the Flemings, he takes upon him the Stile, Title, and Arms of the King of France: For by this they accounted themselves disobliged of the Bond of twenty hundred thousand Crowns which they had entred into, never to bear Arms against the King of France: And hereupon the League was established between them and King Edward. And from this Time forward the Kings of England quartered the Arms of France with those of England, and took upon them the Name of Kings of France. And now King Edward, for a Beginning to put his Claim in Execution, sets upon Cambray, and enters France by the Way of Vermandois and Thierach. On the other Side King Philip seisseth on the Dutchy of Guyenne, and sends thither the Count d'Eu, Constable of France, with the Earls of Foix and Armagnac. At last both Armies came so near together, that a Fight was appointed the Friday after: But, upon better Consideration, the English thought it no Discretion to give Battel to an Army so much greater than their own, if they could avoid it: And the French thought it as little Discretion for them to hazard the Person of the Prince within his own Kingdom, and perhaps were not a little moved with the Warning given them by Robert King of A.D. 1330 Sicily, a great Astronomer, That he foresaw by the Stars, some great Misfortune to threaten the French, if they should that Day fight with the English, King Edward being present. And thus both Armies having their several Reasons to decline the Battel, they parted without doing any thing; only an Accident happened scarce worth remembring, yet must be remembred. A Hare starting out before the Head of the French Army, caused a great Shout to be made, whereupon, they who saw not the Hare, but only heard the Shout, supposing it to be the On-set of the Battel, disposed themselves to fight; and fourteen Gentlemen, for Encouragement Sake, as the Custom is, were knighted; called afterward in Merriment, Knights of the Hare.

Knights of the Hare,
why so called.

But now K. Edward must a little look home; and therefore leaving the Queen in Brabant, he passeth himself into England about Candlemas, having been in Brabant about a Year; and landing at the Tower about Midnight, and finding it unguarded, was so much displeased, that he presently sends for the Mayor of London, commanded him to bring before him the Chancellor and Treasurer, with Sir John Saint Paul, Michael Wath, Philip Thorpe, Henry Stratford, Clergy-men (who it seems were Officers for his Receipts) and John Stonore, Justice of the Bench: All which, except the Chancellor, were apprehended and committed to Prison, as were afterward in like Manner divers Officers of Justice, and Accomptants, upon Enquiry of their unjust Proceedings. During the King's Abode in England, William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, and Robert Ufford, Earl of Suffolk, left in Flanders to oppose the French, having performed divers great Exploits, were at last in an Encounter about Lisle so overlaid by Multitude, as they were both taken and sent Prisoners to Paris. Besides, about this Time two Accidents happened that were thought would be great Rubs in King Edward's Proceedings; one, that his Wife's Father, William Earl of Heynault, dying, and leaving his Son to succeed, his Son left his Brother, King Edward, and fell to take Part with the King of France; the other, that the Duke of Normandy thinking himself as strong as ever William Duke of Normandy was that conquered England, he saw no Reason but he might conquer it as well as that William; and thereupon makes Preparation by Sea and Land to attempt the Enterprize: But these were but Vapours that never came to be Winds, at least brought no Storms. For John Earl of Heynault had quickly enough of the King of France, and was soon after reconciled to his Brother King Edward; and the Duke of Normandy went no further than Preparations; for indeed King Edward prosecuted his Courses against France with such Heat, that all the neighbouring Princes seeing a Fire kindled so near their own Borders, were glad to look to themselves at home. But now to impede the King of England's Return into France, King Philip had provided a mighty Navy in the Haven of Sluce, consisting of two hundred Sail of Ships (besides many Gallies) and two thousand armed Men in the Port ready to encounter him upon his Landing; whereof King Edward being advertised, prepares the like Number of Ships, and sets out to

Sea

A.D. 1330 Sea upon Midsummer Eve, is met the Morrow after with a Navy likewise from the North Parts, conducted by Sir Robert Morley, and encounters his Enemy who lay to intercept him, with such Force and Courage, and such Advantage of Wind and Sun, that he utterly defeated their whole Navy, took and sunk all their Ships, slew thirty thousand Men, and landed with as great Glory as such a Victory (the greatest that ever before was gotten by the English at Sea) could yield, though King Edward himself was there wounded with an Arrow in the Thigh. Most of the French, rather than to endure the Arrows of the English, or be taken, desperately leaped into the Sea; whereupon the French King's Jester, set on to give Notice to him of his Overthrow (which being so ill News none else would willingly impart unto him) said, and oftentimes repeated it in the King's Hearing; Cowardly English-men, Dastardly English-men, Faint-hearted English-men! The King at length asked him why? For that (said he) they durst not leap out of their Ships into the Sea as our brave French-men did. By which Speech the King apprehended a Notion of his Overthrow, which the French attributed to Nicholas Butchet, one of their chief Commanders, who had armed his Ships with Men of base Condition (content with small Pay) and refused Gentlemen and sufficient Soldiers, in regard they required greater Wages. And indeed it often happens, that the Avarice of Commanders is the Occasion of great Defeats.

K. Edward takes and sinks two hundred Sail of French Ships.

How the French King's Jester gave Notice of his Overthrow to the King.

K. Edward's Army of five and fifty thousand defeated. K. Edward sends a Challenge to the K. of France, and the K. of France's Answer.

By this Victory King Edward gained a free Entrance into Flanders, and presently went and besieged Tournay with an Army of five and fifty thousand; but was so valiantly encountred by the Duke of Burgundy, and the Earl of Armagnac, that they routed his Army, and slew four thousand upon the Place: Which so enraged King Edward, that two Days after he sent a Challenge to King Philip to meet him in a single Combat, or with an hundred against as many, before the Walls of Tournay. King Philip answers, that his Challenge being made to Philip de Valois, without mention of King, he took it not to be to him, who was truly King of France; but he wished him to remember the Homage he had done him at Amiens, and the Wrong he did to the Christian World, by his troublesome Courses, to hinder him from his Voyage intended to the Holy Land. Besides this Answer in Writing, he sends to him by Word of Mouth, that by his Challenge, he hazarded nothing of his own, but exposed only the Dominion of another, which was against all Reason: But if he would set his Kingdom of England, though much meaner, against his of France, he would then accept the Challenge, and meet him in the Field in single Combat. But this King Edward would not hearken to, for as he was valiant to make the Challenge, so he was circumspect to look to the Conditions. But hereupon he continues his Siege of Tournay; to the Relief whereof King Philip sends all the Forces he could possibly make by himself or his Friends: And after the Siege had continued three Months, partly by Mediation of Robert King of Sicily, but chiefly by the Lady Jane of Valois, Sister to King Philip, and Mother of King Edward's Wife (who had vowed A.D. 1330 herself a Nun, but to do this good Office, travelled from one to another) a Truce was concluded for a Year, and both their Armies are dissolved.

A Truce is concluded between the two Kings.

After this, King Edward returning into England, was advertised how the Scots, after many other Places gained, had besieged the Castle of Striveling; for Relief whereof the King makes all the haste he can: And yet before he could come, it was by Force of Battery compelled to render it self upon Conditions. Then King Edward being at Berwick, passeth to Newcastle upon Tyne, where he stays a Month, waiting for his Provision that was to come by Sea; but that being driven into other Parts by Tempest, he makes a Truce with the Scots for three or four Months, and then returns home. In the Time of this Truce, the Scots send to King David, to come and govern the Kingdom in his own Person; who thereupon taking his Leave of the King of France, with whom he had remained seven Years, he with his Wife Joan, King Edward's Sister, returns into Scotland: Where, after he had been most honourably received by the Prince of Orkney, and the other Lords and Barons of the Kingdom, as soon as the Truce was ended, with a strong Army enters Northumberland, passing on to Newcastle upon Tyne, where he plants his Camp. Of this Castle John Nevil was left Governor by King Edward, who sending out certain Companies, took the Earl Murray Prisoner; and with the Slaughter of divers of his Men, and rich Booties, returned back to his Castle: Which so incensed King David, that he assaulted the Castle as a Man enraged; but finding it too strong for his taking, he then passed into the Province of Durham, where he used all kinds of Cruelty, first upon the Country, and then upon the City, killing Men, Women, and Children, Clergy, and others, burning and destroying Houses, and Churches, and utterly defacing it. From thence he passeth on to the Castle of Werk, which Castle belonged to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, in right of his Wife; but himself being then Prisoner in France, only his Countess, and one William Montacute, a Cousin of his, was in the Castle. This William perceiving the Scottish Horse to be so over charged with Pillage, that they were scarce able to go, issues out of the Castle with forty Horse, sets upon them, kills two hundred, and takes six Score, whom he brings with their rich Pillage into the Castle. King David soon after with his whole Army arrived; but hearing of King Edward's coming (who certified of these things, made all the haste he could) he retires himself from thence; and King Edward finding him gone before he came, yet would needs go in and visit the Countess: With whom as soon as he saw her, he was so enamoured, that he laid more Battery to her Chastity than King David had done to her Castle; but finding it inexpugnable, after a Day and a Night he left it, and followed after the Scots, with whom for three Days together he had many Skirmishes, till at last a Truce was concluded for two Years; and amongst other Conditions, William Earl of Salisbury, a Prisoner with the King of France, was set at Liberty.

A.D. 1330 Liberty in Exchange for the Earl Murray, Prisoner with the King of England.

About this Time another Difference fell out between the Kings of England and France. John Earl of Mountford laid Claim to the Duchy of Britain, but in the Quarrel was taken Prisoner by the King of France. His Lady sends to King Edward for Succour; which King Edward grants, upon Condition that a Marriage be made between his Daughter Mary and the Earl of Mountford's Son: Which being agreed on, he sends over to her Aid, first Walter de Manny, a valiant Knight, and afterward Robert d'Artois. But while his Army was preparing, King Edward was informed by Edward Baliol, the pretended King of Scotland, and Governor of Berwick, that the Scots had not kept the Conditions of the Truce: Whereupon King Edward draws a great Army to Berwick, with a Purpose to do great Matters, but nothing was done, for a new Truce was again concluded for two Years. By this Time Robert d'Artois had made ready his Army, and taking with him the Countess of Mountford, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Suffolk, and many other Barons, after great Tempests and Encounters at Sea, lands safely at last near to Vannes, which was held by the French; and laying Siege to the City, with the Assistance of Walter de Manny, who came unto him, after many Assaults, at last he took it, to the great Joy of the Countess of Mountford, though she held it not long; for certain resolute French Knights assaulted it soon after, and recovered it from the English. In which Action many Lords were slain or wounded, and particularly Robert d'Artois himself; who passing over into England, for the better curing of his Wounds, soon after died, and was buried in St. Paul's Church in London. And now King Edward himself with a strong Army passeth over into Britain, and plants his Camp before the City of Vannes, where was like to have been a cruel Battel; but in the Instant there came from Pope Clement the sixth, two Cardinals, the Bishops of Preneeste and Tusculum: Who upon certain Conditions concluded a Peace. Amongst other Conditions this was one; That the City of Vannes should be delivered to King Philip; and thereupon John Earl of Mountford should be set at Liberty; but yet with this Charge, not to go into Britain: Which Promise notwithstanding he kept not, but went presently and besieged a Town in Britain, though he were forced to retire, and died shortly after. But the Truce cracked thus, as it were, by Mountford, was afterward absolutely broken by King Edward; though he charged the Breach of it upon King Philip, and King Philip upon him. But howsoever, broken it was, and Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby, with divers other Earls and Barons, is sent into France, who won many Towns in Gascoin, and in the Counties of Perigort and Tholouse, and then went to Winter at Bourdeaux: And afterward in May following, pursuing his Victories, he won many more Towns; and amongst others, the great Town of Reol. After this again, he took Montpesat, Maurore, Villefranche, and many other Towns; and at last the great City of Angoulesm, and then came to Winter again at Bourdeaux.

Of his Acts together with the Prince.

KING Philip informed of so many great Losses, assembles a mighty Army, no less than a hundred thousand Men, with which he recovers Miremont and Villefranche, and then proceeded to besiege Angoulesm: Whom the Earl of Derby having not Forces sufficient to encounter, King Edward (leaving for Wardens of England in his Absence, the Lords Piercy and Nevil) goeth himself in Person with an Army (as Froissard saith) of fourscore thousand Men at Arms, and ten thousand Archers, besides those out of Wales and Ireland; taking with him his Son, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Guyenne, being then but of the Age of fifteen Years. It may be thought preposterous in King Edward to put his Son to be a Soldier before he was come to be a Man; but it seems he had a Longing to try his Son's Valour in the Bud, and perhaps was loth to omit any thing that might give any Countenance to this Battel, in which the two Kingdoms were laid as it were at Stake: But howsoever, taking him along with him, and almost all the Lords of the Kingdom, he takes Shipping, and lands at Normandy, where at his first setting his Foot on Ground, he had such a Fall, that the Blood gushed out at his Nose; which the Barons took for an ill Sign, but the King took it for a good one, saying, It was a Sign that the Land desired to have him. And indeed he presently took the Towns of Harfleur, Moulborough, Carenton, and St. Loe, and afterward the City of Caen it self; and from thence passed to the County of Eureux, sacked and pillaged it, as also the City of Gisors, Vernon, Meudon, and Boulebourg, to the City of Poissy. King Philip all this while stayed about Paris, as looking for King Edward, to give him Battel there; and for that Purpose had planted his Camp near to St. Germain. But King Edward deceived him: For going from Poissy, he passed into Picardy and Ponthieu, where he took and burned many Towns and Castles; and then passed the River of Somme, though not without Danger: For King Philip had sent thither Gundemar de Fay, with a thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to stop his Passage. King Edward notwithstanding resolves to pass, or perish, and plungeth foremost into the River, crying out, They who love me will follow me. At which Voice every Man strove who should go foremost, and so the Shore was presently gained by the English. Gundemar astonished with this bold Adventure, astonisheth his People with his fearful Countenance: So that the English encountering the French all in Disorder, put them to Flight. King Philip enraged with this Dishonour, resolves to revenge it, and presently provokes King Edward to Battel. King Edward had now encamped in a Village called Cressy, his Army consisting of thirty thousand Men, which he divided into three Battalia's: The first was led by the young Prince of Wales, with whom were joined the Earl of Warwick, Geoffry of Harecourt, Thomas Holland, Richard Stafford, John Chandois, Robert Nevil, and many other Knights and Gentlemen, to the Number of eight hundred Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand

The Battel between the two Kings at Cressy.

A.D. 1346 thousand Welsh. In the second were the Earls of Northampton and of Arundel, the Lords Rosse, Basset, and others, to the Number of eight hundred Men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. In the third the King was himself, having about him seven hundred Men at Arms, and three thousand Archers. The Battels thus ordered, mounted on a white Hobby, he rode from Rank to Rank to view them; encouraging every Man that Day to have Regard to his Right and Honour. The French King's Army was far greater, consisting of above sixty thousand Combatants well armed; whereof the Chief were Charles Duke of Alanson the King's Brother, John of Luxemburgh King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the King's Nephew, Ralph Duke of Lorraine, the Earls of Flanders, Nevers, Sancerre; of Barons, Knights and Gentlemen, about three thousand. The Vanguard he commits to his Brother the Count de Alanson, the Reer to the Earl of Savoy, the main Battel he leads himself. His Heat, out of Confidence of Victory, was so great, that it scarce permitted Time for a little Counsel what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised, that the Army should take some Repast, and that the Infantry, consisting of Genoueses (which were above fifteen thousand Cross-Bows, and sure Men) should make the first Front, and the Cavalry to follow; which was agreed on. But the Count of Alanson, contrary to this Order, took it ill that the Genoueses were in the first Rank; and in Fury caused them to change Place, which bred that Discontentment, that it irritated them more against the Leader than the Enemy. Besides, there fell at the Instant such a Shower of Rain, as dissolved their Strings, and made their Bows of little Use; and at the Breaking up of the Shower, the Sun shone full in the Face of the French (dazling their Sight) and on the Back of the English, as if all made for them. King Edward, who had gotten to a Wind-mill, beholding, as from a Sentinel, the Countenance of the Enemy, and discovering the Disturbance made by the Change of Place, instantly sends to charge that Part, without giving them Time to re-accommodate themselves: Whereupon the discontented Genoueses recoil, which the Count de Alanson perceiving, he comes on with the Horse, and in great Rage cries out, On, on, let us make Way upon the Bellies of these Genoueses, who do but hinder us; and instantly pricks on with a full Career through the Midst of them, followed by the Earls of Lorraine and Savoy, and never stays till he came up to the English Battel, where the Prince was. The Fight grew hot and doubtful, insomuch as the Commanders about the Prince send to K. Edward to come up with his Power to aid him. The King asks the Messengers, Whether his Son were slain or hurt: Who answering, No, but that he was like to be overlaid: Well then (said the King) return and tell them who sent you, That so long as my Son is alive, they send no more to me whatever happen; for I will that the Honour of this Day be his. And so being left to try for themselves, they wrought it out with the Sword; the rather because the French King having his Horse slain under him, and in Danger to be trodden to Death, had he not been recovered by the Lord Beaumont, was to the great Discouragement of his People, withdrawn out of the Field: Whereof Notice being once taken by the English, the Day was soon after theirs, and the greatest Victory they ever had yet against the French; and so bloody, as there is no Mention made of any one Prisoner taken in the Battel, but all slain out-right; only some few Troops that held together, saved themselves by retiring to Places near adjoining. The French King himself, with a small Company, got to Bray in the Night, and approaching the Walls, and the Guard asking, who goes there? He answered, The Fortune of France. By his Voice he was known, and thereupon received into the Town with the Tears and Lamentation of his People. The Number of the Slain are certified to be thirty thousand: The Chief whereof were, Charles de Alanson, John Duke of Bourbon, Ralph Earl of Lorraine, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Jaques Dauphine de Viennois, Son to Imbert (who after gave Dauphiné to the Crown of France) the Earls of Sancerre, Harcourt, and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the Number of fifteen hundred. This memorable Victory happened upon the Saturday after Bartholomew Day, in the Year 1346. The next Day early in the Morning, being Sunday, he sent out three hundred Launces, and two thousand Archers, to discover what was become of the Enemy, who found great Troops coming from Abbeville, St. Requier, Roan and Beauvais (ignorant of what happened) led by the Archbishop of Roan, and the Prior of France: Whom they likewise defeated, and slew seven thousand.

Thirty thousand French slain.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward that Year; there was another of no less Importance gotten in England, by the Queen and his People at home, against the Scots: Who being set on by the French to divert the War there, entred upon this Kingdom with threescore thousand Men (as our Writers report) assuring himself of Success, in regard (as he supposed) the main Strength thereof was now gone into France; but he found it otherwise. For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Umpbreville, the Earl of Angus, Henry Percy, Ralph Neville, William Dayncourt, with the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gathered so great Forces, and so well ordered them by the Animation of the Queen (who was there in Person) as fighting a great Battel at Nevil's Cross, in the Bishoprick of Durham, they utterly defeated this great Army, took David their King Prisoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteith, Murry, Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and others; and put to the Sword fifteen thousand Scots. This Victory also fell upon a Saturday, six Weeks after that of Cressy. He that took King David Prisoner, was one John Copland, an Esquire of Northumberland, whom King Edward rewarded with five hundred Pound Land a Year, and made him a Banneret. And, as if all concurred to make this Year Triumphant, the Aids sent to the

And now King Edward, without meddling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbeville, marched on directly, and sits down before Calais, a Town of more Importance for England, and the Gate to all the rest; wherein John de Vienne Marshal of France, and the Lord de Andregben (a great Man in his Time) commanded. The King being to make it a Winter Siege, erected for him and his People so many Houses and Lodges, that it was named New Calais.

All that Winter King Edward lay without any Molestation by the French King, who was busied at home in his own State about raising of Money; wherewith supplied at last, he raiseth an Army and approacheth Calais, but finds no Way open to come to relieve it. The King of England was both Master of the Haven, and posses'd all other Ways that were passable; and the Flemmings, his Friends, had besieged Aire. To oppose whom, John Duke of Normandy is sent for out of Guyenne: Who departing, leaves Henry of Lancaster, Earl of Derby, Master of the Field; and he having an Army consisting of twelve hundred Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and three thousand other Foot, takes in most of the Towns of Xaintonge and Poictou, and in the End besieged and sacked Poitiers, and then returns to Bourdeaux, with more Pillage than his People could well bear: Thus the English prosper every where, and the French suffer. During the Siege of Calais (in which some think King Edward first used Guns) the Flemmings send to King Edward to make a Marriage between his Daughter Isabel and their Lord, the young Count Lewis; to which the King consented, but the Duke of Brabant gets the King of France to make the Match for a Daughter of his. The Flemmings press their Lord with the Match of England; but he absolutely refused it, saying, he would never marry a Daughter of him that had killed his Father, though he would give him half his Kingdom. This Answer so incensed the Flemmings, that they put their Lord in Prison, till with long Durance he at last consented; and thereupon King Edward and his Queen, with their Daughter Isabel came over to Berghes, and there the young Earl is affianced to her: But returning afterwards into Flanders, as soon as he found Opportunity, he went to King Philip, and left his affianced Lady unmarried, and married afterwards a Daughter of the Duke of Brabant's. But all this while the Siege of Calais was continued; and King Philip not being able to come to relieve it, solicits King Edward to appoint some Place of Battel, and he would meet him. But King Edward returns Answer, That if he would make his own Way to come thither to him, there he should find him, but from thence

he would not part, having lain there so long A.D. 1346 to his great Labour and Expence, and being now so near the Point of gaining the Place. Two Cardinals are sent from the Pope to mediate a Peace, but could effect nothing; so as the French King was forced to brake up his Army, and retire to Paris, leaving Calais to the Mercy of the Besieger: Which when the Town understood, they sent to desire Parly, had it granted, and therein received this final Answer, That six of the chief Burgeses should be sent to the King bare-headed, and bare-footed, in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, the Keys of the Town and Castle in their Hands, and submit themselves to the King's Will; the rest he was content to take to Mercy. This seemed a hard Condition, and much Difficulty who should be those six: But one rising up, and out of Love to his Country offering himself to be one, the six were soon made up; for now by his Example every one strove to be of the Number: Who presenting themselves before the King, he commanded them instantly to be put to Death. Great Supplication was made by his Lords for their Lives; but the King would not be drawn to alter his Sentence, till the Queen, great with Child, fell on her Knees, and with Tears obtained Pardon for them; which done, she caused them to be clothed, and besides a good Repast, gives to every one of them six Nobles a-piece. But though the King in his Sentence shewed Severity, yet in an Act before he had shewed Mercy; for when Victuals began to fail in the Town, and all unuseful Persons, as old Men, Women, and Children, were put out of the Gates, he forced them not back again, as he might have done, thereby the sooner to consume their Store; but suffered them to pass through his Army, gave them to eat, and two Pence a-piece to all of them. And thus was that strong Town of Calais gained, the third Day of August, in the Year 1347, after eleven Months Siege, and continued afterward in Possession of the English two hundred and ten Years. All the Inhabitants are turned out, but only one Priest, and two old Men, to inform of the Orders of the Town: And a Colony of English, amongst which seven and thirty good Families out of London, sent to inhabit it: The King and Queen enter the Town triumphantly, and make their Abode there, till the Queen was brought to Bed of her Daughter Margaret. The King made Governor of the Town Aymery of Pavia, a Lombard, whom he had brought up from his Infancy; and then with his Queen returns into England. At which Time the Princes Electors send to signify, that they had chosen him King of the Romans; but the King refuseth to accept it, as being an Honour out of his Way, and scarce compatible with his State at home.

After this, Truces were made by Mediation, from one Time to another, for the Space of two Years; in which Time, Geoffry de Charmy, Captain of St. Omer, agreed with Aymery of Pavia, whom King Edward had left Governor of Calais, to render it up for twenty thousand Crowns; which King Edward hearing of, sent to Aymery, and charged him with this Perfidiousness; whereupon Aymery comes to the King, and humbly desiring Pardon, promiseth to handle is bribed to betray it:

A.D. 1349 the Matter so as shall be to the King's Advantage, and thereupon is sent back to Calais. The King, the Night before the Time of Agreement, arrives with three hundred Men at Arms, and six hundred Archers. Monsieur de Charmy sets out likewise the same Night from St. Omers with his Forces, and sent a hundred Men before with the Crowns to Aymery. The Men are let in at a Postern Gate, the Crowns received, and assured to be all Weight: Which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and out marches the King before Day to encounter Monsieur de Charmy; who perceiving himself betrayed, defended himself the best he could, and put King Edward to a hard Bickering, who, for that he would not be known there in Person, put himself and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and was twice beaten down on his Knees by Monsieur de Riboumont, a hardy Knight (with whom he fought Hand to Hand) and yet recovered, and in the End took Riboumont Prisoner. Charmy was likewise taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the Night after (which was the first of the new Year) feasted with the Prisoners, and gave Riboumont, in Honour of his Valour, a rich Chaplet of Pearl, which himself wore on his Head (for a New-years-gift) forgave him his Ransom, and set him at Liberty. But the English not long after, in the like Practice, had better Success, and got the Castle of Guifnes (a Place of great Importance near Calais) for a Sum of Money given to one Beauconroy, a French-man; of which Castle, when the French King demanded Restitution, in regard of the Truce, King Edward returns Answer, That for Things bought and sold between their People, there was no Exception, and so held it.

But gets the Bribe, and yet keeps the Town.

K. Edward twice beaten down on his Knees by Monsieur de Riboumont; yet at last takes him Prisoner. He rewards Riboumont for his Valour.

1350. The French King's eldest Son to be Dauphine of France, whence it began.

1355. The Prince of Wales is sent into Gascony.

About this Time Philip King of France died, leaving his Son John to succeed him; in the Beginning of whose Reign, Humbert Prince of Dauphine, dying without Issue, made him his Heir; and thereupon Charles, King John's Son, was created the first Dauphine of France: From whence it grew to be a Custom, that the King of France's Heir should always be called Dauphine of France. About this Time also the Duke of Lancaster was to perform a Combat, upon a Challenge with a Prince of Bohemia; but when they had entred the Lists, and had taken their Oaths, K. John interposed and made them Friends. And now when, after many Means of Mediation, no Peace could be concluded between the two Kings, the Prince of Wales being now grown a Man, is appointed by Parliament to go into Gascony with a thousand Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a great Number of Welsh-men; and in June following he sets forth with three hundred Sail, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford; the Lord Chandois, the Lord James Audeley, Sir Robert Knolls, Sir Francis Hall, with many others. About Michaelmas following, the King himself passeth over to Calais with another Army, taking with him two of his Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulster in Right of his Wife, and John of Gaunt Earl of Richmond. There met him at Calais of Mercenaries out of Germany, Flanders, and Brabant, a thousand Men at Arms: So that his Army consisted of three thousand Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers on Horse-back, besides Archers on Foot. A.D. 1355 The City of London sent three hundred Men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one Livery, at their own Charge; but all this great Army effected nothing at that Time, by Reason the King of France would not be drawn to any Encounter, and had so disfurnished the Country of all Provisions, that the King of England was forced to return. King Edward, solicited by the King of Navarre to aid him against the King of France, sends over the Duke of Lancaster with four thousand Men at Arms, who wins many Towns; and the Prince enters Guyenne, passeth over Languedoc to Tholouse, Narbonne, and Bourges, without any Encounter, sacks, spoils, and destroys where he goes; and, laden with Booties, returns to Bordeaux. The French King thus assaulted on all Sides, gathers all the Power he possibly could; and first makes against his Enemies in Normandy, recovers many of his lost Towns, and was likely to have there prevailed, but that he was drawn of Force to oppose this fresh Invader, the Prince of Wales, who was come up into Touraine, against whom he brings his whole Army, consisting of above three-score thousand: Whereupon the Prince, whose Forces were not likely to be able to encounter him (being six for one) was advised to retire again to Bordeaux. But the French King, to prevent this Course, follows; and within two Leagues of Poitiers hath him at a great Advantage. At which Instant two Cardinals came from the Pope to mediate a Peace. But the French King, supposing he had his Enemy now in his Mercy, would accept of no other Conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him four Hostages; and as vanquished, render himself and his Army to his Discretion. The Prince was content to restore unto him what he had gained upon him, but without Prejudice of his Honour, wherein he said he stood accountable to his Father, and to his Country. But the French King would abate nothing of his Demands, as making himself sure of Victory; and thereupon was instantly ready to set upon the Prince; who seeing himself reduced to this Strait, takes what Advantage he could of the Ground, and providently got the Benefit of Vines, Shrubs, and Bushes, on that Part he was like to be assailed, to impester and entangle the French Horse, which he saw were to come furiously upon him. The Success answered his Expectation; for the Cavalry of his Enemies, upon their first Assault, were so wrapt and encumbered among the Vines, that his Archers galled and annoyed them at their Pleasure: For, the French King, to give the Honour of the Day to his Cavalry, employed them only without his Infantry; so as they being disordered and put to Rout, his whole Army came utterly to be defeated. In this Battel were taken Prisoners King John himself, with his youngest Son Philip, by Dennis de Morbecque, a Knight of Artois; Jaques de Bourbon, Conte de Ponthieu; the Archbishop of Sens, John de Artois, Conte de Eu; Charles de Artois; his Brother Count de Longueville; John de Melun; Count de Tanquerville; the Counts of Venafme, Vaudemont, Estampes, Salbourg, Dampmartin, and La Roche, and John de Centre, accounted (as Froissard saith) the best Knight of France, with many other Lords, besides

John King of France, with an Army of sixty thousand, opposeth the Prince of Wales at Poitiers.

The Prince's Policy.

K. John himself, with many great Lords taken Prisoners.

A.D. 1355 fides two thousand Knights and Gentlemen; insomuch as the Conquerors holding it not safe to retain so many, let many of them go. The French, who can give best Account of their own Losses, report there died in this Battel a thousand seven hundred Gentlemen; amongst which were fifty two Bannerets: The most eminent, Peter de Bourbon, the Duke of Athens, Constable of France, Jehan de Clermont, Marshal, Geoffry de Charmy, High-chamberlain, the Bishop of Chal-
ons, the Lords of Landas, of Pons, and of Cham- bly. There escaped from this Battel three of the French King's Sons (for he brought them all thither) Charles, Prince Dauphine; Louis, after Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Berry; all great Actors in the Time following. The special great Men of the English in this Fight were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, Stafford; the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Barkley, Basset: Of Gascoyne, Le Capitaine de Beuff; the Lords Pu- mier, Chamout, and others. The Lord James Audeley won Honour both by his Valour and his Bounty; for having vowed to be foremost in this Fight, he performed his Word, and sealed it with many Wounds: For which the Prince having rewarded him with the Gift of five hundred Marks Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Esquires. Whereupon the Prince demanding whether he accepted not his Gift? He answered, That these Men had deserved the same as well as himself, and had more Need of it. With which Reply the Prince was so well pleased, that he gave him five hundred Marks more in the same Kind. A rare Example, where Desert in the Subject, and Reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater!

The Lord
Jam. Aude-
ley's Valour, and his Bounty.

But here great Strife arose between many, who should be the Man that took King John Prisoner; but the Prince commanded them to forbear their Claims till they came into England:
 Where the Matter being heard, it was adjudged by King John's own Testimony, that one Sir Dennis Morbecque of St. Omers had taken him Prisoner: For which Service the King rewarded him with a thousand Marks.

1357.

And now, though King John had the Misfortune to fall into the Hands of his Enemy, yet he had the Happiness to fall into the Hands of a noble Enemy; for Prince Edward used him with such Respect and Observance, that he could not find much Difference between his Captivity and Liberty. After the Battel, which was fought the nineteenth Day of September, in the Year 1357, Prince Edward leads King John and the captive Lords to Bordeaux, wherein he retains them till the Spring following; but sends present News of this Victory to his Father; who thereupon causeth a general Thanksgiving all England over eight Days together. And in May following K. John rather coming over with the Prince, than brought over by him, is lodged at the Savoy, a Palace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster, and the fairest at that Time about London. And K. Edward, as though he thought it Honour enough to have one King his Prisoner at once, at the Suit of his Sister, Queen Joan, sets her Husband Da- vid King of Scots at Liberty, after he had been Prisoner in England eleven Years; but not without paying a Ransom, which was a hundred thousand Marks to be paid in ten Years.

A Thank-giving all England over eight Days together.
 K. John is brought over and lodged at the Savoy.

David King of Scots, after eleven Years Imprisonment is set at Liberty.

After this, by Mediation of Cardinals sent by A.D. 1357
 the Pope, a Truce for two Years is concluded between the two Kingdoms of England and France; and in the Time of this Truce, Articles of Peace between the two Kings are propound-ed: King Edward requires the Duchies of Nor- mandy and Guyenne, the Countries of Poitou, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou, with all their Appurtenances, as large as King Richard the first held them, and many other Provinces besides, and to hold them all without Homage, or any other Service: To which Articles King John (weary of Imprisonment) assents and seals, but the Dauphine and Council of France utterly reject it. Whereupon K. Edward, in great Displeasure, resolves to make an End of this Work with the Sword, and to take Possession of the Kingdom of France; and leaving his younger Son Thomas Governour of his Kingdom at home, with a Fleet of eleven hundred Sail, and taking all the great Lords of the Realm with him, he passed over to Calais, dividing his Army into three Battels, whereof one he commits to the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself. And first marching through Picardy, where he takes in many Towns, he plants his Siege afterward before Rheims: But having spent there six or seven Weeks without effecting any thing, he passeth thence, and taketh in the Cities of Sens and Nevers, the Duchy of Burgoyne redeems it self from Spoil with paying two hundred thousand Florens of Gold. Then he marched up to Paris, and plants his Camp within two small Leagues of the Town, where he honoured 400 Esquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood: But when Sir Walter de Manny had made a Bravado before the Gates of the City, and the King saw that the Dauphine would by no Provocations be drawn out to Battel, he raiseth his Siege, and returns into Britain to refresh his Army; from thence he marched towards Chartres with a Purpose to besiege that City: And though great Offers were made him by the French, and Commissioners from the Pope solicited him with all Earnestness to accept them; yet neither they, nor the Duke of Lancaster's Persuasions could prevail with him, till a terrible Storm of Hail, with Thunder and Lightning fell upon his Army, which so terrified him, being a Warning, as it were from Heaven, that he presently vowed to make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable Conditions, as shortly after he did at the Treaty of Britigny near to Chartres upon these Articles: That the Feifs of Thouars and Belleville, the Duchy of Guyenne, comprising Gascoin, Poi-
etou, Xaintonge, Limousin, Perigort, Quercy, Rhodes, Angoulesm, and Rochel, together with the Countries of Guines and Calais, and some other Places, with the Homages of the Lords within those Territories, should be to the King of England, who besides was to have three Millions of Crowns of Gold; whereof six hundred thousand in Hand, four hundred thousand the Year following, and the rest in two Years after: And for this the King of England, and his Son the Prince of Wales, for them and their Successors for ever, should renounce all their Right pretended to the Crown of France, the Duchy

The Dauphine and Council of France not yielding to
 K. Edward's Demands, he passeth
 with an Army over into France.

He marcheth up to Paris.

K. Edward
 would hearken to no Conditions of Peace, till terrified by Thunder and Lightning.

Articles of Peace between the two Kings of England and France.

A.D. 1357 Duchy of Normandy, the Countries of Touraine, Anjou, Maine, the Homage and Sovereignty of Britain, and the Earldom of Flanders, and within three Weeks, King John to be rendred at Calais, at the Charge of the King of England, except the Expences of his House. For Assurance of which Accord, should be given into his Hand five and twenty of the greatest Dukes and Lords of France for Hostages: The Scots not to be aided by the French King, nor the Flemmings by the English. This Accord and final Peace signed by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldest Sons, Edward and Charles, and sworn unto by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hostages are delivered up to K. Edward, who brought them into England; and thereupon King John is honourably conducted to Calais, after he had remained Prisoner in England near about five Years; but being come to Calais, he was detained there above three Months, till the Money which he was to pay in Hand, could be provided; and for providing the rest he was put to hard Shifts, being fain to give the Jews leave to dwell in France for twenty Years, paying twelve Florens a Man at the Entry, and six every Year after. At this Time the Prince, by Dispensation, marries the Countess of Kent, Daughter to Edmund, Brother to Edward the Second; and his Father investing him with the Duchy of Aquitaine, he was now Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester and Kent: And not long after, with the Princess his Wife, he passeth over into France, and keeps his Court at Bourdeaux.

K. John after five Years Imprisonment is released.

Edward Prince of Wales marries the Countess of Kent, and keeps his Court at Bourdeaux.

This was now the Year 1362, and the fiftieth Year of K. Edward's Age, wherein for a Jubile he shews himself extraordinary gracious to his People, freely pardoning many Offences, releasing Prisoners, revoking Exiles; with many other Expressions of his Love and Bounty. The Year following was famous for three Kings coming into England; John King of France, Peter King of Cyprus, and David King of Scots. The King of Cyprus came to solicit King Edward to join with other Princes in the Holy War, but receives only Royal Entertainment and Excuses. The King of Scots came for Business and Visitation; but why the King of France came, is not so certain, whether it were about taking Order for his Hostages, or to satisfy K. Edward for breach of some Articles, or else for Love to the Countess of Salisbury, or perhaps out of a Desire to let England see his Majesty, being at Liberty; which had been darkened before by the Cloud of Captivity: But whatsoever the Cause of his coming was, the Cause of his staying (at least, of longer staying than he meant) was a mortal Sicknes, whereof (having lien all the Winter at the Savoy) in March or April following he died, and his Body conveyed over into France, was buried at St. Dennis with his Ancestors.

K. John comes into England.

And here falls sick, and dieth.

The Prince of Wales was now grown famous all the Christian World over, and the Man to whom all wronged Princes seem to appeal, and to fly for Succour: For which End there came at this Time to his Court, James King of Majorca, and happened to come at a Time when the Princess lay in; and thereupon he and Richard King of Navarre were taken to be Godfathers to his Son Richard. For the like Assistance also there came at the same Time to him, Peter King of Castile, driven out of his Kingdom by the French, in favour to Peter King of Arragon: And Prince Edward, partly out of Charity, to succour a distressed Prince, and partly out of Policy, to keep his Soldiers in Exercise, undertakes the Enterprize, and was so prosperous in it, that with one Battle (having but 30,000 against 100,000) he put King Peter in Possession of his Kingdom, though he was ill rewarded for his Labour; for the ungrateful King would not so much as pay his Soldiers. And it is memorable which Froissard writes, that of the Enemies were slain and drowned above 2000, and of the Prince's Party not above 40. But yet an unfortunate Journey for the Prince; for though he came back with Victory, yet he brought back with him such an Indisposition of Body, that he was never thoroughly well after: Not perhaps by Poison, nor given him by his Brother the Duke of Lancaster, though both were suspected; but there were Causes distempering him enough besides, the Country, the Season, the Action itself: And it may be more marvelled that his Soldiers came home so well, than that he came home so ill. But howsoever, being now returned, there was presently to his Indisposition of Body, added Discontentment of Mind; for not having Means to pay his Soldiers, which forced him to wink at that which he could not choose but see, and seeing, grieve at, how they preyed upon the Country, and thereupon how the Country murmured against him. And now to stop this Murmuring, his Chancellor, the Bishop of Rhodes, devised a new Dispensation, of levying a Frank of every Chimney; and this to continue for five Years, to pay the Prince's Debts: But this Imposition made the Murmuring the more. For tho' some Part of his Dominions, as the Poictovins, Xantoigns, and Limousins, in a sort consented to it; yet the Count of Armagnac, the Count of Cominges, the Viscount of Carmain, and many others, so much distasted it, that they complained thereof to the King of France, as to their Supreme Lord; who, upon Examination, finding their Complaint to be just, he thereupon, by Advice of his Council, summons Prince Edward to appear in Person to answer the Complaint: Whereupon Prince Edward made Answer, That if he must needs appear, he would bring threescore thousand Men in Arms to appear with him; and had certainly brought his Army that Summer against Paris, if he had not fallen into Symptoms of a Dropsy, which (Walsingham saith) was wrought by Enchantment. But upon this Answer of the Prince, King Charles sends Defiance to King Edward, who thereupon prepares Arms both by Sea and Land to oppose him. The French enters upon the Territories of the Prince, and Defeats divers of his Troops; in Revenge whereof John Chandois, the Prince's Lieutenant, assaults Terrers in the Province of Tholouse, and takes it. The Count of Perigort assaults Royanville in Quercy, and puts all the English to the Sword; in revenge whereof James Audeley, Seneschal of Poitou, assaults the City of Broiss, and takes it. In the mean time Robert Knolls, by some called Robin, and by others Arnold, or Reynold Knoll, had Prince Edward makes a Journey into Spain, to aid Peter King of Castile, and recovers his Kingdom for him: But is ill rewarded.

The Prince never thoroughly well after this Journey.

Prince Edward summoned by the King of France. What Answer he makes.

The two Kings enter into Arms, and interchangeably take Towns.

K k drawn

A.D. 1367 drawn Perducas de Albert to the Party of the English; and thereupon went and encamped before the Fort of Darcuel in Quercy, which John Chandois understanding, went also and joined with him in the Siege; but finding they could do no good there, they removed and besieged the City of Damme; and when they could do no good there neither, they marched forward, took the Fort of Froins, Rochevandon, and Villefranche; and that done, returned to the Prince at Angoulesme. At the same Time the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke, having spent nine Weeks at the Siege of Bordeille, at last took it; but other Captains of the English did yet more, for they scaled Belleperche in the Province of Bourbon, where the Mother of the Duke of Bourbon, and the Queen of France was, and takes her Prisoner.

Q. Philippa dieth.

About this Time Philippa Queen of England, King Edward's Wife, died, and was buried at Westminster. But this hindred not the Proceeding of the English in France. The Earl of Pembroke enters Anjou, where he takes many Towns. The Duke of Lancaster doth the like about Calais, and marching forward, plants his Camp before Harfleur, with a Purpose to burn the King of France's Navy; but being watched by the Count St. Paul, was forced to forbear that Design: And so passing other Ways, and spoiling all the Places where he passed, he returned to Calais. Winter was now drawing on, and John Chandois desiring to recover the Abby of St. Silvan in Poitou, which not long before had been betrayed to the French, was in the Enterprize discovered; and being assaulted by greater Forces, was slain in the Place, to the great Grief of the Prince of Wales, and of the English Lords: But dying without Issue, his Estate, which amounted to four hundred thousand Franks, came to the Prince. At this Time the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, with two great Armies enter upon the Territories of the Prince of Wales; whereof the Prince advertised, assembles Forces to oppose them: But when the News was brought him of the taking of Limoges, he was so much troubled at it, by reason the Bishop of that Place was his Gossip, and one in whom he especially had Affiance, that he resolved to recover it at any Price, and not to spare a Man that had a Hand in rendring it up. And thereupon taking it by Force, he commanded to sack and pillage it, and would not be stayed by the Cries of the People, casting themselves down at his Feet, till passing through the Town, he perceived three French Captains, who themselves alone had withstood the Assault of his victorious Army; and moved with the Consideration of their Valour, he then abated his Anger, and for their sakes granted Mercy to all the Inhabitants. So much is Virtue, even in an Enemy, respected by generous Minds. In the mean

Valour respected in an Enemy.

Robert Stuart Crowned King of Scotland.

Time David King of Scots died without Issue, and Robert Stuart his Nephew succeeded him in the Kingdom, and was Crowned at Scone. At this Time Robert Knolls with a great Army is sent into France, where making many Attempts with Valour enough, but with little Success, he was coming home, tho' with no Gain, yet with no Loss: Till Bertrand de Guesclin assaulting him, slew the most Part of his Men; and so this great Army on a sudden came to nothing. A.D. 1367 It seems Knolls's Action was the less successful, by reason of some young Lords that went with him, who scorning to be under his Command, as being now a new Man, and risen from a low Estate, were refractory to his Directions: And indeed, what can a General do, if he have not as well Reputation of Person, as of Place?

And now the Prince of Wales's eldest Son Edward dying at Bordeaux, the Prince with his Wife and other Son Richard came over into England; at which time the valiant Knight Walter de Manny died at London, and was buried in the Monastery of the Chartreux which he had builded, leaving one only Daughter, married to John Earl of Pembroke. This Earl of Pembroke was soon after sent Governor into Aquitain; but set upon by the way by Spaniards in favour of the French, was by them taken Prisoner, and carried with others into Spain: Who being chained together, as the Manner is, one Evans a Welsh Fugitive, who gave himself out for the right Heir of Wales, came upon him, foolishly playing upon him with scornful Language; as though to insult over another Man's Misery, could serve for a Cordial to mitigate his own.

1372.

And now upon the taking of this Earl, the Prince's Dominions in France are either taken away, or fall away faster than they were gotten. Guesclin enters Poitou, takes Montmorillon, Chouvigny, Lussac, and Moncontour: Straight after follows the Country of Aunis, or Xantougn, and the rest of Poitou; then St. Maxent, Nesse, Aulnai; then Rendon, Marant, Surgers, Fontency, and at last they came to Thouras, where the most Part of the Lords of Poitou, that held with the Prince, were assembled. At which time King Edward, with the Prince, the Duke of Lancaster, and all the great Lords of England, set forward to their Succour, but being driven back by Tempest, never came to give them Assistance, so as Thouras yielded up by Composition: Yet did this Preparation of the King stand him in nine thousand Marks; that it may be truly said, it cost him more now to lose Towns, than it had cost him before to win them: So great odds there is between the Spring and Fall of Fortune. After this the Duke of

Lancaster is sent over with another great Army, who passed up into many Parts of the Country; but King Charles resolved to hazard no Battel, saying, They were but Clouds, and would soon pass away; yet so watched him, that what with light Skirmishes, and what with Scarcity of Victuals, his Forces were so diminished, that of thirty thousand which went out of Calais, there scarce Returned six thousand home; which made King Edward say of this King Charles, That he did him more Mischief sitting still, than his Predecessors had done with all their stirring. And now by this Time all Poitou is lost, and all Aquitain also, but only Bordeaux and Bayonne; when the Archbishop of Roan and others are sent from Pope Gregory the Eleventh, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings: But each of them standing upon high Terms of Conditions, nothing could be effected, but Truce upon Truce for two or three Years together. In which Time Edward Prince of Wales died, and with him we may say the Fortune

The Duke of Lancaster is sent over with an Army of thirty thousand, but scarce six thousand returned home.

Edward Prince of Wales dieth.

A.D. 1376 tune of England, being a Prince so full of Virtues, that he left no Place for any Vice: And if he had lived in the Heroick Times, might well have been numbred amongst the nine Worthies. His Body was buried at Canterbury, where his Monument standeth. K. Edward in his seven and fortieth Year called a Parliament at Westminster, which lasted but eight Days; and to which were summoned by Writ, of Clergymen only four Bishops, and five Abbots.

A Parliament called, to which, of Clergymen, were summoned only four Bishops and five Abbots.

Of King Edward's Acts after the Death of the Prince.

IN the Time of the Prince's Sickness, King Edward calls a Parliament at Westminster; in which, when Demands were made for Supply of the King, Demands were presently made for Redress of Grievances for the Subjects. It was required that the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord of Latimer, then Lord Chamberlain, Dame Alice Pierce the King's Concubine, and one Sir Richard Sturry, might be removed from Court: And this was so vehemently urged by their Speaker, Sir Peter de la Moore, that the King rather than not to be supplied, gave way unto it; and thereupon all these Persons are presently put from Court: But the Prince soon after dying, they are all recalled to Court again, and restored to their former Places.

Subsidies are demanded by the King; and Redress of Grievances are demanded for the Subject. Hereupon the Duke of Lancaster and Alice Pierce are banished the Court, but soon revoked. Defrauding of Soldiers punished with Death.

About this Time exemplary Justice was done upon Sir John Midseforth, Knight, who was drawn, hanged and quartered at Tyburn for Treason by him committed, in defrauding Soldiers of their Wages.

About this Time the Duke of Lancaster being at Bordeaux, and hearing of the Death of Peter King of Castile, whom Prince Edward had vested in his Kingdom; and that he left only two Daughters the Heirs of his Kingdom, who were then at the City of Gascoign for their Safety: He sent and caused them to be brought to Bordeaux, and there himself married the elder Sister Constance; in whose Right he afterward took upon him the Title of King of Castile and Leon: And not long after his younger Brother Edmund Earl of Cambridge married the younger Sister Isabel.

It was now the fiftieth Year of Edward's Reign; and he for another Jubile, grants another general Pardon to his Subjects, only William Wickham, Bishop of Winchester is excepted, being lately by Procurement of the Duke of Lancaster fallen into the King's Displeasure, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. This Parliament was called the Good Parliament, though it wrought ill Effects; for Sir Peter de la Moore, at the Suit of Alice Pierce, is committed to perpetual Imprisonment at Forthingham, though within two Years after, by importunate Suit of Friends he regained his Liberty. This Alice Pierce presuming upon the King's Favour, grew so insolent, that she intermeddled with Courts of Justice, and other Offices, where she herself would sit, to countenance her Causes. And now the Duke of Lancaster is come to have the Regency, and to manage all the Affairs of the Kingdom; but King Edward, to prevent the Mischiefs which by disordering the Succession might grow in the Kingdom, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Bordeaux, creating him first

Wickham Bishop of Winchester forbidden to come to the Parliament called the Good Parliament

Alice Pierce her insolent Carriage.

Earl of Chester and Cornwal, and then Prince of Wales; and caused all the Lords of the Realm to take an Oath to accept him for their King, as his lawful Heir, when himself should be dead. In this mean Time a Treaty was had about a Marriage between this Prince Richard, and Mary a Daughter of Charles King of France: And an Offer was made to K. Edward, to leave him fourteen hundred Towns, and three thousand Fortresses in Aquitain, upon Condition he would render Calais, and all that he held in Picardy; but before any thing could be concluded, K. Edward died.

Richard of Bordeaux is created Prince of Wales, and published Heir apparent of the Crown. Fourteen hundred Towns offered for Calais.

Of his Taxations.

IN the eighth Year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at London, there was granted him a Fifteenth of the Temporalty, a Twentieth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a Tenth of the Clergy. In his tenth Year, in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted a Tenth-penny of Cities and Boroughs, a Fifteenth of others, and a Tenth of the Clergy. Also all such Treasure as was committed to the Churches through England for the Holy War is taken out for the King's Use, towards his Wars with France. The next Year after, all the Goods of two Orders of Monks, Cluniacs and Cistercians, are likewise seized into the King's Hands; and the like Subsidy as before granted at Nottingham. In his twelfth Year (and as some write, in Absence of the King) in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted by the Laity one half of the Wool, but of the Clergy the whole. The next Year after a Fifteenth was likewise paid in Wool by the Commonalty. In his fourteenth Year, in a Parliament at London, is granted him for Custom of every Sack of Wool, forty Shillings; for every three hundred Wool-fells, forty Shillings; for every Last of Leather, forty Shillings; and of other Merchandizes, according to the Rate; the same to endure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve Months after. Besides, there was granted of Citizens and Burgesses, a ninth Part of their Goods; of foreign Merchants and others, a Fifteenth; of Husbandmen, the ninth Sheaf, the ninth Fleece, the ninth Lamb for two Years; also another tenth of the Clergy: And for his present Supply, he had Loans of divers Persons; and the City of London lent twenty thousand Marks. For the Grant of which mighty Subsidy, the King (besides his Pardon to divers Kinds of Offenders) remits all Amerciaments for Transgressions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage, to the first Time of his going into Flanders, besides all Aids for the Marriage of his Sons and Daughters during his Reign; pardoning and remitting all antient Debts and Arrearages, both of his Farmers and others, till the tenth Year of his Reign; and likewise confirms the great Charter of Magna Charta. In his eighteenth Year, in a Parliament at London, a Tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity; besides a Commission is sent into every Shire to enquire of Mens Abilities; and all of five Pounds to ten of Lay-fee, were appointed to find an Archer on Horseback; of twenty five, a Demy-lance, and so ratably above. There had formerly been made a certain Coin of Gold called the Floren, of base Alloy, for the King's Benefit, towards Men rated to find Soldiers.

A.D. 1376 towards his Wars in France; but this was now called in, and Nobles of finer Metal coined, to the great Contentment of the People. In his nine and twentieth Year, he hath by Parliament granted unto him fifty Shillings upon every Sack of Wool, for six Years next ensuing; by which Imposition it was thought the King might dispend a thousand Marks Sterling a Day, the Vent of Wool was so great in that Time: But that which exceeded all his Taxations, was the Ransom he had in his four and thirtieth Year of the King of France, three Millions of Crowns of Gold. In his twelfth Year, he had taken from the Priors Aliens their Houses, Lands, and Tenements, for the Maintenance of his French Wars, which he kept twenty Years in his Hands, and then restored them again. In his six and thirtieth Year was granted twenty-six Shillings eight Pence for Transportation of every Sack of Wool for three Years. In the five and fortieth Year of his Reign, in a Parliament at Westminster, the Clergy granted him fifty thousand Pounds to be paid the same Year, and the Laity as much; which was levied by setting a certain Rate of five Pounds fifteen Shillings upon every Parish, which were found in the thirty-seven Shires to be eight thousand and six hundred, and so came in the whole to 50,181 l. 8 d. But 181 l. was abated to the Shires of Suffolk and Devonshire, in regard of their Poverty. In his eight and fortieth Year, in a Parliament is granted him a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity. In his fiftieth Year a Subsidy of a new Nature was demanded by the young Prince Richard, whom (being but eleven Years of Age) the Duke of Lancaster had brought into the Parliament of purpose to make the Demand; to have two Tenths to be paid in one Year, or twelve Pence in the Pound of all Merchandise sold for one Year; and one Pound of Silver for every Knight's Fee, and of every Fire-house one Penny: But instead of this Subsidy, after much Alteration, there was granted another of as new a Nature as this, that every Person, Man and Woman within the Kingdom, above the Age of fourteen Years, should pay four Pence (those who lived of Alms only excepted) the Clergy to pay twelve Pence of every Person beneficed, and all other Religious Persons four Pence. A mighty Aid, and such as was never granted to any King of England before!

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE instituted the Order of the Garter, upon what Cause is not certain: The common Opinion is, that a Garter of his own Queen, or (as some say) of the Lady Joan, Countess of Salisbury, slipping off in a Dance, King Edward stooped and took it up; whereat some of his Lords that were present, smiling, as at an amorous Action, he seriously said, It should not be long e'er Sovereign Honour should be done to that Garter; whereupon he afterward added the French Motto, Honi soit qui mal y pense; therein checking his Lords sinister Suspicion. Some conjecture that he instituted the Order of the Garter, for that in a Battel wherein he was victorious, he had given the word Garter for the Word or Sign: And some again are of Opinion, that the Institution of this Order is more antient, and begun by

K. Richard the First, but that this K. Edward A.D. 1376 adorned it, and brought it into Splendor. The number of the Knights of this Order is twenty Six, whereof the King himself is always one, and President; and their Feast yearly celebrated at Windsor on St. George's Day, the Tutelar Saint of that Order. The Laws of the Order are many, whereof there is a Book of Purpose. In the five and thirtieth Year of his Reign, he was earnestly petitioned by a Parliament then holden, That the great Charter of Liberties, and the Charter of Forests, might be duly observed; and that the great Officers of the Kingdom should (as in former Times) be elected by Parliament. To which Petition, tho' the King at first stood stiff upon his own Election and Prerogative, yet at last (in regard to have his present Turn served, as himself after confessed) he yielded that such Officers should receive an Oath in Parliament, to do Justice to all Men in their Offices: And thereupon a Statute was made and confirmed with the King's Seal, both for that and many other Grants of his to his Subjects; which notwithstanding were for the most part shortly after revoked.

This King also causeth all Pleas, which were before in French, to be made in English, that the Subject might understand the Course of the Law. Also in his Time an Act was passed for Purveyors, that nothing should be taken up but for ready Money, upon strict Punishment. In the next Parliament, holden the seven and thirtieth Year of his Reign, certain sumptuary Laws were ordained both for Apparel and Diet, appointing every Degree of Men the Stuff and Habits they should wear, prohibiting the wearing of Gold and Silver, Silks, and rich Furs, to all but eminent Persons. The Labourer and Husbandman is appointed but one Meal a Day, and what Meals he should eat. Also in his Time, at the Instance of the Londoners, an Act was made that no common Whore should wear any Hood, except striped with divers Colours; nor Furs, but Garments reversed the wrong Side outward. This King also was the first that created Dukes, of whom Henry of Bolingbroke Earl of Lancaster, created Duke of Lancaster, in the seven and twentieth Year of his Reign was the first: But afterward he erected Cornwall also into a Duchy, and conferred it upon the Prince: After which Time the King's eldest Son used always to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. This King also altered Moneys, and abated them in Weight, and yet made them to pass according to the former Value. Before this Time there were no other Pieces but Nobles and half Nobles, with the small Pieces of Silver called Sterlings; but now Groats of Four-pence, and half Groats of Two-pence, equivalent to the Sterling Money, are coined, which enhanced the Prices of Things, that rise or fall according to the Plenty or Scarcity of Coin; which made Servants and Labourers to raise their Wages accordingly: Whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the former Rate. Also an Act was made in this King's Time, That all Weirs, Mills, and other Stoppages of Rivers, hindring the Passages of Boats, Lighters, and other Vessels, should be removed; which though it were most commodious to Three Millions of Crowns of Gold paid to K. Edward by the King of France.

Eight thousand six hundred Parishes in England.

A Subsidy demanded of a new Nature.

Every Person above fourteen Years old pay four Pence.

The Order of the Garter instituted, and whereupon.

The great Officers of the Kingdom chosen by Parliament.

All Pleas in Law were first ordained to be made in English. Purveyors to take up nothing but for ready Money.

Houholders appointed what Meat they should eat. Whores to wear their Garments reversed. Dukes first created.

New Coins created.

A.D. 1376 to the Kingdom, yet it took little Effect, by reason of bribing and corrupting Lords and great Men, who regarded more their own private, than the publick Benefit. In a Parliament holden the tenth Year of his Reign, it was enacted, that no Wool growing within the Realm should be transported, but that it should be made in Cloth in England. Peter-pence are forbidden by the King to be paid any more to Rome, but yet in many Shires of England are gathered to this Day, saith Fabian. The Custom of washing poor Mens Feet on Maunday-Thursday, thought to have been first brought in by this King. This King also confirmed the Franchises of the City of London, and ordained that the Mayor for the Time being should sit in all Places of Judgment, within the Liberty of the same, as chief Justice, the King's Person only excepted; and that every Alderman that had been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace in all London and Middlesex; and every Alderman that had not been Mayor, should be Justice of Peace within his own Ward. Also he granted to the Citizens of London, that they should not be constrained to go out of the City to fight, or defend the Land for any Need. Also that after that Day the Franchises of the City should not be seized into the King's Hands, but only for Treason and Rebellion done by the whole City. Also that Southwark should be under the Rule of the City, and the Mayor to choose a Bailiff there, as he liked. He also granted to the Citizens of London, that the Officers of the Mayors and Sheriffs should from that Day forward use Maces of Silver Parcel gilt.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

KING Edward upon some Displeasure had imprisoned divers Clergy-men; whereupon John Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, writes him a Letter, charging him with Violation of the Rights of the Church, and with the Breach of Magna Charta; and after much good Counsel given him, threatens that if he amend not these Disorders, he must and will exercise his Ecclesiastical Authority, and proceed to Excommunication of his Officers, though not of himself, Queen, or Children. The King answers, and sends his Letter to the Bishop of London, charging the Archbishop to be the Cause of all this Disturbance, having been the Man that first set him upon the War with France, assuring him he should want no Money; and now had been the Hindrance, that Monies given him by Parliament were not duly levied; and after many Remonstrances to such Purpose, concludes, that if he desisted not from his rebellious Obstinacy, he would use his Temporal Authority, and proceed against him as against a Rebel. But this Difference between them was not long after, upon the Archbishop's Submission, reconciled. And indeed the great Account which this King made of Clergy-men, may appear by his employing almost none but Clergy-men in all his Offices of Account. Simon Langham, Archbishop of Canterbury, was Chancellor of England; William Wickham, Archdeacon of Lincoln, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; David Willer, Parson of Somerham, Master of the Rolls; ten Bene-ficed Priests, Civilians, Masters of the Chancery; A.D. 1376 William Mulse, Dean of St. Martins le Grand, chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Receiver and Keeper of the King's Treasure and Jewels; William Askby, Archdeacon of Northampton, Chancellor of the Exchequer; William Dighton, Prebendary of St. Martins, Clerk of the Privy-Seal; Richard Chesterfield, Prebend of St. Stephens, Treasurer of the King's House; Henry Snatch, Parson of Oundle, Master of the King's Wardrobe; John Newnham Parson of Fenny-Stanton, one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer; John Rowseby, Parson of Harwich, Surveyor and Comptroller of the King's Works; Thomas Brittingham, Parson of Asby, Treasurer to the King for the Part of Guifnes, and the Marches of Calais; John Troyes, a Priest, Treasurer of Ireland.

In the seventeenth Year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, Complaint is made of the great Inconvenience that came by the Pope's Collation of Benefices in England, The Pope re-conferring them upon Strangers, who understood not the Language; and therefore not fit to be Pastors over a Flock they could not feed: And hereupon Sir John Shordich is sent to Pope Clement the Sixth, to require him to forbear such Collations, and to signify his Consent therein: But this Message was so unwelcome to the Pope, that the Messenger came back unheard, at least unanswered; and the King taking his Silence for Consent, or perhaps not much caring whether he consented or no, proceeded to a Prohibition of all such Collations within his Realm, on Pain of Imprisonment, or Death, to whomsoever should in Time to come present or admit any such Persons, who by the Pope were so preferred, to the Prejudice of the King's Prerogative. These were Disturbances in matter of Discipline; but towards the End of his Reign, there fell a Disturbance in matter of Doctrine; for a certain Divine, named John Wickliffe, inveighed in his Sermons, and other Acts in the Schools, against the Abuses of Churchmen, Monks, and other Religious Orders; and had by his Doctrine won many Disciples unto him (who after were called Lollards) professing Poverty, going bare-foot, and poorly clad in Russet. Amongst other his Doctrines, he taught, that neither King nor other secular Lord, could give any thing in Perpetuity unto Church-men; and that temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take the Goods of religious Persons to relieve them in their Necessities, by the Example of William Rufus, and others. This Man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Piercy Marshal, much favour and cherish, extolling him for his Learning and Integrity of Life; which made him so far to presume, that daily in one Church or other he published his Opinions. Whereupon at length he is cited to answer before the Archbishop, the Bishop of London, and others in St. Paul's. At the Day appointed, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Marshal go to conduct him; when they were come to our Lady's Chappel, the Duke and Barons with the Bishops sitting down, John Wickliffe was by the Lord Marshal willed to sit down, in regard (he said) the Man had much to answer, and needed a convenient Seat. The Bishop of London told him,

The Pope re-conferring Benefices in England.

John Wickliffe bringeth in new Doctrine, whom the Duke of Lancaster favours.

A.D. 1376 him, it was against all Law and Reason that he who was there cited before his Ordinary should sit. Whereupon a great Contention between the Duke and the Bishop of London.

The Londoners take the Bishop's Part, and set upon the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaster's House.

Whereupon a great Contention between the Duke and the Bishop of London. The Duke takes the Marshal's Part, and sharply reprehended the Bishop, the Bishop returns the like to the Duke; who in a great Rage swore he would pull down the Pride of him, and of all the Bishops in England: And whispering in his Ear, told him he had rather pull him out of the Church by the Hair of the Head, than to suffer such Indignities. Which Words the Londoners over-hearing, swore with a loud Voice they would rather lose their Lives than to suffer their Bishop to be thus injuriously used. Their Fury was the more against the Duke, for that the Day before in the Parliament (whereof he was President) it was required in the King's Name, that from thenceforth there should be no more a Mayor of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City; and that the Lord Marshal of England should arrest Offenders within the Liberties, as in other Places. The Morrow after, the Citizens assembling to consult of this Business, it happened the Lord Fitz-Walter, and Guido Bryan, came into the City; which the People seeing, furiously ran upon them, and were like to beat them down for coming at that time. The Lord Fitz-Walter protested he came to no other End, but to offer his Service to the City, being by Inheritance their Standard-bearer, and was to take Injuries offered to them, as to himself, and therefore willed them to look to their Defence, whereupon they presently take Arms, assail the Marshal's Inn, break open the Gates, brought forth a Prisoner in his Girdle, and set him at Liberty, but found not the Lord Marshal, who with the Duke was that Day to dine with one John de Ypres. Then this furious Multitude ran to assail the Savoy, which a Knight of the Duke's seeing, hastens to the Place where his Lord dined, and acquaints him with this Uproar in the City. The Duke upon hearing it, leaps from the Table so hastily, that he hurt both his Shins on the Form; and with Sir Henry Percy alone takes Boat, and goes to Kennington near Lambeth, where the Princess with the young Prince lay: To whom he complains of this Riot, and the Violence offered him. In the mean Time, the Multitude coming to the Savoy, a Priest inquisitive to know the Business, was answered, they went to take the Duke, and the Lord Marshal, and compel them to deliver Sir Peter de la Moore, unjustly kept in Prison. The Priest replied that Sir Peter was a Traitor to the King, and worthy to be hanged. At which Words they all cried out, This is Percy, This is the Traitor of England, his Speech bewrays him, though his Apparel be disguised: And presently they ran upon him, and wounded him to Death. The Bishop of London hearing of this Outrage, leaves his Dinner, hastes to the Savoy, admonisheth them of the holy Time, being Lent; assuring them, all should be fairly ended for the Good of the City. With those Persuasions they were somewhat pacified, but yet they took the Duke's Arms, and hung them up reversed, in Sign of Treason, in all the principal Parts of the City. Upon the Princesses Advice, the chief Citizens send to the sick King, to excuse this Tumult, saying, It was not in their Power to suppress it, the Commonalty being in Commotion, upon an A.D. 1376 Information that their Liberties should be taken from them by Parliament. The King told them, it never was in his Thought to infringe their Liberties; but he rather desired to enlarge them. But this Affront of the Citizens would not down with the Duke till he had pulled down some of the Principal of them; for he caused the Mayor and Aldermen to be displaced, and others put in their Rooms. A Revenge he had better been without, for he never had the Love of the City after: And to want their Love is a kind of Banishment. Wickliffe himself, censured by the Bishops to abjure his Opinions, chose rather to leave his Country than his Doctrine; and going over into Bohemia, was there much honoured while he lived, and hath been more since he died: At least a great Part of his Doctrine continues in Veneration amongst that People to this Day.

HIS Works of Piety were great and many, as the Founding of East-Minster, an Abby (of the Cistercian Order) near the Tower. An Abby of Nuns at Dartford in Kent: The King's Hall in Cambridge, for poor Scholars: An Hospital for the Poor at Calais. He conferred upon the University of Oxford, where he had himself been trained up, under the learned Walter Burleigh, the chief Rule of the City, subordinating the Mayor and Citizens to the Chancellor of the University. He built St. Stephen's Chappel at Westminster, with the Endowment of 300 Pounds per Annum. He augmented the Chappel at Windsor, and made Provisions there for Church-men, and four and twenty poor Knights. These were his publick Works. But besides these, his private Buildings were the Castle of Windsor, which he re-edified and enlarged; the Castle at Queenborough, Fortifications at Calais and other Places. His Queen Philippa founded Queen's College in Oxford: And Mary Countess of Pembroke, the College called Pembroke-Hall, in Cambridge. In this King's Time, Sir John Poultney, Mayor of London, built the College in London called Saint Lawrence Poultney, and little Alhallows, a Parish Church in Thames-street; and also the Carmelite-friers Church in Coventry. Henry Earl of Lancaster and Leicester, founded the Hospital by the Castle of Leicester, wherein a hundred poor impotent People were provided for with all Things necessary. William Elsing Mercer of London, made a new Hospital of an old House of Nuns by Cripplegate; and placing Canons Regular there, he became the first Prior thereof. Walter Stapleton Bishop of Exeter, founded Exeter-College, and Hart-Hall in Oxford. William Bateman Bishop of Norwich, builded Trinity-Hall in Cambridge. Simon Islip Archbishop of Canterbury, founded Canterbury-College in Oxford. William Edendon, Treasurer of England, founded the Monastery of Edendon; the Religious Brethren whereof were called Bon Hommes. Sir Walter de Manny, born in Cambray, purchased a Piece of Ground called Spittle-Croft, containing thirteen Acres, without the Bars of West-Smithfield, and caused the same to be enclosed; where he built a Chappel, and after founded the same to be a House of Charter-House Monks. founded.

A.D. 1376 Monks. Humphrey Bobun Earl of Hereford and Essex, re-edified the Augustine Friars Church in London, and was buried in the Quire there. In the two and thirtieth Year of this King's Reign, John Stody, Mayor of London, gave unto the Vintners of London all the Quadrant where Vintners-Hall now standeth, with the Tenements round about, from the Lane to this Day called Stody's Lane; where are founded thirteen Houses for thirteen poor People, which are there kept of Charity. Also in this King's Time Sir John Cobham founded the College of Cobham in Kent. John Loufkin, four times Mayor of London, builded at Kingston upon Thames, where he was born, a Chappel, called Magdalen's, to the which he joined an Hospital, wherein was a Master, two Priests, and certain poor Men: And for that the Parish-Church of St. Michael by Crooked-Lane, where he dwelled, was a very homely Thing, and the Ground thereabout a filthy Plot by Reason of the Butchers in Eastcheap, who made the same their Lay-stall, he on the same Ground builded the fair new Parish-Church of St. Michael now standing, and was buried there in the Middle of the Quire, under a fair Tomb of Stone. He also founded a College to the same Church, near thereunto adjoining. John Barnes, Mayor of London, gave a Chest with three Locks, and a thousand Marks to be lent to young Men upon Security, so that it passed not one hundred Marks; and for the occupying thereof, if he were learned, to say at his Pleasure, De profundis, for the Soul of John Barnes: If he were not learned, to say Pater Noster: But howsoever the Money is lent, the Chest at this Day standeth in the Chamber of London, without Money or Pledges. Thomas of Woodstock, the youngest Son of K. Edward, founded a College at Playfie in Essex, where in his Life he had provided a sumptuous Tomb, where he was first laid, but translated afterward to Westminster.

Casualties happening in his Time.

A very great Pestilence, and continued nine Years.

After which the Number of Mens Teeth lessened.

IN the two and twentieth Year of his Reign, a contagious Pestilence arose in the East and South Parts of the World, and spread it self all over Christendom; and coming at last into England, it so wasted the People, that scarce the tenth Person of all Sorts were left alive. There died in London (some say in Norwich) between the first of January, and the first of July, 57,374 Persons. In Yarmouth, in one Year 7052 Men and Women: Before which Time, the Parsonage there was worth 700 Marks a Year, and afterwards was scarce worth forty Pounds a Year. This Plague began in London about All-hallontide, in the Year 1348, and continued till the Year 1357. Where it was observed, that those who were born after the Beginning of this Mortality had but twenty-eight Teeth, where before they had two and thirty. In the twelfth Year of his Reign, a sudden Inundation of Water at Newcastle upon Tyne, bare down a Piece of the Town Wall, and six Perches in Length, near to a Place called Walkenew; where a hundred and twenty Men and Women were drowned. In the five and thirtieth Year of his Reign, another Pestilence happened in England, which was called the second Pestilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaster; also Reginald Lord Cobham, and Wal-ter Fitz-Warren, two famous Men, and five Bishops, of Worcester, of London, of Ely, of Lincoln, and of Chichester. In this King's Time a Frost lasted from the midst of September to the Month of April. In the fourth Year of his Reign a solemn Justing or Tournament was holden at London in Cheapside, betwixt the great Cross and the great Conduit, near Soper-lane, which lasted three Days, where the Queen Philippa, with many Ladies, fell from a Stage, set up for them to behold the Justing; and though they were not hurt at all, yet the King threatned to punish the Carpenters for their Negligence, till the Queen entreated Pardon for them upon her Knees; as indeed she was always ready to do all good Offices of Mercy to all People. In the eleventh Year of his Reign was so great Plenty, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold at London for two Shillings, a fat Ox for a Noble, a fat Sheep for Six-pence, and five Pigeons for a Penny, a fat Goose for Two-pence, a Pig for a Penny; other Things after that Rate. But in his twenty seventh Year there was a great Scarcity, by Reason there fell no Rain, or very little, from the End of March, to the End of July, and was therefore called the dry Summer.

Many great Men died of the Plague. A Frost that lasted seven Months.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Philippa, the Daughter of William Earl of Heynault, at York. A Match made up in Haste by Queen Isabel, his Mother, for her own Ends, although a better could never have been made upon Deliberation for King Edward's Ends. For though her Parentage was not great, and her Portion less, yet she made Amends for both in Virtue; for never King had a better Wife. By her King Edward had seven Sons, and five Daughters. His eldest Son Edward, Prince of Wales, and commonly called the Black Prince (but why so called uncertain; for to say of his dreadful Acts, as Speed saith, hath little Probability: And indeed Froissard, who hath written the Reign of K. Edward the Third more particularly than any other, and lived in his Time, never calls Prince Edward the Black Prince, nor any where makes Mention that he was so called) was born at Woodstock, in the third Year of his Father's Reign. He married Joan, the Daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, Brother by the Father's Side to K. Edward the Second. She had been twice married before; first to the valiant Earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced; next to the Lord Thomas Holland; after whose Decease, this Prince passionately loving her, married her. By her he had Issue two Sons, Edward the eldest, born at Angoulesme, who died at seven Years of Age, and Richard born at Bordeaux, who after his Father was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather, King of England. This Prince had also natural Issue Sir John Soud-er, and Roger Clarendon, Knights; the latter being attainted in the Reign of King Henry the Fourth, is thought to have been Ancestor to the House of Smiths in Essex. He died at Canterbury, in the six and fortieth Year of his Age, and of his Father's Reign the nine and fortieth, and was buried at Christ's Church there. His second Son William was born at Hatfield in Hertfordshire,

The Family of Smiths in Essex, from whom descended.

A.D. 1376 shire, who deceased in his Childhood, and was buried at York. His third Son Lionel was born at Antwerp, in the twelfth Year of his Father's Reign. He married first Elizabeth the Daughter and Heir of William Burgh, Earl of Ulster in Ireland, in whose Right he was first created Earl of Ulster; and because he had with her the Honour of Clare, in the County of Thomond, he was in a Parliament created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Country about the Town and Honour of Clare: From which Duchy, the Name

The King of Arms, why called Clarencieux. of Clarencieux (being the Title of the King of Arms for the South-parts of England) is derived. This Duke had Issue by her one only Daughter, named Philippa, afterward Wife of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Mother of Earl Roger, Father of Anne Countess of Cambridge, the Mother of Richard Duke of York, Father of K. Edward the Fourth. The second Marriage of this Duke was at Milan in Lombardy, with the Lady Violante, Daughter of Galeacio, the second Duke thereof; but through Intemperance he lived not long after. King Edward's fourth Son, named John, was born at Gaunt, in the fourteenth Year of his Father's Reign. He had three Wives; the first was Blanch, Daughter and Co-heir, and in the End, the sole Heir of Henry Duke of Lancaster, Son of Edmund, surnamed Crouch-back; by whom he had Issue Henry of Bolingbroke, Earl of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the Fourth, who first placed the Crown in the House of Lancaster. By her also John of Gaunt had two Daughters, Philippa, Wife of John the First, King of Portugal, and Elizabeth, married first to John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, and after him to Sir John Cornwall, Baron of Fanbope. John of Gaunt's second Wife was Constance, the eldest Daughter of Peter, King of Castile and Leon; in whose Right for the Time he entitled himself King of both those Realms. By her he had Issue one only Daughter, named Katherine, married to Henry, the third Son of King John, in Possession before, and in her Right after King of both the said Realms. John of Gaunt's third Wife was Katherine, the Widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest Daughter and Co-heir of Pane-Roet, a Gascoin, called Guien, King of Arms for that Country; his younger Daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had Issue born before Matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament in the twentieth Year of King Richard the Second, John Earl of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Exeter, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, and Joan (who was first married to Robert Ferrers, Baron of Wemme and Ousley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwick) and secondly, to Ralph Nevill, the first Earl of Westmoreland. She and all her Brethren were

The Name of Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France, where they were all born, and in regard thereof, bare the Portcullis of a Castle for the Cognizance of their Family. This Duke in the thirteenth Year of his Nephew K. Richard, was created Duke of Aquitain, but in the sixteenth Year he was called home, and this Title recalled; and the third Year after, in the sixtieth of his Age, he died at Ely-house in Holbourn, and lieth honourably entombed in A.D. 1376 the Quire of Saint Paul. King Edward's fifth Son Edmund, surnamed of Langley, was first in the Year 1362 created Earl of Cambridge; and afterwards in the Year 1386 made Duke of York. He married Isabel, Daughter and Co-heir to Peter King of Castile and Leon: His Son Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, took to Wife Ann Mortimer, Heir of the foresaid Lionel, elder Brother to Edmund of Langley. K. Edward's sixth Son William, surnamed of Windsor, where he was born, died young, and is buried at Westminster. King Edward's youngest Son Thomas, surnamed of Woodstock, where he was born, was first Earl of Buckingham, and after made Duke of Gloucester by his Nephew King Richard the Second. He was a Man of Valour and Wisdom; but the King surmising him to be too severe an Observer of his Doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, how to make him away: Whom Mowbray unawares surprising, conveyed secretly to Calais, where he was strangled the twentieth Year of K. Richard's Reign. He had Issue one Son, Humphrey Earl of Buckingham, who died at Chester of the Pestilence, in the Year 1400, and two Daughters, Ann, married first to Edmund Earl of Stafford, by whom she had Humphrey Duke of Buckingham; secondly to William Bourchier Earl of Ewe, by whom she had Henry Earl of Essex; and Joan, married to Gilbert Lord Talbot, and had Issue by him a Daughter, who died young. Of King Edward's Daughters, the eldest, named Isabel, was married at Windsor to Ingelram of Guysnes, Lord of Coucy, Earl of Soissons, and after Archduke of Austria; created also by King Edward Earl of Bedford; by whom she was Mother of two Daughters, Mary married to Henry Duke of Barre, and Philip married to Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marquess of Dublin. This Robert, in the Height of his Fortunes, forsook his Lady Philip, and married one Lancerona, a Joiner's Daughter (as was said) which came with King Richard the Second's Wife out of Bohemia: And being for abusing the King's Ear, driven out of the Land by the Lords, he died at Lovain, in extream Poverty in the Year 1392. Isabel, his Wife's Mother, was buried in the Church of Friers Minors, near Aldgate in London. King Edward's second Daughter Joan was married by Proxy to Alphonfus, King of Castile and Leon; but passing into Spain, died by the Way, and King Alphonfus met her, instead of consummating his Espousal, to solemnize her Funeral. His third Daughter Blanch died young. His fourth, named Mary, was married to John Mountford, Duke of Britain. His youngest, named Margaret, born in Calais, was the first Wife of John de Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, but died without Issue.

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was of Stature indifferent tall, of sparkling Eyes, of a comely and manly Countenance, in his latter Time somewhat bald; and concerning his Conditions, no Man was more gentle, where there was Submission; where Opposition, no Man more stern. He was a Prince no less of his Passions, than of his People; for he was never so loving as to be fond, nor ever so

A.D. 1376 so angry as to be inexorable: But this must be understood of the Time when he was a Man; for in his old Age, when he came to be a Child again, he was a Prince of neither. He was no less fortunate than valiant, and his Fortunate-ness was the greater by a kind of Antiperistasis, as coming between two unfortunate Princes; Successor to one, and Predecessor to another. He was of so warlike a Disposition, that his very Sports were warlike; for no Delights were so frequent with him as Jufts and Tournaments. To shew his Devotion, one Example may be sufficient; for when neither Cardinals nor Counsellors could move him to make Peace with France, a Tempest from Heaven did it: To which may be added, that he never won great Battel, of which he won many, but he presently gave the Glory of it to God by publick Thanksgiving. He out-lived the best Wife, and the best Son that ever King had; and to say the Truth, he out-lived the best of himself, for his latter Years were not answerable to his former.

Of his Death and Burial.

King Edward, besides his being old, and worn with the Labours of War, had other Causes that hastned his End; his Grief for the Loss of so worthy a Son, dead but ten Months before; his Grief for the Loss of all Benefit of his Conquests in France, of all which he had little now left but only Calais. And oppressed thus in Body and Mind, he was drawing his last Breath, when his Concubine Alice Pierce packing away what she could catch, even to the Rings of his Fingers, left him; and by her Example, other of his Attendants seizing on what they could come by, shift away; and all his Counsellors and others forsook him, when he most needed them, leaving his Chamber quite empty: Which a poor Priest in his House seeing, he approaches to the King's Bed-side, and finding him yet breathing, calls upon him to remember his Saviour, and to ask Mercy for his Offences; which none about him before would do. But now moved by the Voice of this Priest, he shews all Signs of Contrition, and at last Breath he expresseth the Name of Jesus. Thus died this victorious King, at his Mannor of Sheene (now Richmond) the 21st Day of June, in the Year 1377, in the 64th Year of his Age, having reigned 50 Years, 4 Months, and odd Days. His Body was conveyed from Sheene by his four Sons, and other Lords, and solemnly interred within Westminster Church, where he hath his Monument; and where it is said the Sword he used in Battel is yet to be seen, being 8 Pounds in Weight, and 7 Foot in Length.

Men of Note in his Time.

Martial-men were never more plentiful than in this King's Reign: Whether it were that the Stars have an Influence to procure such Men at one Time more than another, or whether it were that Regis ad exemplum, the King's Example made his Subjects like himself: Or lastly, that his continual Exercise of Arms put them as it were into a Mould of Fortitude. The first of this Kind is worthily Edward the Black Prince, and so worthily the first, that Longe erit a primo quisque secundus erit. Next him

Henry Earl of Lancaster, the Prince's Right-hand in all his great Achievements; then William, the valiant Earl of Salisbury; then John Eure, Ancestor to the Lord Eure that now liveth; then follow the Lord John Chandois, Sir James Audelay, Sir Walter de Manny, Sir Robert Knolls; then Sir John Hawkwood, born in Essex, who, tho' not much honoured at home, having been a Taylor, yet in foreign Parts, and especially in Italy, so famous, that his Statue was erected in publick for a Monument to testify his Valour to Posterity. And here must not be forgotten Robert Venile, Knight, a Norfolk Man, who, when the Scots and English were ready to give Battel, a certain stout Champion of great Stature, commonly called Turnbull, coming out of the Scots Army, and challenging any English-man to meet him in a single Combat, this Robert Venile accepteth the Challenge, and marching towards the Champion, and meeting by the Way a certain black mastiff Dog, which waited on the Champion, he suddenly, with his Sword cut him off at the Loins; and afterwards did more to the Champion himself, cutting his Head from off his Shoulders. And as there was this great Plenty of Martial-men, so there was no less Plenty of learned Men; John Baconthorpe, born in Norfolk, a Carmelite-Frier, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Divinity; Nicholas Trivet, born also in Norfolk, a Black Frier, who wrote two Histories, and a Book of Annals; Richard Stradley, born in the Marches of Wales, a Monk and a Divine, who wrote divers excellent Treatises of the Scriptures; William Herbert, a Welch-man, and a Frier-Minor, who wrote many good Treatises in Divinity; Tho. Wallies, a Dominican Frier, and a Writer of many excellent Books; John Eversden, a Monk, of Bury in Suffolk, an Historiographer; Walter Burley, a Doctor of Divinity, brought up in Merton College in Oxford, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Natural and Moral Philosophy, which remain in Estimation to this Day, and who, for the great Fame of his Learning, had the Honour to be one of the great Instructors of Edward the Black Prince; Roger of Chester, a Monk of that City, and an Historiographer; John Burgh, a Monk, who wrote a History, and also divers Homilies; Richard, surnamed from the Place of his Birth, de Bury (Son of Sir Richard Aungervil) Bishop of Durham, Lord Chancellor, and Lord Treasurer of England; Walter Hemingford, an Historiographer; Richard Chichester, a Monk of Westminster, who wrote an excellent Chronicle from the Year 449, to the Year 1348; Richard Rolle, alias Hampole, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity; Robert Holcot, a Black Frier, born in Northampton, a learned Schoolman, and wrote many Books in Arguments of Divinity; Thomas Bradwardin, born near Chichester in Suffex, Archbishop of Canterbury, and who wrote against the Pelagians, and, for his Depth of Learning, had the Title of Doctor Profundus; Richard Fitz-Ralph, Arch-bishop of Armagh in Ireland, a learned Writer; William Gryfant, named Anglicus, a notable Physician, whose Son came to be Pope, and was called Urbane the Fifth; John Killingworth, an excellent Philosopher, Astronomer, and Physician;

the Second
crowned.

Claims of Office at his Coronation.

RICHARD called of Bourdeaux, because born there, the only Son of Edward the Black Prince, was by his Grandfather in his Life-time declared to be his Heir and lawful Successor; and accordingly after his Death was crowned King of England at Westminster, the sixteenth Day of July, in the Year 1377, by Simon Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury. And for the more Solemnity of his Coronation, he then made nine Knights, and created four Earls; Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward the Third's youngest Son, was created Earl of Buckingham and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, younger Brother of John Lord Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham; Gifford Angoulesme, a Gascon, was made Earl of Huntingdon; and Henry Percy, Son of Henry Lord Percy, was created Earl of Northumberland. At the Time of the Coronation, the Duke of Lancaster, by the Name of John King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, put in his Claim as Earl of Leicester, to have the Place of Earl-Marshal of England; as Duke of Lancaster, to carry the Sword called Curtana; as Earl of Lincoln, to be Carver that Day: All which to be executed by himself, or by his sufficient Deputy; which, with the Fees thereunto belonging, were confirmed unto him. As likewise, divers others made their Claims: Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, to have the Office of Chamberlain, and to pour out Water for the King to wash: John Wiltshire, Citizen of London, by Reason of a Moiety of the Mannor of Heydon, holden in Sergeantry, claimed to hold a Towel for the King to wipe with when he went to Meat; Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, to bear the third Sword before the King; and also to exercise the Office of Pantler: Sir John Argentine, by Reason of his Mannor of Wimondey in the County of Hertford, to serve the King at his Cup: William Lord Furnival for his Mannor of Farnham, to support the King's right Arm when he held the Royal Sceptre; Anne, late Wife of John de Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, for his Mannor of Asbele in Norfolk, to have the Office of Naperer; which she was admitted to do by her Deputy, Sir Thomas Blunt; Richard Earl of Arundel, for his Mannor of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chief Butler; the Lord Mayor of London, to attend in his own Person as chief Cup-waiter; Sir John Dimmock for his Mannor of Strivelsby, and Sir Baldwin Freville, for his Castle of Tamworth, in the County of Warwick, contended for the Office of being the King's Champion, but adjudged to Dimmock; William de Latimer, and John, the Son and Heir of John Mowbray of Axholme, jointly petitioned to have the Office of Almoner, but adjudged to Latimer; Richard Lion, as Tenant of the Mannor of L. held by the Service of making Wafers for the King at his Coronation, was thereunto admitted; the Barons of the Cinque-Ports were admitted to bear the King's Canopy, upon four Staves of Silver, over the King's Head; and also to sit at Meat in the Hall, at the highest Table on the King's Right-hand; John Fitz-John, by Reason of his Mannor of S. in Norfolk, was admitted to be chief Larderer: Richard Herring for the Mannor of C. in the County of Surrey, claimed to be Usher of the King's Chamber; but because that Claim did no way concern the Coronation, he was left to pursue his Right some other Time. The Coronation it self was performed with great Solemnity: After a Sermon, the King took his Oath; and then the Archbishop blessed the King; which done, he tore off his Garments, and stripped him into his Shift; then he anointed his Hands, Head, Breast, Shoulders, and the Joints of his Arms, with the sacred Oil; and, after certain Prayers, he then clad him first with the Coat of St. Edward, and after with his Mantle: After which the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, saying, Accipe Gladium; with which two Earls girded him: Then he gave him Bracelets, saying, Accipe Armillas. After this he put upon him an upper Vesture, called a Pall, saying, Accipe Pallium. In the mean Time, while the Archbishop blessed the Crown, he to whose Office it pertained, put Spurs on his Heels; after the Crown was blessed, the Archbishop set it on his Head, saying, Coronet te Deus: Then he delivered him a Ring, saying, Accipe Annulum. Immediately herewith came the Lord Furnival, by Virtue of his Office, offering him a red Glove, which the Archbishop blessed, and putting it on his Hand, delivered him a Sceptre, saying, Accipe Sceptrum: And after that, into his other Hand, delivered him a Rod, on the Top whereof stood a Dove, saying, Accipe Virgam Virtutis, and then blessed the King, saying, Benedicat te Deus; which done, the King kissed the Bishops and Abbots, by whom he was afterward led to his Seat; and so ended the Solemnity.

The tender Years of the King, being but eleven Years of Age, required a Protector: But being perhaps thought dangerous to commit that

A.D. 1377 Authority to only one, who might rather seek to get it for himself, than to keep it for another, it was thought fit to commit it to many; and thereupon John Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Uncles, with some other Lords and Bishops, were joined in Commission to manage the State: And Guichard de Angoulesme appointed to be his Schoolmaster. And now the King's Minority made foreign Princes conceive, that this would be a Time of Advantage for any that had Quarrel to England, which the French and Scots took presently hold of. For the French came now, and burnt the Town of Rye; and soon after, entering the Isle of Wight, burnt divers Towns there; and tho' they were repelled from the Castle by the valiant Sir Hugh Tyrrel Captain there, yet they constrained the Men of the Isle to give them a thousand Marks to spare the Residue of their Houses and Goods: And departing thence, they set on Land where they saw Advantage, burning sundry Towns near to the Shore, as Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plimouth, and then sailing towards Dover, they burnt Hastings, assaulted Winchelsey: But being valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battel, were forced to retire. After this, they landed not far from the Abby of Lewis, at a Place called Rottington; where the Prior of Lewis, with Sir Thomas Cheyney, and Sir John Fallesly, encountering them, were overthrown and taken Prisoners. And no less than the French were the Scots also now busy; for coming one Morning by Stealth, they won the Castle of Berwick: But shortly after, upon Knowledge thereof had, they were driven out again by the Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham; and all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramsay their Captain, put to the Sword. About Michaelmas a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein Alice Pierce, the late King's Concubine, was banished the Realm, and all her Goods confiscated, and two Tenths of the Clergy, and two Fifteenths of the Temporalty were granted: But so, as that two Citizens of London, William Walworth, and John Philpot, should receive and keep it, to see it bestowed for Defence of the Realm. In his Time, Sir Hugh Calverley, Deputy of Calais, burnt six and twenty French Ships in the Haven of Bologne. And at the same Time a great Navy set out, under the Guiding of the Earl of Buckingham, the Duke of Britain, the Lord Latimer, Sir Robert Knolls, and others, with a Purpose to intercept the Spanish Fleet, but through Tempest was twice driven back: When in the mean Time, one Mercer, a Scottish Pirate, came to Scarborough, took there divers Ships, and committed many Outrages: And no Order being taken to repel him, a Citizen of London, named John Philpot, at his own Charges set forth a Fleet, and in his own Person encountering them, took the said Mercer, and all his Ships: And returning home, instead of being rewarded for his Service, he was called in Question for presuming to raise a Navy without Advice of the King's Council. But he gave such Reasons for that he had done, that not only he came off then with Credit, but lives in Reputation for it to this Day. Indeed Reasons of State, tho' they may be secretly censured, yet they must not openly be controlled; for this were to bring Authority into Contempt, and instead of Errors to bring in Confusion: But yet when Wrongs be offered that are Publick, every particular Person seems to have an Interest in taking Revenge; and though it may be no Manners not to stay the State's Leisure, yet it can be no Offence to do their Work for them.

Many Actions passed at this Time with the French and Scots, some prosperous, and some adverse. The Scots burn Roxborough, this was adverse; but the Earl of Northumberland entering Scotland with ten thousand Men, spoileth the Lands of the Earl of March, the chief Incendiary; this was prosperous: But when the Northern Men would needs make a Road into Scotland, and were encountered by the Scots, and put to Flight, this was adverse. Anon, after Midsummer, the Duke of Lancaster, with the Earls of Buckingham, Warwick, Stafford, and others of the Nobility, with a strong Power took the Sea, and landing in Britain, besieged the Town of St. Malo, but finding strong Opposition, is forced to raise the Siege, and return home: This was adverse. And now again, the Scots by Night entered secretly into the Castle of Berwick, and slew Sir Robert Baynton that was Constable there: This also was adverse. But when the Earl of Northumberland being advertised thereof, came with a Power, assaulted the Castle, and after two Days Defence recovered it again, this was prosperous. William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, the King's Lieutenant in Calais, forageth the Country round about, and furnisheth Calais with Booties of French Cattel. Sir Hugh Calverley, and Sir Thomas Piercy made Admirals, put to Sea, and take divers Ships laden with Merchandise, and one Ship of War; Sir John Hurleston, Captain of Cherbourg in France, issuing forth, assaults a Fortress of the French, which was the Store-house of their Provision, and with much Valour takes it: These were prosperous. But when Sir John Clark lying in Garrison in a Castle in Britain, where lay many English Ships in the Haven, had these Ships set upon by the French; where though he shewed incredible Valour in the Action, yet the Ships were taken; and himself slain: This was adverse. Also in the third Year of this King's Reign, Sir John Arundel, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Thomas Banister, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Banister, and many other Knights went to Sea, with a Purpose to pass over into Britain: But were so beaten back with Tempest, that divers of their Ships were cast away; and Sir John Arundel, Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Nicholas Trumpington, Sir Thomas Dale, and above a Thousand others were all drowned; only Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Elmham, and certain others escaped. It may not be impertinent to note here the Sumptuousness of those Times; for this Sir John Arundel was then said in his Furniture to have two and fifty new Suits of Apparel of Cloth of Gold and Tissue all lost at Sea.

This Year also, there being found Inconvenience in having many Governors of the King and Kingdom; it was by Parliament decreed, That the Lord Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, should

The Earl of Warwick appointed Protector.

A.D. 1380 should himself alone hold the Place of Protector. About this Time Sir John Annesley Knight accused Thomas Katrington Esq; for betraying the Fortrefs of S. Saviour to the French: Which Katrington denying, at the Suit of Annesley, a solemn Combat is permitted to be between them; at which Combat the King and all the great Lords were present. The Esquire Katrington was a Man of a mighty Stature, the Knight, Annesley, a little Man; yet through the Justness of his Cause, after a long Fight, the Knight prevailed, and Katrington the Day after the Combat died. Fabian saith, he was drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged for his false Accusation. In the Beginning of the fourth Year of this King, Thomas of Woodstock, Earl of Buckingham, the Kings Uncle, with divers Earls and Lords, and an Army of seven or eight thousand, was sent into France, to aid the Duke of Britain; but the King of France at that Time dying, the Duke of Britain grew to have Peace with the new King; whereupon the Earl of Buckingham came home again without doing much, but making of Knights, and foraging the Country. In this Time the French and Spanish Gallies did much Mischief on the Coast of England: They burnt Rye, Hastings, and Portsmouth; and at last entring the River of Thames, they came up to Gravesend, where they burnt most Part of the Town, and taking many Prisoners and Booties, returned into France.

The French burn divers Towns in England.

An Insurrection in Kent, and the Cause.

At this Time also, there fell out an Accident of great Disturbance to the Realm; for the Commons rose in divers Parts, beginning at Deptford in Kent: And the Cause of their Rising grew (as was thought) through the rude Behaviour of a Collector of the Poll-money, who coming into the House of one John Tyler, and demanding Poll-money of his Wife for a Daughter of hers; and she saying, that her Daughter was not of Age to pay, the rude Fellow said he would presently see whether that were so or no, and thereupon forcibly turned up her Cloaths; whereat the Mother making an Outcry, her Husband being at Work hard by, and hearing the Noise, came in with his Lathing-staff in his Hand, with which he gave the Collector such a Blow on the Head, that his Brains flew out, and he presently died. Upon this, at the Complaint of Tyler amongst his Neighbours, and withal a factious Clergy-man, one John Ball, taking Occasion hereat to rip up the Ground of this Misgovernment, and telling the People that this Difference of Mens Estates, where some are Potentates, and some are Bondmen, was against Christian Liberty, taking for his Theme,

When Adam delv'd, and Eve span,
Who was then a Gentleman?

He so incensed them that the Commons in divers Parts drew together; and whether beginning in Kent, or otherwise in Essex, they drew at last into their Faction the Commons of Sussex, Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and other Shires; and arresting all such as passed, made them swear to be true to King Richard, and to the Commons, and never to receive any King that should be called John; which they did for the Envy they bore to John Duke of Lancaster. Thus their Number still encreased, that by that time they were come so far as Black-beath, they were esteemed to be a hundred thousand. The first thing they did when they came to London, was to send for one Richard Lion, a grave Citizen, who had been Tyler's Master, and his Head they struck off, and carried it upon a Pole in Triumph before them. The next day they came to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaster's House; which they set on Fire, burning all his rich Furniture, breaking in pieces all his Plate and Jewels; and throwing them into the Thames, saying, they were Men of Justice, and would not, like Robbers, enrich themselves with any Man's Goods; and when one of their Fellows was espied to thrust a fair Silver Piece into his Bosom, they took him, and cast both him and the Piece into the Fire. Two and thirty of them were got into the Duke's Wine-Cellar, where they staid drinking so long, till the Rafter of the House on Fire fell upon them, and so covered them, that not able to get out, they were heard cry seven Days after, and then perished. From the Savoy they went to the Temple, where they burnt the Lawyers Lodgings, with their Books and Writings, and all they could lay Hands on. Also the House of St. John's by Smithfield they set on Fire, so that it burnt for the Space of seven Days together. After this they came to the Tower, where the King was then lodged; and though he had at that Time six hundred armed Men, and as many Archers about him, yet he durst not but suffer them to enter; where they abused the King's Mother, offering to kiss her, in such rude Manner, that she fell into a Swoon: And finding in the Place Simon Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales also Lord Treasurer, they led them to the Tower-hill, and there in most cruel Manner struck off their Heads, as also of divers others. Neither spared they sacred Places: For breaking into the Church of the Augustine Friars, they drew forth thirteen Flemmings, and beheaded them in the open Streets; as also seventeen others out of other Churches. Yet after all these Outrages, the King proclaimed Pardon to all such as would lay down Arms, and go quietly home; which the Essex Men did, but the Kentish Men continued still with their Captain Wat Tyler: To whom when the King sent Sir John Newton to understand what his Meaning was, Wat Tyler, offended because he came on Horseback, told him it became him to light from his Horse in his Presence; and therewith drew out his Dagger to strike him: The King perceiving his Knight to be in Danger, bade him alight from his Horse; but when this would not pacify him, the Mayor of London, William Walworth, by the King's Appointment, rode to him, and arrested him, and gave him such a Blow on the Head, that he astonished him; and then other of the King's Servants drew their Swords, and thrust him through in divers Parts of his Body, so as he died there in the Place. When the Commons saw this, they cried out, Our Captain is slain, let us revenge it. Here the King, though very young, not above fifteen Years of Age, yet had the Courage to ride unto them, telling them, that now their Leader was dead,

William Walworth Lord Mayor kills him.

A.D. 1380 dead, he would be their Leader himself; and if they would follow him into the Fields, they should have whatsoever they desired. In the mean time the Lord Mayor Walworth had gone into the City, and raised a Thousand armed Men, and meeting Sir Robert Knolls by chance, got him to be their Leader; who coming into the Fields where the Rebels were, so daunted them, that throwing down their Weapons, they cried for Mercy: That it was a wonderful Thing to see how suddenly Fear overtook Presumption; for scarce their Words of Insolency were out of their Mouths, when they fell to Words of most servile Submission: And as strange an Alteration in those about the King, to see how suddenly Boldness surprised Fear; for scarce they left trembling at the Sight of the Rebels, when suddenly, upon Sight of this Aid, their Fingers itched to be setting upon them, but that the King would not suffer it, because some amongst them were there by Compulsion; and to set upon them thus mingled, might as well be the Death of the innocent as of the guilty. But to pacify them the more, the King caused his Charter of Manumission to be sent unto them; which yet stayed them not from committing Outrages at St. Alban's, and cancelling the antient Charters of the Abbots and Monks there. Besides, the Sedition was more general, than that the appeasing it in one Place could be final; for at the same Time there were gathered together in Suffolk to the Number of fifty thousand, by the setting on of one John Wraw, a lewd Priest: And these fell to destroying the Houses of Lawyers especially; and Sir John Cavendish, Lord Chief Justice of England, they beheaded, and set his Head upon the Pillory in St. Edmundsbury. The like Commotion of the Commons was at the same Time also in Cambridgeshire, in the Isle of Ely, and in Norfolk, under the guiding of one John Littester a Dyer: And to countenance their Proceeding the more, they had a Purpose to have brought William Ufford, Earl of Suffolk, into their Fellowship; but he, advertised of their Intention, suddenly rose from Supper, and got him away: But many other Lords and Knights they compelled to be sworn to them, and to ride with them, as the Lord Scales, the Lord Morley, Sir John Brewis, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert Salle, who not enduring their Insolencies, had his Brains dash'd out by a Country Clown who was his Bondman. The rest terrified by this Example, were glad to carry themselves submissively to their Chieftain, John Littester, who named himself King of the Commons, and counted Preferment for any to serve him at his Table, in taking the Essay of his Meats and Drinks, with kneeling humbly before him as he sat at Meat. And now these Fellows, upon a Consultation, send two choice Men, namely, the Lord Morley, and Sir John Brewis, with three of their chief Commons to the King, for their Charter of Manumission and Enfranchising: Who being on their Way at Ichingham, not far from Newmarket, they met with Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich; and he examining them if there were any of the Rebels in their Company, and hearing that three of the chief were there present, he presently caused their Heads to be struck off; and then pursuing on towards Northwalsham in Norfolk, where the Commons stayed for an Answer from the King; by that time he came thither, where he had at first but eight Launces, and a small Number of Archers in his Company, his Number was so encreased, that it came to be a compleat Army; with which he set upon the Rebels, discomfited them, and took John Littester and their other Chieftains, whom he caused all to be executed: And by this Means the Country was quieted. After this the Mayor of London sat in Judgment upon Offenders, where many were found culpable, and lost their Heads; amongst others, Jack Straw, John Kerby, Alane Tredder, and John Sterling, who gloried that he was the Man that had slain the Archbishop. Also Sir Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, was appointed to sit in Judgment against the Offenders; before whom above fifteen hundred were found guilty, and in sundry Places put to Death. Amongst others John Ball Priest, their Incendiary: Of whom it is not impertinent to relate a Letter he wrote to the Rebel-rabble of Essex; by which we may see how fit an Orator he was for such an Auditory, and what Strength of Perswasion there was in Nonsense.

John Sheep St. Mary Priest of York, and now John Ball's of Colchester, greeteth well John Nameless, and John the Miller, and John Carter, and biddeth them that they beware of Guile in Borough, and stand together in God's Name; and biddeth Piers Plowman go to his Work and chastise well Hob the Robber, and take with you John Trewman, and all his Fellows, and no moe. John the Miller ye ground small, small, small; the King's Son of Heaven shall pay for all. Beware or ye be woe: Know your Friend from your Foe: Have enough and say ho; and do well and better: Flee Sin, and seek Peace, and hold you therein: And so biddeth John Trewman and all his Fellows.

Neither is it impertinent to declare the Confession of Jack Straw at his Execution. "When we were assembled (said he) upon Black-beath, and had sent to the King to come to us, our Purpose was to have slain all Knights and Gentlemen that should be about him: And as for the King, we would have kept him amongst us, to the End the People might more boldly have repaired to us, and when we had gotten Power enough, we would have slain all Noblemen, and specially the Knights of Rhodes; and lastly, we would have killed the King, and all Men of Possessions, with Bishops, Monks, Parsons of Churches, only Friars Mendicants we would have spared for Administration of the Sacraments. Then we would have devised Laws according to which the People should have lived; for we would have created Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and others in other Countries: And the same Evening that Wat Tyler was killed we were determined to set Fire in four Corners of the City, and to have divided the Spoil amongst us: And this was our Purpose, as God may help me now at my last End." For his Service done in this seditious Business, the King knighted the Mayor Will. Walworth, and gave him a hundred Pounds a Year in Fee. Also he knighted five Aldermen his Brethren, girding them about the Waist with the Girdle of Knighthood, which

A.D. 1380 was the Manner of graduating in those Days :

The Manner of Knighting at this Time. But as Stow saith, the Manner of Knighting was rather thus; to cause him to put a Basenet on his Head, and then the King with a Sword in both his Hands, to strike him strongly on the Neck. And to do the City itself Honour, the King at this time granted there should be a Dagger added to the Arms of the City; for till this Time the City bore only the Cross without the Dagger.

And now all Parts being quiet, the King by Proclamation revoked and made void his former Charters of enfranchising the Bondmen of the Realm, and that they should stand in the same Condition they were before. In the Time of this Sedition, the Duke of Lancaster had been sent into Scotland, to keep the Scots quiet; who so carried the Matter, that before the Scots heard of the Sedition, a Truce was concluded for two or three Years. But the Duke coming back to Berwick, was denied by the Captain, Sir Matthew Redman, to enter the Town, because of a Commandment given him by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the Marches, not to suffer any Person to enter the same; which the King indeed had appointed to be done, forgetting the Duke of Lancaster that was then in Scotland: But howsoever, this bred such Terror of the People; but the King wisely taking the Matter into his own Hands, made them Friends. At which the Lady Anne, Sister to the Emperor Wenceslaus, and affianced Wife to the King, was come to Calais; whereupon the Parliament was prorogued. The Lady was brought to London, joined in Marriage to the King, and crowned Queen at Westminster by the Archbishop of Canterbury with great Solemnity. After the Marriage, the Parliament began again; in which William Ufford, Earl of Suffolk, being chosen by the Knights of the Shires to deliver, in Behalf of the Commonwealth, certain Matters concerning the same; the very Day and Hour in which he should have done the Business, as he went up Stairs towards the upper House, he suddenly fell down and died, having being merry and well before, to all Mens Judgments. About this Time the Lord Scroop was deposed from the Chancellorship, for refusing to seal some Grants which the King had made; and the King receiving the Great Seal at his Hands, kept it a certain Time, and sealed with it such Grants and Writings as he pleased, till at length it was delivered to Robert Braibroke, Bishop of London, who was made Lord Chancellor.

Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich, had lately with the King's Leave, raised an Army, and was gone into France in Behalf of Pope Urban against the Anti-pope Clement; and entering first into Flanders, he took and sacked many Towns; at last besieged Ypres, till by an Army of French (greater than was thought could have been raised in France) he was forced to raise his Siege; and then passing divers Places, he came to Graveling, from whence he writ to K. Richard, that if he ever meant to try Battel with the French, now was the Time. The King was at that Time at Daintry in Northamptonshire; and being at Supper when the Word was brought him, he instantly rose from the Table, got on Horseback and rode in Post with such Speed, that he came to St. Alban's about Midnight, where making no Stay, but while he borrowed the Abbot's Gelding, he hastened forth till he came to Westminster, as tho' he had meant never to rest till he had given Battel to the French-men. But after he had taken a Counsel of his Pillow, his Mind was altered, and he thought it better to employ some other, than to go himself; so the Duke of Lancaster is thought the fittest Man: But he protracted the Time so long in making Preparation, that before he could be gone, the Bishop was come away. And this indeed is the Condition of many, to spend so much Time in preparing, that they utterly lose all Opportunity of acting; like to Men that are putting on their Cloaths so long, till it be Time to put them off again. Shortly after a Truce was concluded between England and France, to endure till the Feast of St. Michael, which should be in the Year 1384.

Of his Acts done after he came of Age.

THE Scots in this mean time had made Roads into England, and taken and burnt divers Towns upon the Borders; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster, with his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, is sent with a mighty Army to repress them: But having entered Scotland, and not able to draw the Scots to a Battel, they only burnt certain Towns, and then returned.

About this Time an Irish Frier, of the Order of the Carmelites, charged the Duke of Lancaster with heinous Crimes; as that he intended to destroy the King, and usurp the Crown; shewing the Time, the Place, and other Circumstances of the whole Plot. But the Duke called to his Answer, so cleared himself, at least gave such Colours of clearing, that the Accuser was committed to the Custody of John Holland the King's half Brother, till a Day appointed for further Trial. The Night before which Day, the said Lord Holland and Sir Henry Green are said to have come to this Frier, and putting a Cord about his Neck, tied the other End about his Privy-members; and after hanging him up from the Ground, laid a Stone upon his Belly, with the Weight whereof his very Back-bone burst asunder; thereby putting him to a most tormenting Death. An Act not more inhuman than unadvised; for though it took away the Accuser, yet made the Accusation more suspicious.

At this Time, tho' a Truce had been made with the Scots, yet they would not be quiet, but entered and won the Castle of Berwick, whereof the Earl of Northumberland was Captain, but had committed the keeping of it to another: For which being blamed, he went not against them with an Army, but took an easier Course; for with the Sum of two thousand Marks he bought them out, and had the Castle surrendered into his Hands again. The King upon some new

A.D. 1385 new Displeasure, being now incensed against the Duke of Lancaster, had a Purpose to have him arrested and arraigned of certain Points of Treason, before Sir Robert Tresilian Chief Justice, tho' he ought to be tried by his Peers: But the Duke having Intimation hereof, got him to his Castle of Pomfret, and stood upon his Guard, till the King's Mother (notwithstanding her Indisposition of Body, by reason of her Corpulency) riding to and fro between them, pacified the King, and made them Friends.

In the ninth Year of K. Richard's Reign, the French King sent the Admiral of France into Scotland, with a thousand Men of Arms, besides Cross-bows and others, to aid the Scots against the English; with which Aid the Scots encouraged, enter the English Borders. Whereof K. Richard advertised, himself with a mighty Army enters Scotland, and coming to Edinburgh, and finding all the People fled, he set Fire on the Houses, burnt the Church of St. Giles, only Holy-rood-house was spared at the Duke of Lancaster's Suit, in Remembrance of the Friendship he had formerly received in that House. The Scots by no means could be drawn to any Battel; but to divert the King's Army, they entered Cumberland, and besieged Carlisle, where, by the Valour of Sir Lewis Clifford, and Sir Thomas Musgrave, they were repelled: And hearing of the King's Army coming towards them, and fearing to be enclosed, they drew back into Scotland, and the King returned into England. But in this mean while, the English of Calais took many Prizes of French Ships at Sea, and many Booties also by Land, at one Time four thousand Sheep, and three hundred Head of great Cattel.

This Year the King called a Parliament at Westminster, where he created two Dukes, one Marquis, and five Earls: Edmund of Langley, Earl of Cambridge, the King's Uncle, was created Duke of York: Thomas of Woodstock, Earl of Buckingham, his other Uncle, Duke of Gloucester: Robert Vere Earl of Oxford, was made Marquis of Dublin: Henry of Bolingbroke, Son of John of Gaunt, was created Earl of Derby: Edward Plantagenet, Son to the Duke of York, was made Earl of Rutland: Michael de la Pool, Chancellor of England, was created Earl of Suffolk: And Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, was made Earl-Marshal. Also by Authority of this Parliament, Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, Son and Heir of Edmund Mortimer and of the Lady Philip, eldest Daughter and Heir to Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son to K. Edward the third, was established Heir apparent to the Crown of the Realm, and shortly after so proclaimed: But going into Ireland to his Lordship of Ulster, was there by the wild Irish slain. This Roger Earl of March had Issue, Edmund, Roger, Anne, Alice, and Eleanor, which Eleanor was made a Nun. The two Sons died without Issue: Anne his eldest Daughter was married to Richard Earl of Cambridge, Son to Edmund of Langley; which Richard had Issue by the said Anne, a Son, called Richard, that was after Duke of York, and Father to K. Edward the fourth: Also a Daughter named Isabel, married to the Lord Bourchier. Also this Year Henry of Bolingbroke, Earl of Derby, married the Daughter and Heir of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, in whose

Right he was afterwards made Duke of Hereford. A.D. 1386

This Year also King Richard holding his Christmas at Eltham, Leo King of Armenia came thither to him, who in Fear to have his Kingdom conquered by the Turks, was come into Christendom to seek for Aid: But his chief Errand into England was to have procured a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; but their Spleens were so great against one another, that 'it was not in the Power of his Physick to cure them.

At this Time the Duke of Lancaster, taking with him his Wife, the Lady Constance, and a Daughter he had by her, named Katharine, and two other Daughters which he had by his former Wife, sailed into Spain. He was attended in his Journey with the Lord Lucy, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Poynings, Bradston, and many other Lords and Knights, to the Number of fifteen hundred Men of Arms; whereof a thousand at least were Knights and Esquires. The King at his taking Leave gave him a Crown of Gold, and commanded he should be called King of Spain: And the Queen likewise gave another Crown of Gold to the Duchefs. He landed first at Brest, and freed that Castle from the French. From thence he sailed, and arrived at the Groin in Spain, where he remained a Month, and then went to Compostella, where he stayed a while: In which Time his Constable Sir John Holland won divers Towns. At Manson, the King of Portugal and the Duke of Lancaster met; where a Marriage was concluded between the said King of Portugal and the Lady Philip, Daughter to the Duke: Which Marriage shortly after was consummated, and the Lady sent into Portugal honourably accompanied. The Duke continued at Compostella all the Winter. At March the King of Portugal and he entered the Confines of Castile, where they took many Towns; and passing over the River of Dure, entered into the Country Delcampo: But the Spaniards not willing to come to a Battel, but meaning to weary them out with Delays, the English not used to such hot Air, fell daily into many Diseases, which the Duke seeing, accorded to a Truce. There died in this Action the Lord Fitz-walter, Sir Richard Burley, a Knight of the Garter; the Lord Poining, and Sir Henry Piercy, Cousin-german to the Earl of Northumberland; also the Lord Talbot; and in all twelve great Lords, four-score Knights, two hundred Esquires, and of the meaner Sort above five hundred. When the Army was broken up, the Duke of Lancaster and the Duchefs his Wife went into Portugal; and after some Stay there, they sailed to Bayonne, in the Marches of Gascony, where he reited a long Time after. In which mean while there were Offers made for a Marriage to be had between the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, and the Lady Katharine, Daughter to the Duke of Lancaster; which the King of Spain understanding, he began to doubt, lest if that Marriage went forward, it might turn to his Disadvantage; and thereupon by earnest Suit, at length concluded a Peace with the Duke of Lancaster, on this wise, that his eldest Son Henry should marry the Lady Katharine, the

It was agreed, that the said Duke should receive Yearly the Sum of ten thousand Marks, during the Lives of him and his Duchefs: And to have in Hand the Sum of two hundred thousand Nobles.

At this Time the French had a Purpose to invade England, with no less a Hope than to make a Conquest; and to that End, they prepared a mighty Navy: So as in the Month of September there were numbered about Sluce, Dam, and Blankerke, 1287 Ships, besides those which were rigged in Britain by the Constable, who had caused an Enclosure of a Field to be made of Timber, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith enclose their Field, and so lodge at more Surety. But it so fortune that the Lord William Beauchamp, Captain of Calais, took two of their Ships, whereof one was laden with a Piece of the said Enclosure; and after that, another Ship laden with Guns, Gunpowder and other Instruments of War; and after that again, two Ships more, laden with Parcels of the said Enclosure, which K. Richard caused to be reared and set up about Winchelsey Town. At last the aforesaid Army came into Flanders, and arrived at Sluce; where after some Stay, they were so distressed for Victuals, that in the End of November they were glad to be gone, and return into France.

At this Time, in Parliament, Robert Vere Earl of Oxford, and Marquis of Dublin, was created Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Pool, a Merchant's Son, had lately been before created Earl of Suffolk, and made Chancellor of England. And now begins King Richard to enter (I may say) upon the Confines of his Destiny. His gracing of undeserving Men, and disgracing of Men deserving, if they were not the Causes, they were at least the Occasions of his own Disgracing, and Destruction in the End. He was now come to full Age to do all himself, which was indeed to be of full Age to undo himself; for the Faults of his younger Years might have the Excuse to be but Errors: But the Faults of the Age he was now at, were peremptory against him, and admitted no Defence. And to hasten the Pace of his Destiny the faster, the ill Counsel which before was but whispered in his Ear, was now scarce forbore to be given him aloud. It is told him, that he is under Tuition no longer, and therefore not to be controuled, as in former Times he had been; that to be cross'd of his Will by his Subjects, was to be their Subject. It is no Sovereignty, if it be not absolute. At the Instigation of which Counsel, the King in a Parliament now assembled, fell to expostulate with the Lords, asking them what Years they thought him to be of? Who answering, that he was somewhat more than one and twenty; well then (said he) I am out of your Wardship, and therefore look to enjoy my Kingdom as freely as your selves at the like Years enjoy your Patrimonies. But his flattering Favourites should have remembered, that tho' the King may not be controuled, where he can command, yet he may be opposed where he can but demand, as now indeed he was: For when he came to demand a Subsidy towards his Wars, he was answered, that he needed no Subsidy from his Subjects, if he would but call in the Debts which the Chancellor owed him: And if he were so tender of him, that he could not find in his Heart to do it himself, they would do that work for him: And thereupon charged him with such Crimes, that all his Goods were confiscated, and himself adjudged to die, if the King so pleased: Tho' some write, his Sentence was only to pay a Fine of twenty thousand Marks, and a thousand Pounds Yearly beside. Upon this Provocation, the opposite Side seek present Revenge. It is devised, that the Duke of Gloucester as Principal, and other Lords that crossed the King's Courses, should be invited to a Supper in London, and there be murdered. In the Execution of which Plot, the former Lord Mayor, Sir Nicholas Brember, had a special Hand: But the present Mayor, Richard Exton, moved to it by the King, would by no Means consent; and thereupon the Plot proceeded not. But for all these harsh Strains, and many such other that passed this Parliament, a Subsidy was at length granted to the King, of half a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth; but with Condition, that it should not be issued, but by Order from the Lords; and the Earl of Arundel was appointed to receive it. But before this Time, both Houses had directly agreed, that unless the Chancellor were removed, they would meddle no further in the Parliament. The King advertised hereof, sent to the Commons that they should send unto Eltham (where he then lay) forty of their House to declare their Minds unto him: But upon Conference of both Houses, it was agreed, that the Duke of Gloucester, and Thomas Arundel, Bishop of Ely, should in the Name of the Parliament go unto him; who coming to the King declared, that by an old Statute the King once a Year might lawfully summon his Court of Parliament, for Reformation of all Corruption and Enormities within the Realm: And further declared, that by an old Ordinance also it was enacted, that if the King should absent himself forty Days, not being sick, the Houses might lawfully break up, and return home. At this, the King is said to say, Well, we perceive our People go about to rise against us; and therefore we think we cannot do better than to ask Aid of our Cousin the King of France, and rather submit us to him than to our own Subjects. To which the Lords answered, they wondered at this Opinion of his Majesty, seeing the French King was the ancient Enemy of the Kingdom, and he might remember what Mischiefs were brought upon the Realm in K. John's Time, by such a Course. By these and the like Perswasions the King was induced to come to the Parliament: And soon after John Fortham, Bishop of Durham, is discharged of his Office of Lord Treasurer, and in his Place was appointed John Gilbert, Bishop of Hereford, a Frier of the Order of Preachers: Also Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, is discharged of his Office of Chancellor, and Thomas Arundel, Bishop of Ely, by Consent of Parliament, placed in his Room. Also by Order of Parliament, thirteen Lords were chosen to govern the Realm.

The Chancellor is censured by the Parliament.

A Plot to murder the Duke of Gloucester and others that opposed the King: But stopped by Richard Exton, Mayor.

The Parliament require to have the Chancellor removed.

If the King absent himself from the Parliament forty Days, it may lawfully break up.

The Lord Treasurer and Lord Chancellor are discharged of their Offices.

Thirteen Lords appointed to govern the Realm.

A.D. 1386 have Oversight under the King, of the whole Government of the Realm: Of which Thirteen there were three of the new Officers named; as the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Lord Treasurer, and Nicholas, Abbot of Waltham, Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal: The other Ten were, William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund of Angely Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scroop, and John Lord Devereux. But this Participation of the Government being found inconvenient, held not long. Also in this Parliament it was granted that Robert de Vere, lately before created Duke of Ireland, should have and receive to his own Use 30,000 Marks, which the French Men were to give for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Blois; but it was granted upon this Condition, That before the next Easter he should pass over into Ireland, to recover such Lands as the King had there given him; so desirous the Lords and Commons were to have him removed from the King's Presence. But tho' the King gave way to this Torrent of the Parliament for the present, yet as soon as the Parliament was dissolved, he dissolved also all that had been done either against the Lord Chancellor, or against the Duke of Ireland, or against Alexander Nevill, Archbishop of York, and received them into more Favour than ever he had done before.

As soon as the Parliament was dissolved, all they had done was presently again undone.

The English Admiral takes 100 Ships, all laden with Rachel Wines.

In his tenth Year, about the Beginning of March, Richard Earl of Arundel, appointed Admiral, and Thomas Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham, the Earl of Devonshire, and the Bishop of Norwich, went to Sea, with a warlike Power of Men and Arms, to watch for the Fleet of Flanders, that was ready to come from Rochel with Wines; and meeting with them, they set upon them, took of them to the Number of a hundred Vessels, all fraught with Wines: So as Wine grew so plentiful, that it was sold for thirteen Shillings four Pence the Tun, and the best and choicest for twenty Shillings. Besides this, they landed in Flanders, where they relieved and fortified Brest, and demolished two Forts which the Enemy had built against it. But this happy Service of the Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Sturrey, who continued still about the King, seemed rather to envy than to commend; inasmuch that when the Earl of Nottingham, that had ever been the Play-fellow, and of equal Age to him, came to the Court, he was neither received by the Duke of Ireland with any good Welcome, nor by the King with any good Countenance; and therefore indeed not by the King with any good Countenance, because not by the Duke of Ireland with any good Welcome.

The Duke of Ireland puts away his lawful Wife, near a-kin to the Duke of Gloucester, and marries a Bohemian Maid.

About this Time the Duke of Ireland sought to be divorced from his lawful Wife, Daughter to the Lady Isabel, one of King Edward the Third's Daughters, and took to Wife one Lancasterona, a Vintner's Daughter of Bohemia, one of the Queen's Maids: At which Indignity the Duke of Gloucester, that was Uncle to the Lady thus forsaken, took great Displeasure; which the Duke of Ireland understanding, studied how by some Means he might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester out of the Way. Easter was now past, the Time appointed for the Duke of Ireland's going over into Ireland; when the King with shew of seeing him to the Water's side, went with him into Wales: And in his Company Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian, Lord Chief Justice, and divers others who there consulted how they might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham, with divers others of that Faction. But when the King had remained in those Parts a good while, he returned, and brought back the Duke of Ireland with him; and so his Voyage into Ireland was clean forgotten. About the same Time, Robert Tresilian, Chief Justice, came to Coventry, where he indicted two thousand Persons. The King and the Queen came to Groby; and thither came by his Commandment the Justices of the Realm, Robert Belknap, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, and William Borough, Knights: To whom it was propounded to answer to these Questions following:

Which the Duke of Gloucester offended at, it is plotted to dispatch him out of the way.

First, Whether the new Statute and Commission made in the last Parliament were against the King's Prerogative, or no? To which they all answered, It was.

Secondly, How they ought to be punished, that procured the said Statute and commission to be made? They answered with one Assent, that they deserved Death, except the King would pardon them.

Questions propounded by the King to the Judges against the Lords: Who all answer as the King would have them.

Thirdly, How they ought to be punished who moved the King to consent to the making of the said Statute and Commission? They answered, they ought to lose their Lives, unless the King would pardon them.

Fourthly, How they ought to be punished, that compelled the King to the making of that Statute? They answered, they ought to suffer as Traitors.

Fifthly, Whether the King might cause the Parliament to proceed upon Articles by him limited, before they proceed to any other? They answered, That in this the King should overrule: And if any presumed to do contrary, he was to be punished as a Traitor.

Sixthly, Whether the King might not at his Pleasure dissolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart? They all answered, He might.

Seventhly, Whether the Lords and Commons might, without the King's Will, impeach Officers and Justices upon their Offences in Parliament, or no? It was answered, They might not; and he that attempted contrary, was to suffer as a Traitor.

Eighthly, How he is to be punished, who moved in the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward the Second was indicted in Parliament, might be sent for; by Inspection of which Statute, the present Statute was devised? It was answered, That as well he that moved it, as he that brought the Statute into the House, were to be punished as Traitors.

Ninthly, Whether the Judgment given in Parliament against Michael de la Pool were erroneous

A.D. 1387 neous and revocable? They answered, It was Erroneous and Revocable: And that if the Judgment were now to be given, the Justices would not give the same.

In witness of the Premises, the Justices aforesaid, to these Presents have set their Seals, in the Presence of Alexander Archbishop of York, Robert Archbishop of Dublin, John Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of Chester, John Bishop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earl of Suffolk, John Ripon Clerk, and John Blake.

No Man to be gotten to fight against the Lords.

The King would have no Burgeffes chosen to the Parliament but such as he should name; but this could not be.

The King seeks to apprehend the Duke of Gloucester, and others.

At this Time the Londoners incurred much Obloquy: For having before been pardoned by the King of some Crimes laid to their Charge, they were now ready to comply with the King in his Desires; and thereupon being impannelled, they indicted some Lords of many Crimes informed against them. But not only the Justices aforesaid, but all other Justices and Sheriffs of the Realm were called at this Time to Nottingham; the chief Cause was to understand what Power of Men they could assure the King of to serve him against the Lords: And further, that whereas he meant shortly to call a Parliament, they should use the Matter, that no Knight or Burgeffs should be chosen, but such as the King and his Council should name. To which the Sheriffs made Answer, That it lay not in their Power to assemble any Forces against the Lords, who were so well beloved: And as for choosing Knights and Burgeffes, the Commons would undoubtedly look to enjoy their antient Liberty, and could not be hindered. But yet the King and the Duke of Ireland sent into all Parts of the Realm, to raise Men in this Quarrel against the Lords; whereof the Duke of Gloucester being advertised, he came secretly to Conference with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby: Who upon Consultation determined to talk with the King, with their Forces about them; and the King on the other Part, took Advice how he might apprehend them apart; and thereupon sent the Earl of Northumberland, and others, to the Castle of Rygate, to take the Earl of Arundel, who lay there at that Time: But howsoever it fortun'd, they failed of their Purpose. After this he sent others to apprehend him, but he being warned by a Messenger from the Duke of Gloucester, conveyed himself away by Night; and by Morning was come to Haringey Park, where he found the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earl of Warwick, with a great Power of Men about them. The King hearing of this Assembly at Haringey Park, called his Council to hear their Opinion what was fit to be done. Some were of Opinion, that the King should assemble his Friends, and joining them with the Londoners, give them Battel; the chiefest of this Mind was the Archbishop of York. Others thought best, the King should seek to appease the Lords with fair Promises, till a fitter Opportunity to suppress them. But the King not yet resolved what Course to take, caused only Order to be taken, that no Citizen of London should sell to the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Arundel, or to any other of the Lords, any Armour or Furniture of War, under a great Pain. But for all this, the Lords proceeded in their

Course, and sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1387 the Lord John Lovel, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Devereux, requiring to have delivered to them such as were about the King, that were Traitors and Seducers both of him and the Realm; and further to declare, that their Assembling was for the Honour and Wealth both of him and the Kingdom. The Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and two or three other about the King, persuaded him to offer Calais to the King of France, to have his Assistance against the Lords. Withal, the King sent to the Mayor of London, requiring to know how many able Men the City could make? To which the Mayor answered, That he thought it could make fifty thousand Men at an Hour's Warning. Well then, said the King, go and prove what will be done. But when the Mayor went about it, he was answered, They would never fight against the King's Friends, and Defenders of the Realm. At the same Time the Earl of Northumberland said to the King, Sir, There is no doubt but these Lords have always been, and still are your true and faithful Subjects, though now distemper'd by certain Persons about you, that seek to oppress them; therefore my Advice is, That you send to them, to come before your Presence in some publick Place: And I verily believe they will shew such Reasons of their Doings, that you will hold them excused. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, and other of the Bishops there present, approved all of the Earl's Advice; whereupon the King sent the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Ely to the Lords, requiring them to come to him to Westminster on Sunday then next following: Which upon Oath given by the Archbishop and the Chancellor, that no Fraud nor evil Practice should be used against them, they were content to do. But when the Lords were ready to come at the Day appointed, they heard of an Ambush laid to entrap them at the Meuse; and thereupon stayed, so as they came not at the Time appointed. Whereupon the King asking why they came not according to their Promise? It was answered, Because he kept not his Promise: There being an Ambush of a thousand armed Men laid to surprize them at the Meuse. The King hearing this was astonished, and swore he knew of no such Thing, and commanded presently the Place should be searched: But it was true, an Ambush was laid; but not at the Meuse, but in a Place about Westminster, where Sir Thomas Trivet, and Sir Nicholas Brember had assembled them. This one Action might have made the King sensible of his Favourites abusing his Authority; but that where Affection makes the Construction, all Things are taken in a good Sense: Or was it perhaps they had a Warrant dormant, to prosecute the King's Ends without the King's Knowledge? Yet the Lords, after this, receiving a safe Conduct from the King, came to Westminster; of whose coming when the King heard, he apparelled himself in his Royal Robes, and with his Sceptre in his Hand, came into the great Hall, before whom the Lords upon their Knees presented themselves, the King bidding them Welcome, and taking each of them by the Hand. Then the Lord

The King requires the Lords to come unto him, but they hearing of an Ambush laid for them forbore.

But by safe Conduct from the King they came, and the King received them in Shew kindly.

A.D. 1387 Lord Chancellor making a Speech, wherein he blamed them for raising of Arms, and requiring to know the Cause, they answered, They had done it for the Good of the King and Kingdom, and to take away the Traitors about the King. Upon this the King himself spake, asking them whether they thought to compel him by strong Hand? Have not I (saith he) sufficient Men to beat you down? Truly in this Behalf I make no more Account of you, than of the basest Scullion in my Kitchen. Yet after these great Words he lift up the Duke of Gloucester, who all this while was kneeling, and commanded the rest also to rise; and then led them courteously to his Chamber, where they sate and drank together. And finally, it was concluded they should all meet again, as well these Lords, as those they accused, at the next Parliament, which the King promised to call speedily, and each Party to receive there according to Justice, and in the mean Time all Parties to be in the King's Protection. But when the favourite Lords heard this, they told the King plainly, They neither durst, nor would put themselves to the Hazard of such a Meeting; and therefore the Duke of Ireland, and the rest of that Faction, left the Court, to be out of the Way. But the King, not enduring their Absence, appointed Thomas Molineux, Constable of the Castle of Chester, to raise an Army, and to safe conduct the Duke of Ireland to him. But they being come as far as Radcoat-Bridge, were encountred by the Earl of Derby; and the Duke of Ireland not daring to join Battel with him, fled, and being to pass a River, cast away his Gantlets and Sword (to be the more nimble) and giving his Horse the Spur, leap'd into the River, and so escaped. But when these Things were afterward found, it was verily thought that he had been drowned, till News the King in the Tower. To whom, after humble A.D. 1388 Salutations, they shewed the Letter which he had written to the Duke of Ireland, to levy an Army for their Destruction: Likewise the Letters which the French King had written to him, containing a safe Conduct for him to come into France, there to do Acts to his own Dishonour and the Kingdom's.

This done, upon the King's Promise that he would come the next Day to Westminster to treat further of these Matters, the Lords departed; only the Earls of Nottingham and Derby, at the King's Instance, stayed all Night; but before the King went to Bed, his Mind was clean altered for keeping his Promise to meet the Lords the next Day at Westminster; which the Lords understanding, they sent peremptorily to him, that if he came not according to his Promise, they would choose another King that should hearken to the faithful Counsel of his Lords. This touched the King so to the Quick, that the next Morning he went and met the Lords; who there declared to him, How much it concerned the Good of the Kingdom, that those Traitors so often spoken of, should be removed from the Court. To which the King, tho' much against his Will, yet at last condescended; and thereupon presently Alexander Nevill, Archbishop of York, and Thomas Rushoke, Bishop of Chichester, and Confessor to the King, were expelled the Court; who, not willing to come to After-reckonings, fled no Man knew whither.

They threaten to choose a new King.

They expelled also John Fordham, Bishop of Durham, Lord-Treasurer; the Lord Zouch of Haringworth, the Lord Burvel, the Lord Beaumont, Albercy de Vere, Baldwin de Bereford, Richard Adderbury, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Lovel, Knights, but constrained to put in Sureties to appear at the next Parliament. Also certain Ladies were expelled the Court, as the Lady Poynings, the Lady Mouling, and others, bound to appear at the next Parliament. There were also arrested and committed to several Prisons, Sir Simon Burley, William Elmham, John Beauchamp, Steward of the King's House, Sir John Salisbury, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Bernays, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brembar, Knights: Also Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, Richard Mitford, the King's Chaplains; Nicholas Sclake, Dean of the King's Chappel, and John Blake, a Lawyer.

Hereupon the King removes, or puts in Prison all those whom the Lords required.

Shortly after the Parliament began (called afterward, the Parliament that wrought Wonders) on the first Day whereof were arrested, as they sate in their Places, all the Justices (but only Sir William Skipwith) as Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Sir Robert Belknappe, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brook, and John Alaston, the King's Sergeant at Law; and were all sent to the Tower, for doing contrary to an Agreement made the last Parliament. Also in the Beginning of this Parliament, Robert Vere, Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevill, Archbishop of York, Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Tresilian, Lord Chief Justice of England, were openly called to answer Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earl of Arundel, Henry Earl of Derby, and Thomas Earl of Nottingham, upon certain Articles of High-Treason; and because none of them appeared, it was ordained by the whole Consent

On the Morrow after, Sir Nicholas Brember was brought to his Answer; who being found guilty, was beheaded with an Ax which himself had caused to be made for beheading of others. After this, Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berneys, lusty young Men, were drawn and hanged; as also Sir John Beauchamp, Lord Steward of the King's House; John Blake Esquire: And lastly, Sir Simon Burley, Son to the great Sir John Burley, Knight of the Garter, was beheaded on Tower-hill; whose Death the King took more heavily and more heinously than all the rest. Also all the Justices were condemned to die, but by the Queen's Intercession, they were only banished the Realm, and all their Lands and Goods confiscate, only a small Portion of Money was assigned them for their Sustentation. Finally, in this Parliament an Oath was required and obtained of the King, that he should stand unto, and abide by such Rule and Order as the Lords should take: And this Oath was likewise required also of all the Inhabitants of the Realm.

In the latter End of the King's eleventh Year, the Earl of Arundel was sent to Sea, with a great Navy of Ships and Men of War; with whom went the Earls of Nottingham and Devonshire, Sir Thomas Percy, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Camois, Sir William Elmham, and divers other Knights, to aid the Duke of Britain against the King of France; but before they came, the Duke of Britain was reconciled to the King of France; and so needing not their Aid, all this great Fleet returned with doing nothing. And it was indeed a Year of doing nothing, unless we reckon some petty Inroads of the Scots, and that Sir Thomas Trivet died with a Fall off his Horse; and that Sir John Holland, the King's Brother by the Mother, was made Earl of Huntingdon; and that there was Contention in Oxford, between the Northern and the Southern Scholars, which was pacified by the Duke of Gloucester.

1389. A Truce for three Years between England, France, and Scotland.

William Wickham, Bishop of Winchester, made Lord Chancellor.

In his twelfth Year, Commissioners were appointed to meet at Balingham, betwixt Calais and Boloigne, to treat of a Peace between the Realms of England, France, and Scotland: And after long debating, a Truce was at last concluded, to begin at Midsummer next, and to last three Years. But now the King, to shew his plenary Authority of being at full Age, removed the Archbishop of York from being Lord Chancellor, and put in his Place William Wickham Bishop of Winchester: Also he removed the Bishop of Hereford from being Treasurer, and put another in his Place: The Earl of Arundel likewise, unto whom the Government of the Parliament was committed, and the Admiralty of the Sea was removed, and the Earl of Huntingdon put in his Room.

About this Time the Lord John Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, as he was practising to learn to Just, was stricken about the privy Parts by a Knight A.D. 1389 called Sir John St. John; of which Hurt he soon after died: In whose Family it is memorable, that for many Generations together, no Son ever saw his Father (the Father being always dead before the Son was born) the Original of this Family was from Hastings the Dane, who in the Reign of K. Alured, long before the Conquest, about the Year 890, came with Rollo into England. But howsoever, in this John Hastings ended the then honourable Titles of the Hastings; for this Man dying without Issue, his Inheritances were dispersed to divers Persons: The Honour of Pembroke came to Francis at Court, by the King's Gift: The Baronies of Hastings and Welford came to Reynold Gray of Ruthen; the Barony of Abergavenny was granted to William Beauchamp of Bedford.

A strange Accident in the Family of the Hastings, Earls of Pembroke, and the Original of their Family.

About this Time John Duke of Lancaster was created Duke of Aquitain, receiving at the King's Hands the Rod and the Cap, as Investitures of that Duchy: Also the Duke of York's Son and Heir was created Earl of Richmond.

In his thirteenth Year Royal Jufts were proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on Sunday next after the Feast of St. Michael; which being published, not only in England, but in Scotland, in Almain, in Flanders, in Brabant, and in France, many Strangers came hither: Amongst others Valeran Earl of St. Pol, that had married K. Richard's Sister, and William the young Earl of Ostervant, Son to Albert de Baviere, Earl of Holland and Heynalt. At the Day appointed, there issued forth of the Tower, about three o'Clock in the Afternoon, sixty Courfers apparelled for the Jufts; and upon every one an Esquire of Honour, riding a soft Pace: After them came forth four and thirty Ladies of Honour (Froissard saith threescore) mounted on Palfries, and every Lady led a Knight with a Chain of Gold. These Knights being on the King's Part, had their Armour and Apparel garnished with White Harts, and Crowns of Gold about their Necks; and so they came riding through the Streets of London unto Smithfield. The Just lasted divers Days, Fabian saith, four and twenty: All which Time the King and Queen lay at the Bishop's Palace by St. Paul's Church, and kept open House to all Comers.

1390. A Royal Just held in Smithfield, and the Solemnity of it.

In his fifteenth Year the Duke of Lancaster went into France, having in his Train a thousand Horse, and met the King of France at Amiens, to treat of a Peace between the two Kingdoms: But after long Debate, a Truce was concluded for a Year.

About this Time the King required the Londoners to lend him a thousand Pounds; which they refused to do, and not only so, but they abused an Italian Merchant for offering to lend it. This moved the King to some Indignation: To which was added the Complaint of a Riot committed by the Citizens against the Servants of the Bishop of Salisbury, Lord Treasurer; for that where one of the Bishop's Servants, named Walter Roman, had taken a Horse-loaf out of a Baker's Basket as he passed in the Streets, and ran with it into his Lord's House. The Citizens thereupon assaulted the House, and would not be quieted, till the Mayor and Aldermen were fain to come, and with much ado appeased them. Upon Complaint hereof,

The King displeased with the City of London, and why pacified.

A.D. 1392 hereof, urged against the Citizens, by the Bishop of Salisbury, Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellor, the Mayor and Aldermen, and divers other substantial Citizens are arrested. The Mayor is committed to the Castle of Windsor, and the other to other Castles; the Liberties of the City are seized into the King's Hands, and the Authority of the Mayor utterly ceased, the King appointing a Warden to govern the City, first Sir Edmund Derligrug, and afterward Sir Baldwin Raddington; till at length, by the special Suit of the Duke of Gloucester, the King was contented to come to London, to so great Joy of the Citizens, that they received him with four hundred on Horse-back, clad all in one Livery, and presented the King and Queen with many rich Gifts; yet all gave not Satisfaction, to have their Liberties restored, till they afterwards paid ten thousand Pounds. This it is to provoke a Lion. It may be Fortune enough to us, if by any Means we can but keep him quiet; for if once we provoke him to lay his Paw upon us, it will be hard getting from him, and not to be torn in Pieces.

1393. In his sixteenth Year, the Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester are once again sent into France, to treat of a Peace: But when they could not agree with the French Commissioners upon Articles propounded, there was only a Truce concluded for four Years; tho' perhaps a further Agreement had then been made, but that the King of France fell newly again into his old Fit of Frensy, which called away the French Commissioners from further Treaty.

1395. In his eighteenth Year a Proclamation was set forth, That all Irish-men should avoid this Realm, and return home. The Occasion was, because so many Irish were come over, that Ireland in a Manner was left unpeopled; insomuch, that where K. Edward the Third had received from thence Yearly the Sum of thirty thousand Pounds, the King now laid forth as much to repel Rebels. Whereupon, at Michaelmas, K. Richard went himself into Ireland, attended with the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of March, Nottingham and Rutland, the Lord Thomas Percy, Lord Steward, and divers other of the English Nobility; to whom came in the great O'neal, King of Meath, Brian of Thomond, King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur, King of Leymster, and Conbur, King of Chewency and Darpe; and there King Richard stayed all that Winter, and after Christmas called a Parliament: At which Time also the Duke of York, Lord Warden of England, in the King's Name called a Parliament at Westminster; to the which was sent forth of Ireland the Duke of Gloucester, that he might declare to the Commons the King's great Occasions for Supply of Money; whose Words so far prevailed, that a whole Tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity.

dred French on the other. The two Kings before A.D. 1397 their Meeting took a solemn Oath for Assurance of their faithful and true Meaning, to observe the sacred Laws of Amity one toward another in this Interview. After the two Kings were come together, it was accorded, that in the same Place where they met, there should be builded, at both their Costs, a Chappel for a perpetual Memory, which should be called the Chappel of our Lady of Peace. On Simon and Jude's Day, the Kings talked together of Articles concerning the Peace; and having concluded them, they received either of them an Oath upon the holy Evangelists, to observe and keep them. This done, the French King brought his Daughter Isabel, and delivered her to K. Richard, who shortly after at Calais married her; and upon the seventeenth of January following she was crowned Queen at Westminster. A Match of great Honour, but of little Conveniency, and less Profit; for the Lady being but eight Years of Age, there could be no Hope of Issue for a long Time, which was K. Richard's greatest Want; and as little Supply of his Wants otherwise, her Portion perhaps scarce paying the Charges of his Journey to fetch her, which cost him three hundred thousand Marks.

The Duke of Lancaster, in the thirteenth Year of King Richard's Reign, had been created Duke of Aquitain; but when the Gascoigners would not receive him, shewing Reasons why that Dukedom ought not to be separated from the Crown of England, his Grant was revoked, and so it remained still in Demesne of the Crown.

At this Time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancaster caused to be legitimated the Issue he had by Katharine Swinford, before he married her; of whom Thomas Beaufort was created Earl of Somerset.

This Year also, the King receiving the Money back which had been lent to the Duke of Britain upon Brest, delivered up the Town unto him: And thereupon the English Soldiers that were there in Garrison were all discharged and sent home; who, at a Feast which the King kept at Westminster, coming in Companies together into the Hall, as soon as the King had dined, and was entering into his Chamber, the Duke of Gloucester asked him, if he did mark those Men that stood in such Troops in the Hall? Yes, marry (said the King) who were they? They were (said the Duke) those Soldiers who by your rendring up of Brest have been sent home, and now must either starve or steal; and therewithal, very unadvisedly in Words, taxed the King with Unadvisedness of his Deed. To whom the King, in great Anger, replied, Why, Uncle, Do you think me either a Merchant, or a Fool, to sell my Land? By St. John Baptist, No: But could I refuse to render the Town, when Tender was made me of the Money lent upon it? Indeed nothing could more discover the Duke of Gloucester's either Weakness, if he knew not that Brest was but only a Mortgage, or Injustice, if knowing it, he would have had the King, tho' the Money were tendred, to have kept it still; but such is the Course of many, to take Part with the Politicks against the Ethicks; work their Ends by doing unjustly, when doing justly ought

A famous Interview between the two Kings of England and France, and the Manner of it.

A.D. 1397 ought to be their chiefeſt End. However it was, the multiplying of Words about this Matter, kindled in the King ſuch Diſpleaſure againſt the Duke, that it could never afterwards be quenched but by his Blood. And firſt he complained to his other two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaster and York, of his undutiſul Behaviour towards him; who told the King, their Brother perhaps might let fall ſome unadviſed Words, but they knew his Heart to be true and faithful. Yet doubting how far the King might preſs upon them to answer for their Brother's Faithfulneſs, they retired from Court; which gave the Duke's Enemies Time to incenſe the King farther againſt him.

The Duke of Glouceſter and other Lords conſpire to ſeiſe upon K. Richard, but are diſcovered.

It happened that the Duke of Glouceſter had with him one Day at his Houſe, the Abbot of St. Albans, that was his Godfather, and the Prior of Weſtminſter; and after Dinner falling in Talk with them, amongſt other Communications, the Duke required the Prior to tell Truth, whether he had any Viſion the Night before? To which the Prior was loth at firſt to make a direct Answer; but at laſt being earneſtly requeſted, as well by the Abbot as the Duke, he confeſſed that he had a Viſion indeed, which was, that the Realm of England ſhould be deſtroyed through the Miſgovernance of King Richard. By the Virgin Mary (ſaith the Abbot) I had the very ſame Viſion. Whereupon the Duke preſently diſcloſed to them all the Secrets of his Mind; and by their Devices contrived an Aſſembly of divers great Lords of the Realm, to meet at Arundel Caſtle that Day Fortnight; at which Time he appointed to be there himſelf, with the Earls of Derby, Arundel, Marſhall, and Warwick; alſo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Abbot of St. Albans, the Prior of Weſtminſter, with divers others. And accordingly all theſe met at Arundel Caſtle, at the Day appointed; where, receiving firſt the Sacrament, by the Hands of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be aſſiſtant each to other, in all ſuch Matters as they ſhould determine, They reſolved to ſeiſe upon K. Richard, and upon the Dukes of Lancaster and York, and commit them to Priſon; and all the other Lords of the King's Council they determined ſhould be drawn and hanged. But the Earl Marſhal, that was Deputy of Calais, and had married the Earl of Arundel's Daughter, diſcovered all their Counſel to the King; who thereupon, by a Plot deviſed by his Council, took his Brother, the Earl of Huntingdon, with him, and riſing from Supper, rode that Night to the Duke of Glouceſter's Houſe at Plaſhey in Effex. When the King came thither, the Duke was in Bed; but informed of it, caſt his Cloak about his Shoulders, and came down, bidding the King's Grace, with all Reverence,

The King by a Wile, ſeiſeth upon the Duke of Glouceſter, and ſends him preſently to Calais, where ſoon after he loſt his Life.

Welcome. The King courteouſly requeſted him to go and make himſelf ready, for that he muſt needs ride with him a little Way, to confer of ſome Buſineſs. The Duke preſently made him ready and came down; and as ſoon as the King and his Company was gone a little Way from the Houſe, and the Duke with him, the Earl Marſhal arreſted the Duke, as he had been appointed to do by the King, who immediately was ſent to Calais; where, after ſome Time he was diſpatched of his Life, either ſtrangled, or elſe ſmothered with Pillows, as ſome write. At the A.D. 1397 very ſame Time was the Earl of Arundel apprehended by the Earls of Rutland and Kent: The Earl of Warwick alſo, when the King had invited him to Dinner, and ſhewed him very good Countenance, was taken and arreſted in the Place: As likewiſe at the ſame Time were apprehended, and committed to the Tower, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheyney. Shortly after the King procured them to be indicted at Nottingham, ſuborning ſuch as ſhould appeal them in Parliament; namely, Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray, Earl Marſhal, Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Somerſet, John Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer, and the Lord William Scroop, Lord Chamberlain: And in the mean Time, the King ſent for a Power of Cheſhire Men to keep Watch and Ward about his Perſon.

Divers other Lords committed to the Tower.

On the 17th of September a Parliament began at Weſtminſter, wherein the King complained as well of many Things done by the Lords in his Minority, as alſo of the hard Dealing which they had uſed towards the Queen, who was three Hours at one Time on her Knees before the Earl of Arundel, for one of her Eſquires, named John Calverley, who nevertheleſs had his Head ſmiten from his Shoulders; and all the Answer ſhe could get, was this; Madam, pray for your ſelf and your Husband, and let this Suit alone. Thoſe that ſet forth the King's Grievances in this Parliament, were John Buſby, William Bagot, and Thomas Green. The Cauſe of aſſembling the Parliament was ſhewed, That the King had called it for Reformation of divers Tranſgreſſions againſt the Peace of this Land, by the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and others. Then Sir John Buſby, Speaker of the Parliament, made Requeſt on Behalf of the Commonalty, that they might be puniſhed according to their Deſervings; and eſpecially the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who then ſat next the King, whom he accuſed of High-treaſon. When the Archbiſhop began to answer, Sir John Buſby beſought the King, That he might not be admitted to answer, leſt by his great Wit and Cunning he might lead Men away to believe him. And here Sir John Buſby, in all his Talk, did not attribute to the King's Titles of Honour due and accuſtomed, but ſuch as were fitter for the Ma- jeſty of God than for any Earthly Prince. And when the Archbiſhop was conſtrained to keep Silence, Sir John Buſby proceeded; requiring, on the Behalf of the Commons, That the Charters of Pardon granted to the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, ſhould be revoked. The King for his Part proteſted that they were drawn from him by Compulſion; and therefore beſought them to deliver their Opinions, what they thought thereof. Whereupon the Biſhops firſt gave their Sen- tence, that the ſaid Pardons were revocable, and might be called in; but pretending a Scrupuloſity, as if they might not with ſafe Conſciences be preſent where Judgment of Blood ſhould paſs, they appointed a Layman to be their Prolocutor for that Turn. The Temporal Lords likewiſe gave their Sentence, That the Pardons were revocable; only the Judges and

Sir John Buſby, Speaker of the Parliament, attributes divine Titles to the King.

The Lords Spiritual and Temporal give their Opinions one Way, and Judges and Lawyers another.

Lawyers

A.D. 1397 Lawyers were not of this Opinion. But howso-ever the Archbishop of Canterbury is hereupon condemned to perpetual Exile, and appointed to avoid the Realm within fix Weeks. Also the Earl of Arundel is by the Duke of Lancaster, who fate that Day as High-Steward, condemned of Treason, and on the Tower-hill beheaded.
 There went to see the Execution divers Lords, amongst whom was the Earl of Nottingham, that had married his Daughter, and the Earl of Kent, that was his Daughter's Son; to whom, at the Place of his Execution he said.
 Truly it would have befecmed you rather to be absent, than here at this Businels; but the Time will come e'er long, that as many shall marvel at your Misfortune, as they do now at mine.
 After his Death a Fame went, that his Head was grown to his Body again: Whereupon, the tenth Day after his Burial, his Body by the King's Appointment was taken up, and then found to be a Fable. After this, the Lord Thomas Beau- champ Earl of Warwick was brought forth, and charged with the like Treasons; but by the Intercession of the Duke of Lancaster, and other Lords, after Confession of his Fault, was only confined into the Isle of Man. Likewise the Lord Cobham and Sir John Cheyney were only banished (or as Fabian saith) condemned to perpetual Prison. The Parliament after this was held at Shrewsbury; where, for the Love the King bore to the Gentlemen and Commons of the Shire of Chester, he caused it to be ordained, that from thenceforth it should be called and known by the Name of the Principality of Chester: And herewith entituled himself Prince of Chester. At this Parliament also, called the Great Parliament, he created five Dukes, and a Ducheis, one Marqueis, and four Earls. The Earl of Derby was created Duke of Hereford; the Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; the Earl of Rutland, Duke of Albemarle; the Earl of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earl of Hun- tingdon, Duke of Exeter; and the Lady Marg- aret Marshal, Countess of Norfolk, was created Ducheis of Norfolk: The Earl of Somerset was created Marqueis of Dorset; the Lord Spencer was made Earl of Gloucester; the Lord Ne- vill, Earl of Westmorland; the Lord Scroop, Earl of Wiltshire; and the Lord Thomas Piercy, Lord Steward of the King's House, was made Earl of Worcester; and for the better Maintenance of their Estate, he divided amongst them a great Part of those Lands that belonged to the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick.
 Also in this Parliament the Judges gave their Opinions, That when Articles are propounded by the King to be handled in Parliament, if other Articles be handled before those be first determined, that it is Treason in them that do it. And in this Parliament, the King brought it so about, that he obtained the whole Power of the Parliament to be conferred upon certain Persons, namely, John Duke of Lancaster, Ed- mund Duke of York, Edmund Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exeter,
John Marqueis of Dorset, Roger Earl of March,
John Earl of Salisbury, and divers others, or to any seven or eight of them; and these, by virtue of this Grant, proceeded to conclude upon many Things which concerned generally the Things of the whole Parliament, to the A.D. 1397 great Prejudice of the State, and a dangerous Example in Time to come. A general Pardon was also granted for all Offences, to all the King's Subjects, but only to fifty, whose Names he would not exprefs, but reserved them to his own Knowledge, That when any of the Nobility offended him, he might at his Pleasure name him to be one of the Number excepted, and so keep them still within his Danger. And for the more strentkening the Acts of this Parliament, the King purchased the Pope's Bulls, containing grievous Censures and Curfes to them that should break them. And now the chief of the opposite Faction having lost their Heads, and all Things as well settled as could be desired, the King was secure, as thinking himself safe; and he had indeed been safe, if Time and Fortune were not Actors in Revenge, as well as Men; or rather if a superior Power did not interpose, whose Ways are as secret as himself is invincible.
 It now fell out (tho' Writers differ what it was fell out) for some write, that Thomas Mow- bray accused the Duke of Hereford; others, that Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mow- bray Duke of Norfolk, for speaking Words founding highly to the King's Dishonour; to which the Duke of Norfolk, being called to answer, charged the Duke of Hereford before the King, that he lied falsly: Whereupon a Combat was agreed upon between them. The King laboured to make them Friends, but not prevailing, he gave way to proceed in Combat, and the Place to be at Coventry; where at the Day and Hour appointed, the Duke of Hereford, mounted on a white Courser, barded with green and blue Velvet, embroidered sumptuously with Swains and Antilopes of Goldsmiths Work, approached the Lifts: Of whom the Marshal, being the Duke of Surrey, demanding who he was, he answered, I am Henry of Lancaster, Duke of He- reford, that am come hither to do my Endeavour against Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, as a Traitor, untrue to God, the King, his Realm, and me: Then incontinently he swore upon the holy Evangelists, that his Quarrel was true and just;
 and thereupon required to enter the Lifts, where in a Chair of green Velvet he sat down and reposed himself. Then came the Duke of Norfolk, his Horse barded with crimson Velvet, embroidered richly with Lions of Silver, and Mulberry-trees; and when he had taken his Oath before the Constable, the Duke of Aumerle, that his Quarrel was just, he entered the Lifts, and sat him down in his Chair of crimson Velvet, curtained about with white and red Damask.
 Then the Marshal viewed their Spears, to see that they were of equal Length, and the Heralds proclaimed on the King's behalf, they should mount on Horseback, and address themselves to the Combat: But when they were set forward, and had their Spears in their Rests, the King cast down his Warder, and the Heralds cried, Stay, Stay. Then the King caused their Spears to be taken from them, and deliberated with his Council what was fit to be done in so weighty a Cause. After two long Hours it was at last concluded, That Henry Duke of Hereford should within fifteen

A.D. 1398 fifteen Days depart out of the Realm, and not return before ten Years were expired, upon Pain of Death; and that Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, should likewise avoid the Realm, and never return into England, upon the like Pain. It is observable, that this Censure was passed against the Duke of Norfolk the very same Day twelve Month in which he had taken Order to put the Duke of Gloucester to Death at Calais, whereof he was then Governor. When these Judgments were once read, the King called before him both the Dukes, and made them swear that the one should never come in Place where the other was. After this the Duke of Norfolk went into Almain, and from thence went to Venice; where after some Time he died with Sorrow. The Duke of Hereford, at the taking his Leave of the King, had four Years of his Banishment released, and then went to Calais, and from thence to Paris; where, of the French King he was so kindly received, that by his Favour he had obtained in Marriage the only Daughter of the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, if King Richard by Messengers had not hindered him. The Duke might have made his Banishment in manner of a Visitation, if he had gone into Spain; for there he had two Sisters married, the one to the King of Portugal, the other to the King of Spain, to whom his coming would have been most welcome: But he chose rather to make his Stay in France, as the Place where he might soonest have Intelligence out of England; and indeed before a Year came about, he heard of the Death of his Father the Duke of Lancaster; and heard withal that King Richard had seized into his Hands all the Lands descended upon him, contrary to his Promise.

But the King interposeth and banisheth the Duke of Norfolk for ever: The Duke of Hereford for six Years.

The Delinquencies of great Men punished only with Banishment, and the Danger of it.

The Duke of Hereford is solicited to return into England.

It was a Custom in those Days, to punish the Delinquencies of great Men by Banishment out of the Realm, a Custom not more grievous to the Subject than dangerous to the Prince: For by this Course they had Means to work so closely in their Minds of Revenge, that the Fabrick of a Kingdom was in Danger to be blown up before their working could be perceived: An Example whereof was never more plainly seen than at this Time, in the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Hereford: For, they in their Banishment meeting often together, and aggravating the Grievances of King Richard's Government, fell at last to consult by what Means he might best be removed, seeing there was no Hope he could ever be reclaimed. In the Time of their Consultation about it, as if Fortune her self meant to do their Work for them, Solicitations came from many Parts of England, to move the Duke of Hereford to come now and take the Government upon him, wherein they would be ready to assist him. The Duke, heated before by the Archbishop's Instigation, and now set on Fire by this Solicitation, gives Fortune no Leisure to alter her Mind, by delaying the Time; but without further Deliberation prepares to be going: And taking with him the Archbishop, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Eprington, and Sir Thomas Ramston, Knights, John Norbury, Robert Waterton, and Francis Coynt, Esquires, and about some threescore other Persons, as many as he could readily get, in three Ships which the Duke of Britain lent him, he put to Sea; where, hovering about the Coast a while, to mark the Countenance of the Shores, he landed at last, about the Beginning of July, at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire: Which no sooner was known, but there repaired to him the Lords Willoughby, Ross, Darcy, and Beaumont; and shortly after, at Doncaster, the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son, Sir Henry Piercy, with the Earl of Westmorland, and great Numbers of the Gentry and common Sort; of whom, tho' some had invited him to come to take the Government of the Realm upon him, yet he forbore to pretend that for any Cause of his coming, but made a solemn Protestation, that he came only to take Possession of the Inheritances descended upon him from his Father, which King Richard most unjustly, and contrary to his Promise, had seized into his Hands; for this was a Reason had no Objection: The other he reserved till his Power should not need to regard Objections. And indeed no Snow-ball ever gathered Greatness so fast by rolling, as his Forces encreased by marching forward; for by that Time he came to Berkley, he had got a mighty Army: And within three Days after, all the King's Castles in those Parts were surrendered to him. The Duke of York, left Governor of the Kingdom, used his best Means to raise Forces to resist him; but found few willing to bear Arms against him: Whereupon, and perhaps hearing withal that the Duke's coming was but only to take Possession of his Inheritance, he thought good to go to Berkley to him, to have there some Communication about it. At Berkley at that Time was arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham and Sir Walter Burleigh, Knights, Lawrence Drew and John Golofer, Esquires. From Berkley the two Dukes went forwards towards Bristol, where in the Castle were the Lord William Scroop, Earl of Wiltshire, and Treasurer of England, Sir Henry Green, and Sir Henry Bushy, who were taken and brought forth bound before the Duke of Lancaster, and the Day after arraigned before the Countable and Marshal, found guilty of Treason for misgoverning the King and the Realm, and presently had their Heads smitten off. Sir John Russel also was taken there, but he feigning himself to be out of his Wits, escaped for that Time.

1399. He lands with three Ships at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire.
1399. Many Lords repair to him, and all the King's Castles are surrendered to him.

All this while King Richard was in Ireland, where he performed Acts in repressing the Rebels there, not unworthy of him; and having with him, amongst other of the great Lords, the Duke of Lancaster's Son Henry, he there, for his Towardness in Service, knighted him. By which it appeared that he had no great Fear of the Father, when he graced the Son; and indeed he needed not have feared him, if his own Absence out of England had not given him Advantage. Six Weeks were now passed after the Duke's Arrival in England; in all which Time King Richard had no Notice of it, by reason the Winds were contrary to come forth of England: But as soon as he heard it, and in what hostile Manner he proceeded, he then determined to return instantly into England; and had done it, but that the Duke of Aumerle

K. Richard being in Ireland, hath no Notice in six Weeks of the Duke's Arrival in England.

A.D. 1399 Aumerle his principal Counsellor (whether out of a good Meaning, but grounded upon Errors, or out of an ill Meaning, but shadowed with Colours) by all Means persuaded him to stay so long till Things fitting for his Journey might be made ready. It was King Richard's ill Luck to hearken to this ill Counsel; but yet he presently sent the Earl of Salisbury into England, to provide him an Army out of Wales and Cheeshire, against his own coming; which he promised faithfully should be within six Days at the most. The Earl landed at Conway in Wales, and had soon gotten to the Number of forty thousand Men: But the six Days passed, and no News of the King, which made the Soldiers suspect that he was dead, and thereupon were ready to disband; but at the Earl of Salisbury's Persuasion, they were contented to stay for some Days longer; and when the King came not in that Time neither, they then would stay no longer, but departed and went Home. At length, about eighteen Days after that the King had sent away the Earl of Salisbury, he took Shipping, together with the Dukes of Aumerle, Exeter, and Surrey, and divers others of the Nobility, with the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carlisle, and landed at Barklowly in Wales. He had about him some Ceshire-men, and was at first in no great Doubt of prevailing; but when he heard that all the Castles from the Borders of Scotland and Bristol were delivered to the Duke of Lancaster, and that the greatest Part of the Nobility and Commons took Part with him, and especially that his principal Counsellors had lost their Heads at Bristol; then, solvuntur frigore membra, he fell so utterly to despair, that calling his Army together, he licensed every Man to be gone, and so shift for himself. The Soldiers besought him to be of good Chear, swearing they would stand with him to the Death: But this encouraged him not at all; so as the next Night he stole from his Army, and with the Duke of Exeter and Surrey, the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scroop, and some half a score others, he got him to the Castle of Conway, where he found the Earl of Salisbury, determining there to stay, till he might see the World at some better pass. Here the Earl of Worcester, Steward of the King's House, broke his white Staff, and without Delay went to the Duke of Lancaster, who understanding that K. Richard was returned out of Ireland, he left the Duke of York at Bristol, and came back with his Power to Berkley, and from thence the next Day came to Gloucester, and then to Ross, after to Hereford, where came to him the Bishop of Hereford and Sir Edmund Mortimer: On the Sunday following he went to Lemster, and there the Lord Carleton came to him: From thence he went to Ludlow, and the next Day to Shrewsbury, and thither came to him Sir Robert Leigh, and Sir John Leigh, and many others, being sent from Chester, to offer their Service: Thither also came to him the Lord Scales and the Lord Bardolph, forth of Ireland: From Shrewsbury he went to Chester, and from thence sent for his Son and Heir, and likewise for the Duke of Gloucester's Son and Heir (whom K. Richard had left in Custody in Ireland) with all Speed to come into England, but the Duke of Gloucester's Son through Misfortune perished at Sea, or as some write, died of the Plague; the Sorrow whereof caused, shortly after, his Mother's Death. After this, the Duke sent the Earl of Northumberland to the King, who upon safe Conduct coming to him, declared, That if it might please his Grace to undertake that there should be a Parliament assembled, in which Justice might be had, and herewith pardon the Duke of Lancaster of all Things wherein he had offended, the Duke would be ready to come to him on his Knees, and as an humble Subject obey him in all dutiful Service. Yet upon this Conference with the Earl, some say the King required only that himself and eight more, whom he would name, might have honourable Allowance, with Assurance of a private quiet Life; and that then he would resign his Crown; and that upon the Earl's Oath, that this should be performed, the King agreed to go with the Earl to meet the Duke; but after four Miles riding, coming to the Place where they laid an Ambush, the King was enclosed, and constrained to go with the Earl of Rutland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint to Bedford. The King had very few of his Friends about him, but only the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlisle, the Lord Scroop, Sir Nicholas Ferebye, and James d' Artois a Gascon, who still wore a white Heart, the Cognisance of his Master King Richard, and neither for Promises nor Threats would be drawn to leave it off.

The King being in the Castle of Flint, and Duke Henry with his Army approaching near the Town, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Duke of Aumerle and the Earl of Worcester, went before to the King; whom the King spying from the Walls where he stood, went down to meet; and finding they did their due Reverence to him on their Knees, he took them up, and taking the Archbishop aside, talked with him a good while; and it was reported, the Archbishop willed him to be of good Comfort, for he should be assured not to have any Hurt as touching his Person. After this the Duke of Lancaster came to the Castle himself, all armed; and being within the first Gate, he there stayed till the King, accompanied with the Bishop of Carlisle, the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir Stephen Scroop, who bore the Sword before him, came forth, and sat down in a Place prepared for him. As soon as the Duke saw him, he came towards him bowing his Knee; and coming forward, did so the second Time, and the third, till the King took him by the Hand and lift him up, saying, Dear Cousin, you are welcome. The Duke humbly thanking him, said, My Sovereign Lord and King, the Cause of my coming at this present is (your Honour saved) to have Restitution of my Person, my Lands, and Heritage: Whereto the King answered, Dear Cousin, I am ready to accomplish your Will, so that you may enjoy all that is yours without Exception. After this coming forth of the Castle, the King called for Wine; and after they had drank they mounted on Horseback, and rode to Chester, the next Day to Namptwich, then to Newcastle, from thence to Stafford, then to Litchfield, and there rested Sunday: After that they

Which the Earl of Northumberland undertakes upon his Oath should be performed. Hereupon the King goes to meet the Duke, but is intrapped in Ambush, and carried to Flint Castle.

The Duke's Reverence to the King in coming to him.

The King coming overrey, and finding the Army disbanded, falls to Despair, and secretly the next Night gets him to Conway Castle.

A.D. 1399 they rode forward, and lodged first at Coventry, then at Darventry, then at Northampton, next Day at Dunstable, then at St. Alban's, and so came to London. In all which Journey they suffered not the King to change his Apparel, but made him ride still in one Suit of Raiment; and that but a simple one, tho' he in his Time was exceeding sumptuous in Apparel, having one Coat which was valued at thirty thousand Marks: And in this Sort he was brought the next Day to Westminster, and from thence the next Day had to the Tower, and committed to safe Custody. After this, a Parliament was called by the Duke of Lancaster, but in the Name of K. Richard; in which, many heinous Points of Misgovernment were laid to his Charge, and were ingrossed up in three and thirty Articles; the chief were these:

But yet is basely carried away and committed to the Tower.

Articles delivered to the Parliament against K. Richard.

That he had wastefully spent the Treasure of the Realm.

That without Law or Justice, he had caused the Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Arundel to be put to Death.

That he had borrowed great Sums of Money, and given his Letters Patents to repay the same, and yet not one Penny ever paid.

That he had said, the Laws of the Realm were in his Head and Breast: By reason of which fantastical Opinion he destroyed Noblemen, and impoverished the Commons.

That he changed Knights and Burgeffes of the Parliament at his Pleasure.

That most tyrannously he said, That the Lives and Goods of all his Subjects were in his Hands, and at his Disposition.

That whereas divers Lords were by the Court of Parliament appointed to treat of Matters concerning the State of the Kingdom, they being busied about the same Commission, he went about to impeach them of high Treason.

That by Force and Threats, he enforced the Judges of the Realm, at Shrewsbury, to condescend to his Way, for the Destruction of divers of the Lords.

That he caused his Father's own Brother, the Duke of Gloucester, without Law to be attached and sent to Calais, and there without Reason secretly murdered.

That notwithstanding the Earl of Arundel, at his Arraignment, pleaded his Charter of Pardon, yet he could not be heard, but was shamefully and suddenly put to death.

That he assembled certain Lancashire and Cheshire Men to make War upon his Lords, and suffered them to rob and spoil without Prohibition.

That though he had made Proclamation, That the Lords were not attached for any Crime of Treason, yet afterward in the Parliament he laid Treason to their Charge.

That notwithstanding his Pardon granted to them, he enforced divers of the Lords Partakers to be again intolerably fined, to their utter undoing.

That without the Assent of the Peers, he carried the Jewels and Plate of this Kingdom into Ireland.

He is by Parliament deposed.

Upon these, and some other Articles, he was by Parliament adjudged to be deposed from all Kingly Honour and Princely Government: And thereupon, the King being advised by his own Servants, rather voluntarily to resign the Crown, than by Compulsion to be forced to it, A.D. 1399 on the Monday before the nine and twentieth Day of September, in the Year 1339, he made a solemn Resignation before divers Lords and others, sent to him for that Purpose, and an Instrument of his Resignation being made, he would needs read it before them all himself, and then subscribed it; and withal made it his Suit, that the Duke of Lancaster might be his Successor, and King after him; and for a Sign of his Desire hereof, he took his signet Ring of Gold from his Finger, and put it upon the Duke of Lancaster; that never Man who had used a Kingdom with such Violence, gave it over with such Patience, or rather such Willingness, that he seemed rather to affect it, than that he was any way forced to it. This Resignation of King Richard being shewed to the Parliament, both Houses gave their Assent; and then Commissioners were appointed to pronounce openly the Sentence of his Deposing, which was done by the Bishop of St. Asaph, and all Allegiance renounced to him.

He voluntarily resigns his Crown to the Duke of Lancaster.

And now it is easy to be observed, what a wonderful Concurrence of Fortunes, in behalf of the Duke of Lancaster, and against King Richard, happened together; whereof if any one had been missing, he had never been turned out of his Throne in such Manner as he was: For first, if it had not happened that King Richard had been in Ireland at the Time when the Duke began his Attempt, it had not been possible for him to compass his Design as he did: And then if King Richard being in Ireland, he had not by Misfortune of Weather been kept six Weeks from hearing of the Duke's Arrival, he had not given him so large a Time for raising of Forces, and so more easily might have resisted him: Or after King Richard heard of the Duke's Arrival, if he had followed the Earl of Salisbury, and not stayed so many Days longer than he promised, he had found an Army ready to receive him, sufficient at least to have given a Stop to the Duke's Proceedings: Or when at last he came over, and found his Army to fail him, if withal his own Courage had not failed him, but that he had manfully put it to the Hazard of a Battel, as his Soldiers themselves would have had him to do, he could not choose but have made a better End of his Business than now he did. But when all is done, there is no warding the Blows of Fortune; or to say better, no resisting the Decree of Heaven: But seeing that Decree is an Abyssus to us, and may perhaps but be conditional, we shall manifestly be Traitors to our selves, if we use not our utmost Endeavours to divert it. Thus it may truly be said, K. Richard lost his Crown, more by his own Treason than by the Treason of any other.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second Year, in a Parliament held at Gloucester, was granted to be paid by the Merchants upon every Sack of Wool a Mark for this present Year; and for every Pound's worth of Wares brought from beyond Sea, and sold here, six Pence of the Buyer. In his third Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, a Subsidy was granted to be levied of the great Men are spared.

Men of the Realm, to the End the Commons might be spared: The Dukes of Lancaster and Britain paid twenty Marks, every Earl six Marks; Bishops and Abbots with Mitre as much; every Monk three Shillings four Pence: Also every Justice, Sheriff, Knight, Esquire, Parson and Vicar, were charged after a certain Rate; but no Commons of the Laity. Also this Year, in another Parliament, was granted a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity; but with this Condition, that from henceforth, which was in March, 1380, till the Feast of St. Michael, which should be in the Year 1381, there should be no more Parliaments; but yet was not observed. In his fourth Year in a Parliament at Northampton, a new kind of Subsidy was granted; of every Priest Secular or Regular, six Shillings eight Pence, and as much of every Nun; and of every Man or Woman, married or not married, being sixteen Years of Age (Beggars only excepted) four Pence. In his fifth Year a Subsidy was granted by the Merchants of certain Customs of their Wools which they bought and sold, called a Maletot, to endure for four Years. In his seventh Year was granted him one Moiety of a Fifteenth of the Laity, and shortly after a Moiety of the Tenth, by the Clergy. In his ninth Year, Half of a Tenth, and Half a Fifteenth, by the Laity. In his eleventh Year, there was granted him a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity. In his twelfth Year, at a Parliament was granted of every Sack of Wool, forty Shillings; whereof ten Shillings to be applied presently to the King's Use; the other thirty to remain in the Hands of Treasurers, towards the Charges of Wars, if any should happen. Also there was a Subsidy granted of six Pence in the Pound; whereof four Pence to the Use last mentioned, the other two Pence to be at the King's Pleasure. In his fifteenth Year, at a Parliament, was granted a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity, towards the Charges of John Duke of Lancaster, sent into France. In his eighteenth Year, a Tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity, towards his own Journey into Ireland. In his twentieth Year, the Clergy granted him a Tenth to be paid that Year. In his one and twentieth Year, upon Pretence of having aided the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick against him, he caused blank Charters to be made, which he compelled both Citizens and Gentlemen in the Country to seal, whereby he might charge them afterward to pay whatsoever he required. In his two and twentieth Year, a Fifteenth and a Half was granted; and for the Customs of Wools, fifty Shillings upon every Sack, of English-men born, and three Pounds of Strangers.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his Time.

IN his second Year, in a Parliament at Gloucester, it was enacted, that Merchants, Strangers, might buy and sell in Gros, or by Retail, within this Realm. In his third Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, it was ordained, that the Privileges and Immunities of the Abby of Westminster should remain inviolate; but with this Proviso, against those that took Sanctuary A.D. 1399 with Purpose to defraud their Creditors, that their Lands and Goods should be liable to their Debts. In his sixth Year, a Parliament was holden, in which the Mayor of London, upon Suggestion that the Fishmongers used great Deceit in uttering of their Fish, obtained to have it enacted, That from henceforth none of that Company, nor of the Vintners, Grocers, Butchers, or other that sold any Provision or Victuals, should be admitted Mayor of the City: But in the Parliament next following were restored to their Liberty again, saving that they might not keep Courts among themselves, but that all Transgressions of their Customs should be tried at the Mayor's Court. In his eleventh Year, K. Richard created John Beauchamp of Holt, Baron of Kidderminster, by his Letters Patents; the first that was so made: For before this Time, Barons were always made by calling them to Parliaments by the King's Writ.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the second Year of this King's Reign there came Messengers from the new elected Pope Urban, to require the King's Aid against such Cardinals as he named Schismaticks, that had elected another Pope, whom they named Clement: Which Cardinals sent Messengers likewise to crave his Aid for them, but through Persuasion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Urban's Request was granted, and Clement rejected. In his fourth Year, John Wickliffe set forth his Opinion touching the Sacrament of the Altar, denying the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, in such Sort as the Church of Rome did then teach. In his sixth Year, Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, received Bulls from Pope Urban, to grant all Privileges of the Crusado to all such as would come over and assist him against the Anti-Pope Clement; which being debated in Parliament, it was after much Opposition agreed, that it should go forward: And thereupon the Bishop not only gathered much Money from such as would contribute to the Expedition, but drew many great Captains to go themselves in Person; as namely, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Farington, the Lord Henry Beaumont, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Trivet, and divers others. The Money raised by Contribution came to 20,000 Franks, and the Army to 3000 Horse and 15,000 Foot; with which Forces the Bishop passing over into Flanders, won the Towns of Graveling, Dunkirk, and Newport: But at last, encountered by a mighty Army of the French, he was put to the worst, and returned into England. In the twelfth Year of this King's Reign, an Act was made, that none should pass the Seas to purchase Promotions or Provisions (as they termed them) in any Church or Churches. Also in this Year, Thomas, the late Earl of Lancaster, by reason of Miracles reported to be done by him, was Canonized for a Saint. At this Time also the Wickliffists marvellously encreased, Preaching against Pilgrimages and Images, whose greatest Opposer was the Bishop of Norwich. In his thirteenth Year, Proclamation was made that

A.D. 1399 all beneficed Men abiding in the Court of Rome, should return into England by a certain Day, under Pain of forfeiting their Benefices; and all other not beneficed, under a certain Pain likewise. Also about this Time, a Statute was made, that no Ecclesiastical Person should possess Mannors, Houses, Lands, Revenues, or Rents whatsoever, at the Hands of the Feoffee, without the King's Licence, and the chief Lords. In his eighteenth Year, the Wickliffists were persecuted, and Excommunication pronounced against them by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In this Schism of the two Popes, the French Clergy wrote in Behalf of Clement their Pope, and sent it into England; the Clergy of England, on the contrary, wrote in Behalf of Pope Urban, and so nothing was agreed.

The Wickliffists persecuted.

Works of Piety in his Time.

IN the twentieth Year of this King's Reign, William Bateman, Bishop of Norwich, builded Trinity-Hall in Cambridge. In the third Year of his Reign, John Philpot, Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements, for the which the Chamberlain payeth Yearly, to thirteen poor People, to every of them, seven Pence the Week for ever; and as any of those thirteen Persons dieth, the Mayor appointeth one to succeed, and the Recorder another. In the one and twentieth Year of his Reign, King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the Walls, Windows, and Roof. In his Time Simon, Archbishop of Canterbury, slain by the Rebels, upon Tower-Hill, built the West Gate of Canterbury, and from thence to the North Gate, commonly called the long Wall. Thomas Fitz-Alan, or Arundel, being Bishop of Ely, built the great Gate-House of Ely-House in Holborn; and being after Bishop of Canterbury, he built a fair Spire Steeple, at the West End of his Church there, called to this Day, Arundel-Steeple, and bestowed a tunable Ring of five Bells upon the same.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his third Year, so great a Mortality afflicted the North Parts of England, that the Country became almost desolate. In his sixth Year, on the 24th Day of May, there happened so great an Earthquake, or (as some write) a Water-shake, that it made Ships in the Havens to beat one against the other. In July, in the Year 1389, whilst the King was at Sheene, there swarmed in his Court such Multitudes of Flies and Gnats, skirmishing with one another, that in the End they were swept away with Brooms by Heaps, and Bushels were filled with them. In his twelfth Year, in March, first there were terrible Winds; afterwards followed a great Mortality, and after that a great Dearth, that a Bushel of Wheat was sold for thirteen Pence, which was then thought a great Price; for the Years before it was sold for Six-pence, and Wool was sold for two Shilling a Stone. In his fourteenth Year, on Christmas Day, a Dolphin was taken at London-Bridge, being ten Foot long, and a monstrous grown Fish. In his eighteenth Year, an Exhalation, in Likeness of Fire, appeared in the Night in many Places of England; A.D. 1399 which, when a Man went alone, went as he went, and stayed as he stayed; sometimes like a Wheel, sometimes like a Barrel, sometimes like a Timber-log; but when many went together, it appeared to be afar off. Also in a Parliament Time there was a certain Image of Wax made by Necromancy (as was said) which at an Hour appointed, uttered these Words:

The Head shall be cut off; the Head shall be lifted up aloft; the Feet shall be lifted up above the Head; and then spake no more. This happened in the Parliament called the Marvellous Parliament, not long before the Parliament that wrought Wonders. In his one and thirtieth Year, a River, not far from Bedford, suddenly ceased its Course, so as the Channel remained dry by the Space of three Miles; which was adjudged to signify the revolting of the Subjects from their natural Prince. In his two and twentieth Year, almost through all England, all Bay-Trees withered, and afterwards grew green again, which was supposed to import some strange Event. About the Year 1380, the making of Guns was found by a German, which may well be reckoned amongst Casualties, seeing it was found by Casualty; for this German having beaten Brimstone and Salt-petre in a Mortar to Powder, and covered it with a Stone, it happened that as he struck Fire, a Spark chanced to fall into the Powder, which caused such a Flame out of the Mortar, that it raised the Stone a great height; which, after he perceived, he made a Pipe of Iron, and tempering the Powder with Coal beaten to Dust, finished that deadly Engine. The first that used it were the Venetians against the Inhabitants of Genoa.

An Image of Wax, made by Necromancy, spake certain Words.

All Bay-Trees withered, and after grew green again. Guns found about this Time by a German.

Of his Wives.

KING Richard in his Time had two Wives, the first was Anne, Daughter to the Emperor Charles the Fourth, and Sister to the Emperor Wenceslaus, who lived his Wife ten Years, and died without Issue at Sheene in Surrey, in the Year 1392; whose Death King Richard took so heavily, that he caused the Buildings of that Palace to be thrown down and defaced; as tho' to revenge himself upon the Place, could ease his Mind, and mitigate his Sorrow. His second Wife was Isabel, Daughter of Charles the Sixth, King of France; she was married to him at eight Years of Age, and therefore never cohabited. After King Richard's Death she was sent home, and married to Charles, Son and Heir to the Duke of Orleans.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was the goodliest Personage of all the Kings that had been since the Conquest; tall of Stature, of streight and strong Limbs, fair and amiable of Countenance, and such a one as might well be the Son of a most beautiful Mother. Concerning his Conditions, there was more to be blamed in his Education than in his Nature; for there appeared in him many good Inclinations, which would have grown to be Abilities, if they had not been perverted by corrupt Flatterers in his Youth. He was of a credulous Dispo-

A.D. 1399 Disposition, apt to believe, and therefore easy to be abused. His greatest Transgression was, that he went with his Friends ultra aras, where he should have gone but usque ad aras; his greatest Imbecility, that he could not distinguish between a Flatterer and a Friend. He seemed to have in him both a French Nature and an English; violent at the first Apprehension, calm upon Deliberation. He never shewed himself more worthy of the Government, than when he was deposed as unworthy to govern; for it appeared, that his Regality was not so dear unto him as a private quiet Life; which, if he might have enjoyed, he would never have complained that Fortune had done him wrong.

Of his Death and Burial.

Starved. KING Richard, after his Resignation, was conveyed to the Castle of Leeds in Kent, and from thence to Pomfret; where the common Fame is, That he was served with costly Meat, like a King, but not suffered once to touch it, and so died of forced Famine. But Thomas Walsingham referreth it altogether to a voluntary pining of himself, through Grief of his Misfortunes. But one Writer, well acquainted with King Richard's Doings, saith, That King Henry sitting one Day at his Table, said, sighing, Have I no faithful Friend that will deliver me of him who will be my Death? This Speech was specially noted by one Sir Piers Exton, who presently, with eight Persons in his Company, went to Pomfret, commanding the Esquire that took the Assay before King Richard, to do so no more, saying, Let him eat now, for he shall not eat long. King Richard sitting down to Dinner, was served without Assay; whereat marvelling, he demanded of his Esquire, why he did not his Duty; Sir, said he, I am otherwise commanded by Sir Piers Exton, who is newly come from King Henry. When King Richard heard that Word, he took the Carving Knife in his Hand, and struck the Esquire on the Head, saying, The Devil take Henry of Lancaster and thee together: And with that Word Sir Piers entered the Chamber with eight armed Men, every of them having a Bill in his Hand. King Richard perceiving this, put the Table from him, and stepping to the foremost Man, wrung the Bill out of his Hands, and slew four of those that thus came to assail him; but in Conclusion was felled with a Stroke of a Poll-axe, which Sir Piers gave him upon the Head, with which Blow he fell down dead: Though it be scarce credible, that a Man upon his bare Word, and without shewing any Warrant, should be admitted to do such a Fact. Sir Piers having thus slain him, wept bitterly: A poor Amends for so heinous a Trepass. King Richard thus dead, his Body was embalmed, and covered with Lead, all save the Face, and then brought to London, where it lay at St. Paul's three Days together, that all Men A.D. 1399 might behold it, to see he was dead. The Corpse was after had to Langley in Buckinghamshire, and there buried in the Church of the Friars Preachers: But afterward, by King Henry the Fifth, it was removed to Westminster, and there honourably entombed with Queen Anne, his Wife, and that beautiful Picture of a King, sitting crowned in a Chair of State, at the upper End of the Choir in St. Peter's at Westminster, is of him: Although the Scots untruly write, that he escaped out of Prison, and led a solitary and virtuous Life in Scotland, and there died, and is buried (as they hold) in the Black-Friars at Sterling. He lived three and thirty Years, reigned two and twenty and three Months.

Men of Note in his Time.

MEN of Valour in his Time were so many, that to reckon them all would be a hard Task, and to leave out any would be an Injury; yet to give an Instance in one, we may take John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, whose Valour was no less seen abroad than at home, in France, in Germany, in Spain; in all which Places he left Trophies of his Victories. But of learned Men we may name these: William Thorne, an Augustin Frier of Canterbury, an Historiographer; Adam Merimouth, a Canon of St. Paul's Church in London, who wrote two Historical Treatises, one entituled Chronicon 40 Annorum; another Chronicon 60 Annorum; William Packington, sometimes Secretary to the Black Prince, an excellent Historiographer; William Badby, a Carmelite Frier, Bishop of Worcester, and Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster; John Bourg, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; William Sclade, a Monk, of Buckfast Abby in Devonshire; John Thorisbury, Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellor of England, and a Cardinal; William Berton, Chancellor of Oxford, an Adversary to Wickliffe; Philip Pepinton, Abbot of Leicester, a Defender of Wickliffe; Walter Brit, a Scholar of Wickliffe's, a Writer both in Divinity and other Arguments; John Sharp, a great Adversary to Wickliffe, who wrote many Treatises; Peter Patesbul, a great Favourer of Wickliffe; Marcel Ingelno, an excellent Divine, one of the first Teachers in the University of Heydelberg; Richard Withee, a learned Priest, and an earnest Follower of Wickliffe; John Swasbam, Bishop of Bangor, a great Adversary to the Wickliffists; Adam Eston, a great Linguist, and a Cardinal; John Trewise, a Cornish-man, and a secular Priest, who translated the Bible; Bartholomew, De Proprietatibus Rerum; John Moon, an English-man, but a Student in Paris, who compiled in the French Tongue, *The Romant of the Rose; translated into English by Geoffry Chaucer, and divers others.

L I F E and R E I G N of King H E N R Y IV.

A.D. 1399

AFTER the Resignation of King Richard and the Sentence of his Deposing openly read in Parliament, Henry Duke of Lancaster riseth up from his Seat; and first, making the Sign of the Cross upon his Forehead and Breast, he said, In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster claim the Crown of England, as descended by right Line from King Henry the Third: And having thus spoken, he sat down again. Upon this the Archbishop conferred with the Lords, and having heard their Opinions, he turned to the Commons, asking them, if they would join with the Lords in choosing Henry of Lancaster for their King; who all with one Voice cried, Yea, Yea: Whereupon going to the Duke, he bowed his Knee, and taking him by the Hand, led him to the Royal Seat; and then began a Sermon, taking for his Text, out of the first Book of the Kings, Cap. ix. Vir dominabitur in populo: Wherein he declared what a Happiness it is to a Nation to have a King of Wisdom and Valour, and shewed the Duke of Lancaster to be such a one; and as much the Defects in both, of the late King Richard. The Sermon ended, the King thanked them all for his Election, and testified to them, That he meant not to take Advantage against any Man's Estate, as coming in by Conquest; but that every one should freely enjoy his own, as in Times of lawful Succession. And now a Time was appointed for his Coronation; accordingly, upon the thirteenth Day of October following, the very Day wherein the Year before he had been banished, he was Crowned at Westminster by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Ceremonies accustomed. At his Coronation he was anointed with an Oil which a Religious Man had given to Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, together with this Prophecy, That the Kings anointed with this Oil should be the Champions of the Church. This Oil coming to the Hands of King Richard, as he was looking amongst his Jewels, going then into Ireland, he was desirous to be anointed with it, but that the Archbishop of Canterbury told him, it was not lawful to be anointed twice: Whereupon putting it up again, at his coming afterwards to Flint, the Archbishop got it of him, and kept it till the Coronation of King Henry, who was the first King of the King Henry claims the Crown, as descended from King Henry the Third.

He is Crowned the very Day wherein the Year before he had been banished.

Realm that was anointed with it. The Day A.D. 1399 before the Coronation, the King in the Tower made one and forty, some say but twelve Knights of the Bath, whereof four were his own Sons, Henry, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, all then alive; and with them, three Earls, and five Barons. Upon the Feast-day, many claimed Offices, as belonging to their Tenures; to which, upon shewing their Right, they were admitted. And now the King made divers new Officers: The Earl of Northumberland he made Constable of England; the Earl of Westmorland was made Lord-Marshal; Sir John Serle, Chancellor; John Newbery Esquire, Treasurer: And Sir Richard Clifford was made Lord-Keeper of the Privy-Seal. The Lord Henry, his eldest Son being then about thirteen Years of Age, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, and soon after also Duke of Aquitain: And the Crown was by Parliament entailed to King Henry, and the Heirs of his Body lawfully begotten.

Anointed with a special Oil.

After this a Parliament is holden, in which the Acts made in the eleventh Year of King Richard were revived, and the Acts made in his one and twentieth Year were wholly repealed; and they who by that Parliament were attainted, were restored to their Lands and Honours: Whereupon Richard Earl of Warwick was delivered out of Prison, and the Earl of Arundel's Son recovered his Inheritance; and many other also that were banished, or imprisoned by King Richard, were then fully restored to their Liberty and Estates. Also the King gave to the Earl of Westmorland the County of Richmond, and to the Earl of Northumberland the Isle of Man, to be holden of him by bearing the Sword wherewith he entred into England. And now was the Time for shewing of Spleens. Sir John Bagot then Prisoner in the Tower, accused the Earl of Aumerle for speaking Words against the Duke of Lancaster, now King; also the Lord Fitzwalter accused him for the Death of the Duke of Gloucester. The Lord Morley appealed the Earl of Salisbury of Treason; and one Hall accused the Duke of Exeter for conspiring the Death of John of Gaunt, the King's Father: But King Henry having entred a Throne in a Storm, was willing now to have a Calm; and therefore laying aside the one's Accusations, he accepted of the other's Excuses, and received Accusations against many, but connived at by the King.

A.D. 1399 received the Duke of Aumerle and the Duke of Exeter into as much Favour as if they had never been accused.

King Henry acquaints foreign Princes by what Title he came to the Crown.

And to qualify the hard Opinion which foreign Princes might conceive of King Richard's Deposing, he sent Ambassadors into divers Countries, to make it known by what Title, and by what Favour of the People he came to the Kingdom. To the Court of Rome he sent John Trenevant, Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheyney, Kt. and John Cheyney, Esq. Into France he sent Walter Sherlow, Bishop of Durham, and Thomas Piercy, Earl of Worcester. Into Spain he sent John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, and Sir William Parre; and into Germany he sent the Bishop of Bangor and certain others. Most of these Princes seemed either not to regard what was done, or were easily persuaded that all was done well: Only Charles King of France was so distemper'd with this Indignity offered to his Son-in-law King Richard, that by Violence of his Passion he fell into his old Pangs of Frensy; but somewhat recovered, he resolved to revenge it; wherein many Lords of France shewed themselves forward, but especially the Earl of St. Paul, who had married King Richard's half-Sister: Yet having prepared an Army in readiness, when afterward they heard of King Richard's Death, they dissolved it again, as considering the Time was then past. The Aquitains also, and specially the Citizens of Bordeaux, as being the Place where King Richard was born, were mightily incensed: But Sir Robert Knowles, Lieutenant of Guyenne, and afterward Thomas Piercy, Earl of Worcester, being sent to them by the King, so persuaded them, that with much ado they continued in Obedience.

It was about this Time moved in Parliament what should be done with King Richard (for he was not as yet murdered) whereupon Thomas Merks, Bishop of Carlisle, a learned Man, and wise, and who never had given Allowance to the Deposing of King Richard, now that he was in a Place of Freedom of Speech, rose up and said;

The Bishop of Carlisle's bold Speech in behalf of K. Richard, and against King Henry.

"My Lords, The Matter now propounded is of marvellous Weight and Consequence, wherein there are two Points chiefly to be considered; the First, Whether King Richard be sufficiently put out of his Throne: The Second, Whether the Duke of Lancaster be lawfully taken in. For the first, How can that be sufficiently done, when there is no Power sufficient to do it? The Parliament cannot, for of the Parliament the King is the Head; and can the Body put down the Head? You will say, But the Head may bow it self down; and may not the King resign? It is true; but what Force is in that which is done by Force? And who knows not that King Richard's Resignation was no other? But suppose he be sufficiently out, yet how comes the Duke of Lancaster to be lawfully in? If you say by Conquest, you speak Treason; for what Conquest without Arms? And can a Subject take Arms against his lawful Sovereign, and not be Treason? If you say, by Election of the State, you speak not Reason; for what Power hath the State to elect, while any is living

A.D. 1399 "that hath Right to succeed? But such a Successor is not the Earl of Lancaster, as descended from Edmund Crouchback, the elder Son of King Henry the Third, tho' put by the Crown for Deformity of his Body; for who knows not the Falseness of this Allegation? Seeing it is a Thing notorious, that this Edmund was neither the elder Brother, nor yet Crook-back'd (though called so for some other Reason) but a goodly Personage, and without any Deformity. And your selves cannot forget a Thing so lately done, who it was that in the fourth Year of King Richard was declared by Parliament to be Heir to the Crown, in case King Richard should die without Issue; but why then is not that Claim made? Because, Silent leges inter arma, What disputing Titles against the Stream of Power? But howsoever it is extreme Injustice that King Richard should be condemned without being heard, or once allowed to make his Defence. And now, my Lords, I have spoken thus at this Time, that you may consider of it before it be too late; for as yet, it is in your Power to undo that justly which you have unjustly done.

Much to this Purpose was the Bishop's Speech, but to as little Purpose as if he had gone about to call back Yesterday. The Matter was too far gone, and scarce a Person there present that had not a Hope of either a private or publick Benefit by that which was done: Yet against this Speech of the Bishop there was neither Protesting nor Excepting; it passed in the House as but one Man's Opinion; and as for the King, it was neither fit he should use much Severity against any Member of that Parliament which had so lately shewed so much Indulgence towards him, nor indeed safe, to be too hot in his Punishment, when he was yet scarce warm in his Government: Yet for a Warning to use their Liberty of Speech with more Moderation hereafter, the Bishop was arrested by the Marshal, and committed to Prison in the Abby of St. Albans, but afterward without further Censure set at Liberty, till upon a Conspiracy of Lords, wherein he was a Party, he was condemned to die, tho' through Extremity of Grief he prevented Execution. But as for King Richard and Edward Mortimer, Earl of March, enough was spoken by the Bishop in both their Behalves to undo them both; and indeed King Richard was soon after made away; the Earl secured himself by retiring far off, to his Lordship of Wigmore, avoiding the Danger of Contention, by not entering the Lists of Aspiring. But although the Divine Providence, for Causes hidden from human Knowledge, gave way at this Time to the Advancement of the Younger, the House of Lancaster; yet in the third Generation after, the Elder, the House of Clarence recovered its Right in King Edward the Fourth, that we may know it is but staying the Leisure of Heaven, for every one to have his Right, either in Person, or by Proxy.

But whether incited by this Speech of the Bishop, or otherwise out of the Rancor of Envy in some, and Malice in others, it was not long after before there grew in the Minds of many, both Lords and others, a malignant Inclination towards

But did King Richard more hurt than good.

A.D. 1400 towards King Henry, and came first to be a Conspiracy in the House of the Abbot of Westminster. This Abbot was a kind of a Book-keeper, statesman, but better read in the Politicks of Aristotle than of Solomon; who remembering some Words of K. Henry, which he had spoken long before, when he was but Earl of Derby, That Princes had too little, and Religious Men too much; and fearing, lest being now King, he should reduce his Words into Act, he thought it better to use preventing Physick beforehand, than to stand to the Hazard of a curing afterward: And thereupon invited to his House the discontented Lords; as namely, John Holland, Duke of Exeter, Thomas Holland his Brother's Son, Duke of Surrey; Edward Duke of Aumerle, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Spencer, Earl of Gloucester, John Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Thomas Blunt, and Maudlin one of K. Richard's Chappel; who after Dinner conferring together, and communicating their Spleens against King Henry one with another, they resolved at last, both to take away the King's Life, and of the Way how to do it. The Device was this; They would publish a solemn Just to be holden at Oxford, at a Day appointed, and invite the King to honour it with his Presence; and there, in the Time of acting the Justs, when all Mens Intentions should be otherwise busied, they would have him be murdered. This Device was resolved on; Oaths for Secrecy were taken; and Indentures sextipartite for performing Conditions agreed upon between them, sealed and delivered. The Justs are proclaimed; the King is invited, and promiseth to come; Secrecy of all Hands kept most firmly to the very Day: But though all other kept Counsel, yet Fortune would not, but she discovered all; for it fortun'd, that as the Duke of Aumerle was riding to the Lords to Oxford, against the Day appointed, he took it in the Way to go visit his Father the Duke of York; and having in his Bosom the Indenture of Confederacy, his Father, as they sat at Dinner chanced to spy it, and asked what it was? To whom his Son answering, it was nothing that any way concerned him; By S. George saith his Father, but I will see it; and therewithal snatching it from him, read it; and finding the Contents, and reviling his Son for being now the second Time a Traitor, before to K. Richard, and now to King Henry, he commanded his Horses instantly to be made ready, and with all the Speed he could make, rode to Windsor, where the King then lay: But the younger Years of his Son out-rid him, and came to the Court before him; where locking the Gates, and taking the Keys from the Porter, pretending some special Reason, he went up to the King, and falling on his Knees, asked his Pardon. The King demanding for what Offence? He then discovered the whole Plot; which he had scarce done, when his Father came rapping at the Court-gates, and coming to the King, shewed him the Indenture of Confederacy which he had taken from his Son. This, tho' it amazed the King, yet it informed him of the Truth of the Matter, whereof he was before doubtful; and thereupon lays aside his Journey to see the Justings of others in jest, and takes Care that he be not justled in earnest out of his Throne himself. In the mean time the Confederate Lords being ready at Oxford, and hearing nothing of the Duke of Aumerle, nor seeing any Preparation for the King's coming, were certainly persuaded that their Treason was discovered. Whereupon falling into Consideration of the Case they were in, they found there was no Place left for them of Mercy, and therefore were to stand upon their Guard, and provide the best they could for their Safety. To which Purpose, the first Thing they did was to apparel Maudlin in Princely Robes, a Man as like to King Richard in Countenance and Personage as one Man lightly can be to another, and give forth that he was King Richard escaped out of Prison, thereby to countenance their Proceedings: The next Thing was to dispatch Messengers to the King of France, and require his Assistance. This done, they set forward in Battel-array towards Windsor, against King Henry; but finding him gone to London before they came, they then deliberated what Course to take: Some advised to set K. Richard at Liberty, before their counterfeit Richard should be discovered; others thought best to follow the King to London, and set upon him unprovided, and before he had gathered Forces. In this Division of Advices, when they could not do both, they did neither; but as Men amazed, marched on, though they knew not well whither, till they came to Colbrook: By which Time the King had gathered an Army of twenty thousand, and was marching towards them: But they not thinking so well of their Cause, that they durst put it to the Trial of a Battel; or, perhaps, staying for Aid out of France, withdrew themselves back to Sunnings near to Reading, where the young Queen lay; to whom their coming gave some Flashes of Comfort, but quenched before they were thoroughly kindled: And from thence they march to Cirencester, where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury took up their Lodging in one Inn, the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Gloucester in another. And now a strange Accident, beyond the Reach of all Consultation, gave a Period to their Design; for who would think that a private Company durst oppose those Lords, having their Army so near them? Yet the Bailiff of the Town (upon Intelligence no Doubt that these Lords were up in Arms against the King) taking with him a Company of Townsmen, in the Night assaulted the Inn where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury lay; who thus assaulted made Shift to defend themselves till three o' Clock in the Afternoon: But then being in Danger to be taken, a Priest, one of their Company, set divers Houses in the Town on Fire, thinking thereby to divert the Assailants from prosecuting the Lords to save their Houses: But this inflamed them the more; and so hotly they pursued their Assault, that they wounded the Duke and the Earl to Death; who dying that Night, their Heads were stricken off and sent up to London. With them also were taken Sir Bennet Shelly, Sir Bernard Brocas, Sir Thomas Blunt, and eight and twenty other Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, who were sent to Oxford, where the King then lay.

How discovered.

The Lords provide an Army, but are by the King dispersed.

By what Accident.

A.D. 1400 lay, and there were put to Execution. The Duke of Exeter in the other Inn, hearing of this Assault, fled out of the Backside towards the Camp, intending to bring the whole Army to the Rescue; but the Soldiers having heard a Clamour, and seeing Fire in the Town, supposing the King had been come with all his Forces, out of a sudden Fear dispersed themselves and fled; which the Duke seeing, he also with Sir John Shelly, fled into Essex, where wandering and lurking in secret Places, he was at last apprehended as he sat at Supper in a Friend's House, and led to Plashey, and there shortly after beheaded; the Place, where by his Counsel and Countenance, the Duke of Gloucester formerly had been apprehended: That we may observe how the divine Providence in revenging of Injuries takes Notice, and makes Use of the very Circumstance of Place where the Injuries are done. The Earl of Gloucester fled towards Wales, but was taken and beheaded at

Maudlin, the counterfeit King Richard, was apprehended and brought to the Tower, and afterwards hanged and quartered, with Mr. Fereby, another of King Richard's Chaplains. Divers other Lords, and Knights, and Gentlemen, and a great Number of mean Persons, were in other Places put to Death; that so much noble Blood, at one Time, and for one Cause, hath scarce been heard or read of. 1402.

Owen Glendour stirreth up the Welsh to rebel.

But now that the hot English Blood was well allayed, the Welsh Blood springs up as hot; for now Owen Glendour an Esquire of Wales brought up at the Inns of Court in London, partly out of a Desire to revenge a Wrong done him (as he conceived) in a Suit for Lands in Controversy between the Lord Grey of Ruthin and him; but chiefly out of an Humour of aspiring, endeavoured to draw the Welsh-men to a general Defection, telling them, that the English being at Variance amongst themselves, now was the Time to shake off their Yoke, and to resume their own antient Laws and Customs. To whose Persuasions the Welsh-men hearkening, made him their King and Captain; and he having gotten a competent Army, sets first upon his old Adversary Reynold Lord Grey of Ruthin, and takes him Prisoner; yet with Promise of Release, if he would marry his Daughter; which Offer, tho' the Lord Grey at first not only refused, but scorned, yet out of Necessity, at last he was contented to accept; when, notwithstanding his deceitful Father-in-law trifled out the Time of his Enlargement till he died. But the Welsh-men growing confident upon this Success, break into the Borders of Herefordshire, making Spoil and Prey A.D. 1402 of the Country as freely as if they had Leave to do it; for indeed none opposed them but only the Lord Edmund Mortimer, who had formerly withdrawn himself to the Castle at Wigmore, and having assembled the Forces of the Country, and joining Battel with them, was taken Prisoner, and then fettered and cast into a deep and vile Dungeon. It was thought, if Glendour had as well known how to use his Victory as to get it, he might at this Time have put the English Yoke into a great Hazard to be shaken off: But he having killed one thousand of the English, thought he had done enough for that Time, and so giving over the Pursuit, retired. The Inhumanity of the Welsh Women was here memorable, who fell upon the dead Carcasses of the English, first stripping them, and then cutting off their privy Parts and Noses; whereof the one they thrust into their Mouths, the other they pressed between their Buttocks. Many Noble Men, especially his Kinsmen the Piercies, solicited King Henry to deliver Mortimer; but the King was deaf of that Ear, he could rather have wished both him and his two Sisters in Heaven, for then he should be free from conceal'd Competitors.

These Affronts were at this Time suffered in the Welsh, because the King was now employed in a more dangerous Service with the Scots; for they taking Advantage of the Distraction of the Kingdom (as it was always their Custom to do) had made an Inroad into the Country of Northumberland, and suddenly one Night set upon the Castle of Werk, took and spoiled it, and then returned. In Revenge whereof, the English invaded and spoiled certain Islands of the Orkneys. Then the Scots set forth a Fleet, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Logan; but before he came to any Action, he was encountered, and the greatest Part of his Fleet taken. But these were but such Affronts as often happen between troublesome Neighbours; for all this while the Peace was still in Being between the Nations: But at last it brake out into an open War upon this Occasion. Robert The Peace King of Scots had offered to match his Son David between En- with a Daughter of George Earl of Dunbarre, gland and Scotland, how it broke out into open War. and had received Money of him in Part of her Portion; and afterward, would neither suffer the Match to proceed, nor yet pay back the Money; but married his Son to a Daughter of Archibald Earl of Douglafs. Upon which Indignity, George of Dunbarre flies into England to King Henry, and with his Aid, makes divers Incursions into Scotland: Whereupon Robert King of Scots sent to K. Henry, that if he would have the Truce between them to continue, he should deliver to him George of Dunbarre. K. Henry answered, That he had given him a safe Conduct, and could not now recall it with his Honour; but as for continuing the Truce, K. Robert might do in that what he thought best. Upon this Answer, the King of Scots presently proclaimed War against him; but King Henry, as ready in that Matter as he, stayed not for King Robert's invading of England; but himself with a puissant Army invaded Scotland, burning Castles and Cities, and not sparing Churches and Religious Houses. About the

A.D. 1402 the End of September, he besieged the Castle of Edenburgh, where Prince David, and the Earl of Douglas were: At which Time, Robert Duke of Albany, who in the King of Scots Sickneſs managed the Buſineſs, ſent an Herald to King Henry, proteſting upon his Honour, That if he would ſtay but fix Days he would give him Battel: King Henry rewarded the Herald, and ſtayed; but ſix Times ſix Days paſſed, but neither the Duke of Albany, nor any other for him appeared. And now Winter came on, Victuals grew ſcant, and which was worſe, a Mortality began in the Engliſh Camp, for which Cauſes King Henry removed his Siege and returned into England. As ſoon as he was gone, Sir Patrick Hepbourn a Scottiſh Man, having a good Opinion of his Valour, thought to do great Matters; and with a competent Army of the Men of Lough-dean, he invaded Northumberland, making great Spoil, and loading his Soldiers with Prey and Priſoners; but in the Retreat marching looſly and licentious, was ſet upon by the Earl of Northumberland, Vice-Warden, where Hepbourn himſelf and all the Flower of Lough-dean were ſlain, Sir John and William Cockbourn, Sir William Buſſe, John and Thomas Habington, Eſquires, and a Multitude of Common Soldiers taken Priſoners; on the Engliſh Part few ſlain, and none of any Rank or Quality: In Revenge whereof, Archibald Douglas with an Army of twenty thouſand entred Northumberland; but in a Place called Hamildon, were encountered by the Engliſh, under the Leading of Henry Lord Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, and George Earl of March, who put them to Flight, and after the Slaughter of ten thouſand of them, took five hundred Priſoners; whereof the chief were Mordack Earl of Fife (Son of the General, who in the Fight loſt one of his Eyes) Thomas Earl of Murray, Robert Earl of Angus, the Earls of Athol and Monteith; and amongſt the Slain, were Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gordon, Sir John Leviſton, Sir Alexander Ramſey, and three and twenty other Knights.

The French aid Owen Glendour, but without Succels.

In this mean Time, Glendour of Wales had ſolicited the King of France for Aid, who ſent him twelve hundred Men of Quality, but the Winds were ſo contrary, that they loſt twelve of their Ships, and the reſt returned home: The Engliſh deriding this ill Succels of the French, ſo exaſperated the French King, that preſently after he ſent twelve thouſand, who landed ſafely, and joined with the Welſh; but as ſoon as they heard of the Engliſh Army's Approach, whether miſtruſting their own Strength, or ſuſpecting the Welſhmen's Faithfulneſs, they ran to their Ships, and diſgracefully went home.

King Henry marries the Lady Jane de Navarre, the Relict of John Montford, ſurnamed the Conqueror.

King Henry's Ambaſſadors lately ſent into Britain to fetch the Lady Jane de Navarre, Ducheſs of Britain, the Relict of John de Montford, ſurnamed the Conqueror, with whom the King by Procurations had contracted Matrimony, in the Beginning of February returned with her in Safety: The King met her at Wincheſter, where the ſeventh of February the Marriage was ſolemnized.

About this Time ſome Affronts were offered by the French. Valerian Earl of St. Paul, with 1700 Men landed in the Iſle of Wight, where he burnt two Villages and ſome few Cottages; but hearing the People of the Iſland to have aſſembled, he made haſte to his Ships, and returned home. Alſo John Earl of Clermont (the Heir of A.D. 1402 Bourbon) won from the Engliſh the Caſtles of St. Peter, St. Mary, and the New Caſtle: The Lord De la Brett won the Caſtle of Calafin; Places of great Conſequence to the Engliſh.

And now to make King Henry ſenſible that a Crown can hardly ever ſit eaſy upon the Head, if it be not ſet on right at firſt, a new Conſpiracy is hatching againſt him. The Piercies, Earls of Northumberland and Worceſter, with Henry Hotſpur, began about this Time to fall off from K. Henry; their Reaſon was, Firſt, becauſe the King at their Requeſt reſuſed to redeem their Kinſman Mortimer from Glendour's Slavery; and then becauſe he denied them the Benefit of ſuch Priſoners as they had taken of the Scots: Whereupon they went of themſelves, and procured Mortimer's Delivery, and then entred into a League offensive and defensive with Glendour; and by their Proxies, in the Houſe of the Archdeacon of Bangor, they agreed upon a Tripartite Indenture under their Hands and Seals, to divide the Kingdom into three Parts; whereby all England from Severn and Trent, South and Eaſtward, was assigned for the Portion of the Earl of March; all Wales and the Lands beyond the Severn Weſtward, were assigned to Owen Glendour: And all the Remainder of Land from Trent Northward, to be the Portion of the Lord Piercy. In this, as Glendour perſuaded them, they thought they ſhould accompliſh a Prophecy; as tho' King Henry were the Mouldwarp curſed of God's own Mouth, and they were the Lion, the Dragon and the Wolf which ſhould divide the Land among them: In this mean Time King Henry, not acquainted with this Conſpiracy, cauſed a Proclamation to be made, intimating that the Earl of March had voluntarily cauſed himſelf to be taken Priſoner, to the End, the Rebels having him in their Cuſtody, might pretend ſome Colour for their Conſpiracy; and therefore he had ſmall Reaſon to take Care for his Deliverance. Hereupon the Piercies aſſiſted with a Company of Scots, and drawing to their Party the Earl of Stafford and Richard Scroop Archbiſhop of York, and many others, purpoſed to join with the Captain of the Welſh; but firſt they framed certain Articles againſt the King, and ſent them to him in Writing, That he had falſified his Oath given at his Landing, ſwearing, That he came but only to recover his Inheritance, and would not meddle with the King, or with the Crown: That moſt traiterouſly he had taken Arms againſt his Sovereign Lord, imprifoned him, and then moſt barbarouſly cauſed him to be murdered: That ever ſince the Death of King Richard he had unjuſtly kept the Crown from his Kinſman Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, to whom of Right it belonged: That upon no Occaſion he had impoſed divers Taxes upon the People: That by his Letters he procured Burgeſſes and Knights of the Parliament to be choſen; for which Cauſes, and many other, they deſied him, and vowed his Deſtruction, and the Reſtoring of the Earl of March to his Right. King Henry could not but know, that all theſe Articles againſt him were true; yet ſeeing the Knowing it hindered him not from ſeeking to get the Crown when he had it not, it could leiſ hinder him from ſeeking

Another Conſpiracy hatching againſt King Henry, and why.

Articles framed by the Lords againſt King Henry, and ſent unto him.

A.D. 1402 ing to keep it now that he had it; and if he were able, being a private Man, to get it from a King, he was likely to be more able, being now a King, to keep it from private Men; and as for any Objections that Conscience could make, he had enough to answer them all; for, if his Title were good against King Richard by his Resignation, it was good against Mortimer by his swearing Allegiance; and upon these Grounds, with a Mind as confident as if all Circumstances were of his Side, he raised an Army, and marched towards the Lords, taking care they might by no Means join with the Welsh; and about Shrewsbury, on Saturday, St. Mary Magdalen's Eve, he encountered them; in which Fight tho' the Scots and Henry Hotspur shewed much Valour, yet the Victory rested on the King's Side; Hotspur himself was slain, the Earl of Worcester was taken Prisoner, together with Sir Richard Vernon, Sir Theobald Trussel, the Baron of Kinderton, and the rest fled. On the King's Part (besides the Earl of Stafford, who had that Morning revolted from the Conspirators) were slain, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Cockayn, Sir Nicholas Causell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverley, Sir John Maffie of Puddington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, and Sir Robert Gausell; all which had been but that Morning dubbed Knights, with Sir Thomas Wendesley, who died afterwards of his Wounds; of Common Soldiers about 1600; but of the Conspirators above 6000, whereof 36 the King slew with own Hands, but was once unhorsed by Douglas, who in his Presence slew Sir Walter Blunt, with divers others, that Day in all things attired like to the King; for which Exploit, Douglas (being after by the Fall off his Horse taken Prisoner) was by the King's Command carefully attended, and without Ransom set at Liberty. In this Battel, the young Prince Henry, tho' wounded in his Face with an Arrow, yet was not wounded in his Courage, but continued Fighting still. After this Victory the King caused publick Thanks to be given to God, and then caused the Earl of Worcester to be beheaded, and many other of that Rebellion to be drawn, hanged and quartered, and their Heads placed on London-Bridge: And then the King sent his Son Henry Prince of Wales, with his whole Army into that Country; but before his coming, Owen Glendour was abandoned by all his Company, and lurking in the Woods, was there famished: Many of his Associates were taken and put to Death. Whilst the Prince was in Wales, Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, of his own Accord, came and submitted himself to the King, protesting his Innocency, as not being once acquainted with any Intent of Treason and Rebellion; whose Excuse the King received for the present with gentle Language, the rather for that he had the Possession of Berwick Castle, and other Places of Strength in his Power: But yet he wiped not off the Score of his Misdemeanors out of his Mind.

And now with the fourth Year of his Reign ended all the great Troubles of this King Henry the Fourth: Those that follow are but such Accidents as are frequent in all Times both abroad and at home. The Britains under the Leading of the Lord Du Castile, spoiled the Town of

Plimouth: In Revenge whereof, the Western-A.D. 1404 men, under Command of William Wilford, set forth a Fleet, which arriving in Britain, took forty Ships laden with Oil and Wines, and burnt forty more. Again, the French landed a thousand Men in the Isle of Wight, where they got together a great Booty of Cattle, but the Islanders coming upon them took away their Booty, and made many of them leave their Carkasses for a Booty to the Island: Yet the French would not leave so; but a while after, as having gotten new Spirits, they cast Anchor before the Isle of Wight, and require no less than to have the Island into their Possession; but a resolute Answer of the Islanders frightened them away, and made them glad they were gone. Soon after this the Duke of Orleans, Brother to the French King, in a vaunting Stile, sent a Challenge to King Henry to meet him in the Field, each of them to have a Hundred in his Company: To which the King answered, That for his own Valour it had sufficiently been tried; and for this Challenge of the Duke's, neither the Person nor the Cause were worthy of his Undertaking. Upon this Refusal of the King's, divers Taunts and Jeers were bandied between them, till at last the Duke in great Passion falls upon Vergie, a Town in Guyenne, but after three Months assaulting it, being valiantly defended by Sir Robert Antfield and 300 English-men, he was glad to give over with Loss, and return into France. Presently upon this the Admiral of Britain, accompanied with the Lord Du Castile, and thirty Sale of Ships, attempted to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire, but were repelled, and the Lord Du Castile, and two of his Brothers, and four hundred of his Men were slain, besides two hundred taken Prisoners; of whom the Lord Baquavile, Marshal of Britain, was one. After this five hundred Men of Arms, five hundred Crossbows, and a thousand Flemmings, under the Conduct of the Earl of St. Paul, laid Siege to the Castle of Marque, three Leagues from Calais; but first by Sir Philip Hall Captain of Calais, and after by Sir Richard Aylon Lieutenant of the English Pale, they were forced to retire and fly: The Earl of St. Paul escaped to St. Omer, but left many of his Men of Quality behind him, and more taken Prisoners. After this Thomas Duke of Clarence, the King's second Son, and the Earl of Kent, with competent Forces entred the Haven of Sluice, where they burnt four Ships riding at Anchor, and returned to the Relief of Calais, besieged at that Time by the French; and in the way took three Carricks of Genoua richly laden, and brought them into the Chamber of Rye: And these were the Troubles of this King abroad. About this Time a Parliament was assembled at Coventry, which by some was called the Unlearned Parliament, because the Sheriffs were appointed, that none should be chosen Knights for the Counties, nor Burgeffes for the Cities and Towns, that had any Skill of the Laws of the Land.

But now at home the Relicks of the former Northern Rebellion began to revive; for now Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, Richard Scroop Archbishop of York, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marshal, the Lords Hastings, Falconbridge, and Bardolf, with divers others, conspired

Another Conspiracy against King Henry.

A.D. 1405 red at a Time appointed, to meet upon York-Would-downs, and there bid Defiance to King Henry. Articles of Grievances were framed, and set up in all publick Places, which drew Multitudes to be Partakers of the Enterprize. But now Ralph Nevil, Earl of Westmorland, with the Lord John, the King's third Son, the Lord Henry-Fitz Hughes, Ralph Evers, and Robert Umphrevile make Head against them; and coming into a Plain in the Forest of Galltree, they sat down right against the Arch-Bishop and his Forces, which were twenty thousand; and Westmorland perceiving the Enemies Forces to be far more than theirs, he used this Policy: He sent to the Archbishop, demanding the Reason why he would raise Forces against the King? Who answering, That his Arms were not against the King, but for his own Defence, whom the King upon the Instigation of Sy-cophants had threatned: Withal he sent him a Scroll of their Grievance, which Westmorland read, and seemed to approve, and thereupon desired a Conference with him. The Archbishop more credulous than wise, persuaded the Earl-Marshal to go with him to the Place appointed to confer. The Articles are read and allowed of; and thereupon Westmorland seeming to commiserate the Soldiers, having been in Armour all Day, and weary, wished the Archbishop to acquaint his Party, as he would his, with this their mutual Agreement; and so shaking Hands, in most Courtly Friendship drank unto him. Whereupon the Souldiers were willed to disband, and repair Home; which they had no sooner done, but a Troop of Horse, which in a colourable Manner had made a Shew to depart, wheeled about, and afterward returned, and being come in Sight of the Earl of Westmorland, arrested both the Archbishop and the Earl-Marshal, and brought them both Prisoners to the King at Pomfret; who passing from thence to York, the Prisoners likewise were carried thither, and the next Day both of them beheaded. At Durham the Lords Hastings and Falconbridge, with two Knights were executed. Northumberland, with the Lord Bardolph, fled first to Berwick, and after into Scotland, where they were entertained by David Lord Flemming; whereupon the King gave Summons to the Castle of Berwick; which at first they refused to obey, but upon the planting and discharging of a Piece, they presently yielded without Composition; and here William Greystock, Henry Baynton, and John Blinkensop, Knights, and five others, were presently put to Execution, and many others committed to several Prisons. About this Time James, Son and Heir of Robert King of Scotland, a Child of nine Years old, attended by the Earl of Orkney, as he was sailing into France, was taken by certain Mariners of Norfolk, who brought him to the King at Windsor, the 30th of March, 1408, and the King sent them to the Tower of London.

But by a Policy of the Earl of Westmorland defeated.

The Archbishop of York, and Mowbray, Earl-Marshal, beheaded.

Northumberland and Bardolph, after they had been in Wales, France, and Flanders, to raise a Power against King Henry, returned back into Scotland; and after a Year with a great Power of Scots entered England, and came into York-shire, making great Spoil and Waste as they passed: But Sir Thomas Rokesby, Sheriff of York, levying the Forces of the County, upon Bramham-moor gave them Battel; in which Northumberland was slain, Bardolph taken, but wounded to Death, and the rest put to Flight. About this Time also Sir Robert Umphrevile, Vice-Admiral of England, with ten Men of War entered Scotland, burnt their Galiot, and many other Ships over-against Leith, and brought away with him fourteen tall Ships laden with Corn and other staple Commodities, which at his Return he sent into the Markets round about; and thereby brought down the Prices of all Things; and purchased to himself the Name of Mend-market.

The Prince had been a Student in Queen's Colledge in Oxford, under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that University, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln and Winchester, and lastly made a Cardinal, by the Title of St. Eusebius. From Oxford the Prince was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy, Earl of Worcester, was made his Governor: But coming afterward to be at his own disposing, whether being by Nature valorous, and yet not well stayed by Time and Experience; or whether incited by ill Companions, and emboldened by the Opinion of his own greatness, he ran into many Courses so unworthy of a Prince, that it was much doubted what he would prove when he once came to be King. It is said he lay in wait for the Receivers of his Father's Rents, and in the Person of a Thief, set upon them and robbed them. Another Time, when one of his Companions was arraigned for Felony before the Lord Chief Justice, he went to the King's Bench Bar, and offered to take the Prisoner away by Force; but being withstood by the Lord Chief Justice, he stepped to him, and struck him over the Face; whereat the Judge nothing abashed, rose up, and told him, That he did not this Affront to him, but to the King his Father, in whose Place he sat; and therefore to make him know his Fault, he commanded him to be committed to the Fleet. You would have wondered to see how calm the Prince was in his own Cause, who in the Cause of his Companion had been so violent! for he quietly obeyed the Judge's Sentence, and suffered himself to be lead to Prison. This Passage was a little pleasing to the King, to think that he had a Judge of such Courage, and a Son of such Submission: But yet for these and such other Pranks he removed him from being President of the Council, and placed in it his third Son John. This made the Prince so sensible of his Father's Displeasure, that he thought it necessary to seek by all means to recover his good Opinion; which he endeavoured to do by a Way as strange as that by which he lost it; for attiring himself in a Garment of blue Sattin, wrought all with Eylet-holes of Black Silk, at every Hole the Needle hanging by which it was sewed, and about his Arm a Thing in Fashion of a Hound's Collar, studded with SS of Gold, he came to the Court at Westminster; to whom the King (though not well in Health) caused himself, in a Chair, to be brought into his Privy Chamber; where in Presence of but three or four of his Privy Council, he demanded of the Prince the Cause of his unwonted Habit and coming; who answered, That being not only his Subject, but his Prince Henry's disorderly Courses.

A.D. 1410 his Son, and a Son always so tenderly regarded by him, he were worthy of a thousand Deaths if he should intend, or but imagine the least Offence to his Sacred Majesty; and therefore had fitted himself to be made a Sacrifice; and therewithal reached his Dagger, holding it by the Point to his Father: For, said he, I desire not to live longer than I may be thought to be what I am, and shall ever be your faithful and obedient Vassal. With this, or the like Answer, the King was so moved, that he fell upon his Son's Neck, and with many Tears embracing him, confessed that his Ears had been too open to receive Reports against him; and promising faithfully, That from thenceforth no Reports should cause any Disaffection toward him. The King about this Time made his Son John, Duke of Bedford, and his Son Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester; he made also Sir Thomas Beaufort Earl of Dorset, and the Earl of Arundel he created Duke of York.

K. Henry takes upon him the Crusado.

The rest of K. Henry's Days, from this Time forward, being scarce a Year, was free from all Trouble both Abroad and at Home, unless perhaps he might be troubled in Mind for having shed so much English and noble Blood; for Expiation whereof, or else to the End he might join Valour and Devotion in one Action together, which hitherto he but used singly, he took upon him the Crusado; and at a Council in White-friers, Order was taken, and great Preparation was made for his Journey to Jerusalem: But it was otherwise decreed in Heaven, and yet not so otherwise, but that he ended his Life in Jerusalem, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Of his Taxations.

IN the very Beginning of his Reign, it might pass instead of a Taxation, that he found in K. Richard's Coffers, in Money and Jewels, to the Value of seven hundred thousand Pounds. In his fourth Year, an extraordinary Subsidy was granted him; twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee, and of every one that had twenty Shillings a Year in Land, twelve Pence, and upward, according to that Rate; and of every one that had twenty Pounds in Goods, twelve Pence and upward, according to that Rate; but with Caution and Protestation, that it should not hereafter be drawn for a Precedent; and that no Record thereof should be made. In his sixth Year the Clergy granted to the King a Tenth. In his seventh Year, the Clergy granted a Tenth and a half, and the Commons two Fifteenths. In a Parliament holden the ninth Year of his Reign, the King moved to have allowed him in every Year wherein there was no Parliament kept, a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity; to which Demands the Bishops assented, but the Commons would not. In his seventh Year a Parliament began which lasted almost a whole Year, in which a Subsidy was at last granted; so sharp, that even Priests and Friars who lived of Alms, were forced every one to pay a Noble.

Of Laws and Ordinances made in his Time.

Controversies in Religion first punished by Burning.

IN this King's Days, Burning and Execution by Fire for Controversies in Religion was first put in Practice.

Also in the first Year of his Reign, an Act was made, that no Person of what Degree soever, should after that Day alledge for his Excuse, any Constraint or Coarcting of his Prince for doing of any unlawful Act; and that such Excuse, after that Day, should stand him in no Stead.

Also an Act was made, That no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their Household and Menial Servants. In his twelfth Year, the King caused a new Coin of Nobles to be made, which was of less Value than the old Noble by four Pence.

Also that all Ripiers, and other Fishers from any of the Sea-coasts, should sell their Fish in Cornhill and Cheapside themselves, and not to Fishmongers that would buy to sell again.

Also this King instituted the Duchy Court, which he did in Honour of the House of Lancaster, to the End the Lands belonging to the Duchy, might in all following Times be distinguished and known from the Lands of the Crown. In his seventh Year, the Mayor of London, for Preservation of Fish, obtained, that all Weirs which stood between London and seven Miles beyond Kingston, as also such as stood between London and Gravesend, should be pulled up and taken away.

The Duchy Court instituted by K. Henry.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

BY Reason of Discord between John of Gaunt and Wickham Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop either in Durance could not, or in Fear durst not come to the Parliament-House at a Time when the King required a Supply of Money; but the Clergy unanimously affirming, That without their Brother, the Bishop of Winchester's Presence, they neither can, nor will consult of any thing; he is presently sent for, and by the King secured. In the Parliament last mentioned, the Commons presented a Petition to the King and the Upper House, desiring that the King might have the temporal Possessions of the Bishops and Clergy; the Value whereof they pretended would be sufficient Maintenances for an hundred and fifty Earls, one thousand five hundred Knights, six thousand two hundred Esquires, and an hundred Hospitals for maimed Soldiers. They craved likewise, that Clerks convict should not be delivered to the Bishops Prison; and that the Statute made in the second Year of the King against Lollards might be repealed. But the King denied their Petition, and in Person commanded them from thenceforth not to presume to trouble their Brains about any such Business, for he was resolved to leave the Church in as good State as he found it. In the twelfth Year of his Reign certain learned Men in Oxford in their Sermons maintained the Opinions of Wickliffe, but the Bishops and Doctors of the University inhibited and condemned them. In his Time was great Schism in the Church, by Reason of two Anti-popes; but afterwards in an Assembly of Cardinals and Bishops, a third Man was elected, named Alexander the fifth, who had been trained up at Oxford.

The temporal Possessions of the Clergy required to be given to the King; and how great it was.

Works of Piety done in his Time.

A.D. 1412 KING Henry founded a College at Battlefield in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Percy. In his third Year the Conduit upon Cornhil was begun to be built. Also in his Time Sir Robert Knowles made the Stone-Bridge of Rocheſter in Kent; and founded in the Town of Pomfret a College and an Hoſpital: He alſo re-edified the Body of the White-Friers Church in Fleetſtreet, where he was afterward buried; which Church was firſt founded by the Anceſtors of the Lord Grey of Codnor. In the eighth Year of his Reign, Richard Whittington, Mayor of London, erected an Houſe or Church in London, to be a Houſe of Prayer, and named it after his own Name, Whittington College, with Lodgings and Weekly Allowance for divers poor People. He alſo builded the Gate of London, called Newgate, in the Year 1420. He builded alſo more than Half of St. Bartholomew's Hoſpital in Weſt-Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Grey-Friers in London, now called Chriſt's Hoſpital. He alſo builded a great Part of the Eaſt-end of Guild-hall, and a Chappel adjoining to it, with a Library of Stone, for the Cuſtody of the Records of the City. But he that exceeded all at this Time in Works of Piety, was William Wickham, Biſhop of Wincheſter. His firſt Work was the building of a Chappel at Tichfield, where his Father, Mother, and Siſter of Perrot were buried: Next he founded at Southwick in Hampſhire, near the Town of Wickham, the Place of his Birth, as a Supplement to the Priory of Southwick, a Chauntry, with Allowance for five Priests for ever. He beſtowed twenty thouſand Marks in repairing the Houſes belonging to the Biſhoprick: He diſcharged out of Priſon in all Places of his Dioceſs, all ſuch poor Priſoners as lay in Execution for Debt under twenty Pounds: He amended all the High-ways from Wincheſter to London, on both Sides the River. After all this, on the fifth of March 1379, he began to lay the Foundation of that magnificent Structure in Oxford, called New-College, and in Perſon laid the firſt Stone thereof; in which Place before, there ſtood St. Neor's Hall, built by K. Alfred at St. Neor's Entreaty; and for the Affinity of the Name, came to be called New-College. In the Year 1387, on the 26th of March, he likewise in Perſon laid the firſt Stone of the like Foundation in Wincheſter, and dedicated the ſame as that other in Oxford to the Memory of the Virgin Mary. The Grocers in London purchaſed their Hall in Cunnyhope-Lane for 320 Marks, and then laid the Foundation thereof on the tenth of May. King Henry founded the College of Foderingbey in Northamptonſhire; to which King Henry the Fifth gave Land of the Priories of Monks Aliens, by him ſuppreſſed.

IN his third Year, in the Month of March, appeared a Blazing-ſtar; firſt betwixt the Eaſt and the North, and then ſending forth fiery Beams towards the North; fore-ſhewing perhaps the Effuſion of Blood that followed after in Wales and Northumberland. In the ſame Year, at Danbury in Effex, the Devil appeared in Likeneſs of a Grey Frier; who entering the Church, put the People in great Fear, and the ſame Hour with a Tempeſt of Whirlwind and Thunder the Top of the Steeple was broken down, and half the Chancel ſcattered abroad. In his ſeventh Year, ſuch Abundance of Water brake ſuddenly over the Banks in Kent, that it drowned Cattle without Number. Alſo in this Year the Town of Royſton in Hertfordſhire was burnt. In his ninth Year was ſo ſharp a Winter, and ſuch abundance of Snow, continued December, January, February, and March, that almoſt all ſmall Birds died through Hunger.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE had two Wives, the firſt was Mary, one of the Daughters and Heirs of Humphrey de Bobun, Earl of Hereford, Effex, and Northampton; ſhe died before he came to the Crown, in the Year 1394. His ſecond Wife was Joan, Daughter to Charles the firſt King of Navarre, ſhe being the Widow of John de Montford, ſurnamed Streany, or the Conqueror, Duke of Brittain; who died without any Iſſue by King Henry, at Havering in Effex, the Year 1437, in the fifteenth Year of K. Henry the Sixth, and lieth buried by her Husband at Canterbury. He had four Sons and two Daughters; of his Sons, Henry his eldeſt was Prince of Wales, and, after his Father, King of England. His ſecond Son was Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Steward of England; who was ſlain at Beaufort in Anjou, and died without Iſſue. His third Son was John Duke of Bedford; he married firſt with Anne, Daughter of John Duke of Burgundy, and ſecondly with Jacoba, Daughter of Peter of Luxemburgh, Earl of St. Paul, but died alſo without Iſſue. His fourth Son was Humphrey, by his Brother K. Henry the Fifth created Duke of Glouceſter, and was generally called the good Duke: He had two Wives, but died without Iſſue, in the Year 1446, and was buried at St. Albans; though the vulgar Opinion be, that he lies buried in St. Paul's Church. Of K. Henry the Fourth's Daughters, Blanch, the Elder, was married to Lewis Barbatus, Palatine of the Rhine, and Prince Elector; Philippa, his younger Daughter, was married to John King of Denmark and Norway.

A.D. 1412 Disposition, and one that stood more upon his own Legs than any of his Predecessors had done; in Cases of Difficulty not refusing, but not needing the Advice of others, which might confirm, but not better his own. He was neither merry nor sad, but both; best pleased when he was opposed, because this was like to do him Good by sharpening his Invention; most angry when he was flattered, because this was sure to do him hurt, by dulling his Judgment. No Man ever more loved, nor less doated upon a Wife than he: A good Husband, but not uxorious; that if there be Reins to that Passion, we may know he had them. It may be thought he affected the Crown, not so much out of Ambition, as out of Compassion, because he could not so well help the Oppressions of his Country being a Subject, as being a King; for otherwise we may truly say, he was a Loser by the Crown, being not so great for a King, as he was before for a Subject. The Crown rather was a Gainer by him, which hath ever since been the richer for his wearing it. We may think he was either weary of his Life, or longing for Death; for why else would he take upon him the Crusado, having been told by a skilful Soothsayer, That he should die in Jerusalem? But it seems he did not believe him.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the forty-sixth Year of his Age, having Peace both at home and abroad, and being of too active a Spirit to be idle, he took upon him the Crusado, and great Provision was made for his Journey to Jerusalem; but, alas, his Journey to Jerusalem required no such Provision; for being at his Prayers at St. Edward's Shrine, he was suddenly taken with an Apoplexy, and thereupon removed to the Abbot of Westminster's House, where recovering his Senses, and finding himself in a strange Place, he asked what Place it was? and being told that he was in the Abbot's House, in a Chamber called Jerusalem: Well then, said he, Lord have Mercy upon me, for this is the Jerusalem where a Soothsayer told me I should die. And here he died indeed, on the 20th Day of March, in the Year 1413, when he had lived six and forty Years, reigned thirteen and a half. It is worth remembring, that all the Time of his Sicknes, his Will was to have his Crown set upon his Bolster by him; and one of his Fits being so strong upon him, that all Men thought him directly dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crown; when suddenly the King recovering his Senses, missed his Crown, and asking for it, was told, the Prince had taken it; whereupon the Prince being called, came back with the Crown, and kneeling down, said, Sir, to all our Judgments, and to all our Grievs, you seemed directly dead, and therefore I took the Crown, as being my Right; but seeing, to all our Comforts, you live, I here deliver it much more joyfully than I took it, and pray God you may long live to wear it your self. Well, saith the King, sighing, what Right I had to it, God knows. But, saith the Prince, if you die King, my Sword shall maintain it to be my Right against all Opposers. Well, saith the King, I refer all to God; but I charge thee on my Blessing, That thou administer the Laws indifferently, avoid Flatterers, defer not to do A.D. 1412 Justice, or be sparing of Mercy: And then turning about, said, God bless thee, and have Mercy on me: And with those Words gave up the Ghost. His Body with all Funeral Pomp was conveyed to Canterbury, and there solemnly buried.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

OF Men of Valour in his Time, of whom there was Store, I shall need to say no more than what hath already been said in the Body of the Story; only I cannot but remember Sir Robert Knowles, who was born of mean Parentage, made himself famous over all Christendom, and dying at a Mannor of his in Norfolk, was brought to London, and buried in the Church of the White-Friers in London, which himself had re-edified. But for Men of Learning, I must set in the first Place, William Wickham, a Man of no Learning, yet well worthy to hold the Place. In relating of whose Life, I must have Leave to expatiate a little. His Father's Name was John Long, or, as some say, Perot; but, as Campion proveth, Wickham; and not from the Place of his Dwelling, though he was Parish-Clerk of Wickham in Hampshire, where he taught Children to write: In which Quality his Son William proved so excellent, that Nicholas Woddal, Constable of Winchester Castle, took him from his Father, and kept him at School, first at Winchester, afterward at Oxford; till himself being made Surveyor-General of the King's Works, he sent for this William to serve him as his Clerk; who in short Time grew so expert in that Employment, that Adam Tarleton, Bishop of Winchester, commended him to the King, who employed him presently in surveying his Fortifications at Dover and Queenborough Castles, and afterward made him Surveyor of his Buildings at Windsoor Castle, and his Houses of Henly and East-Hampstead. And here first Envy rose up against him, for having caused to be engraven on a Stone of a Wall at Windsoor Castle, these Words; This made William Wickham. Some that envied his Rising, complained to the King of his Insolency, as arrogating to himself that excellent Piece of Building to be done at his Charge: But Wickham called before the King about it, made Answer, That his Meaning was not, neither by any indifferent Construction could it import, that Wickham made that Building, but that the same Building made Wickham, as being a Means of the King's great Favour toward him. This Answer pacified the King, who took him daily more and more into his Favour; and being now entred into the Ministry, was first made Parson of St. Martin's in the Fields, then Minister of St. Martin's le Grand, afterwards Archdeacon of Lincoln, Provost of Wells, and Rector of Many-hens in Devonshire; so as at one time he had in his Hand so many Ecclesiastical Livings, that the Value of them in the King's Books amounted to eight hundred seventy six Pounds, thirteen Shillings; besides which, he was honoured with many temporal Places of great Profit and Respect, as to be his Principal Secretary, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Master of the Wards and Liveries, Treasurer of the King's Revenues in France,

William Wickham, his Parentage and Rising.

A.D. 1412 France, and some other Offices. After which the Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, Means was made to the King to bestow that Place upon him. And here the second time did Envy rise up against him, informing the King that he was a Man of little or no Learning, and no Way fit for such a Dignity: Whereupon the King made Stay of granting it: But when Wickham came before the King, and told him, That what he wanted in personal Learning, he would supply with being a Founder of Learning; this so satisfied the King, that he bestowed the Place upon him. After this he was made Lord-Treasurer of England; and here the third time did Envy rise up against him: For the King requiring of his Subjects a Supply of Money, it was answered, That he needed no other Supply than to call his Treasurer to Account. This Blow struck deep upon the Bishop; for he was presently charged to give Accompt for eleven hundred ninety six thousand Pounds: And whilst he was busy in preparing his Accompt, all his Temporalities, upon Importunity of John of Gaunt, were seized into the King's Hands, and given to the Prince of Wales; and himself, upon Pain of the King's Displeasure, commanded not to come within twenty Miles of the Court. In this Case he dismisseth his Train, and sendeth Copies abroad of his Accompt, if it might be received, but was hindered by the working of John of Gaunt against him, upon this Ground, as was thought. Queen Philippa, Wife to King Edward the Third, upon her Death-bed, by way of Confession, told Wickham, that John of Gaunt was not the lawful Issue of King Edward, but a supposititious Son: For when she was brought to Bed at Gaunt of a Daughter, knowing how desirous the King was to have a Son, she exchanged the Daughter with a Dutch Woman for a Boy, whereof she had been delivered about the same Time with the Queen. Thus much she confessed, and withal made the Bishop swear, That if the said John of Gaunt should at any Time, either directly or indirectly, attempt the Crown, or that rightfully, through want of Issue, it should devolve unto him, that then he should discover this Matter, and make it known unto the King and Council. Afterward, the Queen being dead, and the Bishop finding John of Gaunt, as he thought, too much aspiring, he secretly told him this Relation, and this Adjuration of his supposed Mother, advising him not to seek higher than a private State, for else he was bound by an Oath to make it known to all the World. Thus far the Bishop did well; but when he saw the Son of John of Gaunt not only aspiring, but possessed of the Crown, why did he not then discover it, and join at least with the Bishop of Carlisle in opposing it? Certainly, we may know, that either the whole Relation was but a Fable, or that Wickham was a Temporizer, or that John of Gaunt was a most patient Man, to suffer the Affront of such an Indignity with less than the Death of him that did it. But howsoever it was, it is certain, the Duke bore a mortal Grudge to the Bishop, who had no Way to withstand such an Enemy, but by making Alice A.D. 1412 Pierce his Friend, by whose Means, after two Years, he was restored to all his Livings; and afterward, King Edward being dead, and Alice Pierce banished, by the Means of a greater Friend than Alice Pierce (his full Purse) he obtained in the second Year of King Richard, a general Pardon under the Great Seal of England; and from that Time forward enjoyed a quiet Life, and died in the fourth Year of this King Henry the Fourth, being then of the Age of above eighty Years, and lieth buried in the Church of St. Swithin's in Winchester, in a Monument of his own making in his Life-time; leaving for his Heir Thomas Perrot, the Son of his Sister Agnes, married to William Perrot.

John of Gaunt said to be a supposititious Son.

Another great Example of the Volubility of Fortune in Professors of Learning, was Roger Roger Walden, who died in the ninth Year of this King. He was at first a poor Scholar in Oxford; and the first Step of his Rising, was to be a Chaplain in the College there of St. Mary's; from thence, by Degrees, he got to be Dean of York; and after this, a high Step, to be Treasurer of England; and yet a higher after that upon the Banishment of Thomas Arundel, to be Archbishop of Canterbury; but being now at the Top, he came down again: For in this King's Time, Thomas Arundel being restored to the Archbishoprick, Walden was not only put out of that Place, but was called to Account for the Treasureship; and though he shewed his Quietus est, yet all his Temporalities were seized, and his Person imprisoned, till by the Mediation of the now Archbishop Arundel, he was made Treasurer of Calais, and after promoted to be Bishop of London.

The next Place after these, is justly due to Geoffrey Chaucer and John Gower, two famous Poets in this Time, and the Fathers of English Poets in all the Times after. Chaucer died in the fourth Year of this King, and lieth buried at Westminster; Gower, in this King's ninth Year, and was buried at St. Mary Overy's Church in Southwark. And now come others to be remembered, who lived and died in this King's Time: Hugh Legate, born in Hertfordshire, a Monk of St. Albans, who wrote Scholies upon Boetius de Consolatione; Nicholas Gorham, born also in Hertfordshire, a Dominick Frier, and the French King's Confessor, though an English-man; Walter Disse, so called of a Town in Norfolk, where he was born, Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster; Lawrence Holbeck, a Monk of Ramsay, who wrote an Hebrew Dictionary; John Cotton, Archbishop of Armagh; Richard Scroop, Brother to William Scroop, Lord-Treasurer of England, made Archbishop of York, and writing an Invective against King Henry, lost his Head; William Thorpe, an earnest Follower of John Wickliffe, for which he was committed to Saltwood Castle, where he died; Stephen Patrington, born in Yorkshire, and Robert Mascall, a Carmelite Frier of Ludlow, both of them Confessors to King Henry the Fifth; Boston, a Monk of the Abby of Bury in Suffolk, who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church, and other Treatises. John Purvey,

A.D. 1412

A.D. 1412 Purvey, who was convented for teaching Doctrine contrary to the Church of Rome, and compelled to recant; Thomas Rudburn, Bishop of St. David's, who wrote a Chronicle; Nicholas Riston, who considering the Strife between the then Anti-Popes, wrote a Book,

De tollendo Schismate; Robert Wansham, a Monk A.D. 1412 in Dorsetshire, who wrote a Book in Verse, Of the Original and Signification of Words; Robert Wimbleton, an excellent Preacher, as appeareth by the Sermon he made upon this Text, Redde Rationem Villicationis tue.

HENRY of Monmouth (so called from the Place in Wales where he was born) eldest Son of King Henry the Fourth, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England, to whom the Lords of the Realm swore Homage and Allegiance before he was yet Crowned; an Honour never done before to any of his Predecessors: And afterwards on the ninth of April, in the Year 1412, he was Crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Solemnities in such Case accustomed: And as the Scripture speaks of Saul, That as soon as Samuel had anointed him King, he had a new Heart given him, and he became another Man than he was before; so was it with this King Henry: For presently after his Coronation, he called before him all his Companions, who had been fratres in malo with him, strictly charging them not to presume to come within ten Miles of his Court, until such Time as they had given good Proof of their Amendment in Manners; and lest any of them should pretend want of Maintenance to be any Cause of their taking ill Courses, he gave to every one of them a competent Means whereby to subsist: And knowing, as he did, the Fashion of the Scots and Welsh, that in Time of Change they would commonly take Advantage to make Inroads upon the Borders, he therefore caused Forts and Bulwarks in fit Places to be erected, and placed Garrisons in them, for preventing, or repelling any such Incurfions. Immediately after this, he called a Parliament, where a Subsidy was granted without asking; and in this Parliament the Commons began to harp upon their old String of taking away the Temporalities of the Clergy: And the Bishops fearing how it might take in the King's Ears, thought it best to divert him, by striking upon another String, which they knew would be more pleasing to him, which was, to shew him the great Right he had to the Crown of France. And thereupon Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, in a long Narration deduced the King's Right from Isabel Daughter to Philip the Fourth, married to King Edward the Second, from whom it descended by direct Line to his Majesty, and no Hinderance of enjoying it, but Pretension of the Salique Laws; which, said he, was neither according to the Law of God, nor yet intended at first to that Nation: And though his Predecessors, by reason of their Incumbrances, forbore to prosecute their Claim, yet he being free from all such Incumbrances, had no less Power than Right to do it. This indeed struck upon the right String of the King's Inclination; for as he affected nothing more than true Glory, so in nothing more than in Warlike Actions. Hereupon nothing was now thought of, but the Conquest of France. First therefore he begins to alter in his Arms the bearing of Semy-de-luces; and quarters the three Flower-de-luces, as the Kings of France then bare them; and that he might not be thought to steal Advantage, but to do it fairly, he sent Ambassadors to Charles the Sixth, then King of France, requiring in peaceable Manner the Surrender of the Crown of France; which if he would yield unto, then King Henry would take to Wife his Daughter Katharine; but if he refused to do it, then King Henry would with Fire and Sword enforce it from him, or lose his Life. The Ambassadors sent, were the Duke of Exeter, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord Grey, the Lord High-Admiral, and the Bishop of Norwich, with five hundred Horse; who coming to the Court of France, were at first received and feasted with all the Honour and Shew of Kindness that might be; but as soon as their Message was delivered, and that it was known what they came about, the Copy of their Entertainment was altered, and they were sent away with as little Complement as they were before received with Honour; only told, that the King would speedily make Answer to the King their Master, by his own Ambassadors; and speedily indeed he did it; for the Earl of Vendosme, William Barotier Archbishop of Bourges, Peter Fresnel, Bishop of Lysieux, with others, were arrived in England, as soon almost as the English were returned. But being come, the Archbishop of Bourges made a long Oration in the Praise of Peace, concluding with the Tender of the Lady Katharine, and 50,000 Crowns with her in Dower, besides some Towns of no great Importance. To which King Henry, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, made Answer, that these Offers were Trifles, and that without yielding to his Demands, he would never desist from that he intended. And with this Answer the French Ambassadors were dismissed. It is said, that about this Time the Dauphin (who in the King of France's Sickness managed the State) sent to K. Henry a Ton of Tennis Balls, in Derision of his Youth, as fitter to play with them, than to manage Arms; which

A.D. 1413 King Henry took in such Scorn, that he promised with an Oath, it should not be long e'er he would toss such Iron Balls amongst them; that the best Arms in France should not be able to hold a Racket to turn them. And now all things are prepared and in a Readiness for the King's Journey into France, his Men shipped, and himself ready to go on Ship-board; when suddenly a Treason was discovered against his Person, plotted by Richard Earl of Cambridge, Henry Lord Scroop of Masham Lord-Treasurer, and Thomas Grey Earl of Northumberland, and plotted and procured by the French Agents. These being apprehended, and upon Examination confessing the Treason, and the Money (which was said to be a Million of Gold) by them for that End received, were all of them immediately put to Death.

Richard Earl of Cambridge, second Son of Edmund of Langley, did Richard, afterward Duke of York, claim and recover the Crown from the Lancastrian Family. This Execution done, and the Wind blowing fair, K. Henry weighs Anchor, and with a Fleet of 1200 Sail (Grafton saith but 140 Ships) but Enguerant saith 1600, attended with six thousand Spears, and 14,000 Foot, besides Engineers and Labourers, he puts to Sea; and on our Lady Eve landed at Calais, where he made Proclamation, that no Man, upon Pain of Death, should rob any Church, or offer Violence to any that were found unarmed: And from thence passing on, he besieged Harfleur; which when no Succour came within certain Days agreed upon, the Town was surrendered and sacked. Of this Town he made the Duke of Exeter Captain, who left there for his Lieutenant Sir John Falstaffe, with a Garrison of 1500 Men. It is said, that when King Henry entered Harfleur, he passed along the Streets bare-foot, until he came to the Church of St. Martin; where with great Devotion he gave most humble Thanks to God for this first achieved Enterprize. From thence he marched forward, and coming to the River of Somme, he found all the Bridges broken; whereupon he passed on to the Bridge of St. Maxence, where 30,000 French appearing, he pitched his Camp, expecting to be fought with; and the more to encourage his Men, he gave the Order of Knighthood to John Lord Ferrers of Groby, Reynold Graystock, Piercy Tempest, Christopher Morisby, Thomas Pickering, William Huddleston, Henry Mortimer, John Hoshalton, Philip Hall; but not perceiving the French to have any Mind to fight, he marched by the Town of Amiens to Beauvais, and there stayed two Days, expecting Battel; and from thence marched to Corbie, where the Peasants of the Country, with certain Men of Arms sent from the Dauphin, charged the right Wing of the English, which was led by Hugh Stafford Lord Bourchier, and won away his Standard, but was recovered again by John Bromeley of Bromeley, a Commander in the Lord Stafford's Regiment, who with his own Hand slew him that had taken the Colours; and then taking them up, displayed the same; with Sight whereof the English were so encouraged, that they presently routed the French, and put them to Flight; which valiant Exploit the Lord Stafford recompensed, by giving to Bromeley an Annuity of fifty A.D. 1415 Pounds a Year, out of his Lands of Staffordshire.

After this the King marched towards Calais, so strictly observing his Proclamation against Church-robbing, that when one was complained of for having taken a Silver Pixe out of a Church; he not only caused the same to be restored, but the Soldier also to be hanged: Which Point of Discipline both kept the rest from offending in that Kind, and drew the People of the Country under-hand to relieve his Men with all things necessary. The French King, hearing that King Henry had passed the River Somme, by Advice of his Council (who yet were divided in Opinion) sent Montjoy, the French King at Arms, to defy King Henry, and to let him know he should be fought with; which King Henry, though his Army was much infected with Fevers, whereof the Earl of Stafford, the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Molines and Burnel, were lately dead; yet willingly heard, and rewarded the Herald for his Message, and first having cleared a Passage over the Bridge, where of Necessity he was to pass, on the 22d of October, he passed over with his Army. At which Time the Duke of York, that led the Rere-ward, had discovered the Enemy to come on apace; whereof he sent Word to the King, who thereupon made a stand, and appointing his Officers what Course to hold, and encouraging his Soldiers, they all attended when the Battel should begin. The French Army was divided into three Battels; in the first were placed eight thousand Men at Arms, four thousand Archers, and fifteen hundred Cross-bows, the Wings consisting of two thousand two hundred Men at Arms. This Battel was led by the Constable of France himself, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ewe, Richmond and Vendosme, the Lord Dampier the Lord Admiral of France, the Admiral Buciqualt, and others. The Middle Battel, wherein were more Men at Arms, was commanded by the Dukes of Barre and Alanson, and by the Earls of Vaudemont, Salengues, Blamont, Grantpre, and Rousey. In the Rere-ward were all the Remainder of the French Forces, guided by the Earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Falconbridge, and the Lord Lorney, Captain of Ardy. The French-men thus ordered, being six times, some say ten times as many as the English (who were not above nine thousand) thought of nothing but of the Booty they should get. In the mean Time King Henry, having made Choice of a Piece of Ground half fenced on his Back with the Village, wherein they had rested the Night before, on both Sides having strong Hedges and Ditches, begun there to order his Battel; but first he appointed an Ambush of two hundred Archers, which upon a Watch-word given, should discharge their whole Flight upon the whole Flank of the Enemies Horse. The Vanguard, consisting of Archers only, was conducted by the Duke of York, who, out of an Heroick Courage, made Suit for that Place; with whom were joined the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The main Battel was led by the King himself, which consisted of Bill-men, and some Bow-men: With him were the Duke of Gloucester his Brother,

A.D. 1415 ther, the Earl-Marshal, Oxford and Suffolk. The Rere-ward was led by Thomas Duke of Exeter, the King's Uncle, consisting of all Sorts of Weapons; the Horse-men, as Wings, guarded the Companies on both Sides. The King, to prevent the Fury of the French Cavalry, by the Direction of the Duke of York, appointed divers Stakes studded with Iron at both Ends, of six Foot long, to be pitched behind the Archers, and appointed Pioneers to attend to remove them as they should be directed. These Things thus ordered, publick Prayers were humbly made, and the Onset was presently given by the French Horse-men: Whereupon Sir William Orpington, according to Direction, caused the Bow-men behind the Hedges to let fly their Arrows; which so galled the French Horses, that either they cast their Riders, or through their Unruliness, so opened their Ranks, that the right Wing of the English Horse had Way to come in upon the French Foot; and withal, the French Horse disorderly retiring, they were miserably trodden down and disranked by their own Company. Upon which, the King with his main Battel came on with such Resolution, that himself in Person charged the Duke of Alanson, by whom he was well near unhorsed; but afterward, having first slain two of the Duke's Men, he charged the Duke again, and with his Sword beat him from his Horse; whom the King's Guard, notwithstanding the King cried out to the contrary, slew outright: And with his Fall the main Battel of the French first gave Ground, then turned their Backs, and lastly cast away their Weapons and fled. But then certain of the French Horse-men that first ran away, led on by Robert Bondile, and the Captain of Agincourt, meaning to wipe away the Blot of running away from Soldiers, by fighting with Boys, set upon the Pages and Laundresses that were left in the Camp; who gave such a lamentable Shrike, that K. Henry verily thought some fresh Forces had been come: Whereupon he caused all the Arrows that were sticking in the Field to be gathered, and the Stakes to be plucked up, and made ready to be again used: Amongst which the Duke of York's Body was found, miserably hacked and defaced: The Sight whereof, together with Danger of a second Charge, made K. Henry give Order that the Prisoners should be all slain, except only some principal Men, whom he caused to be bound Back to Back, and so left. For which Fact, tho' done in cold Blood, yet the King could not justly be taxed with Cruelty, seeing the Number of the Prisoners was more than of his own Soldiers; and nothing could give Assurance of Safety but their Slaughter. But all was not yet done; for the Earls of Marle and Falconbridge, with six hundred Men at Arms, who had stood still all Day, began now to stir, and gave a brave Charge upon K. Henry's Army: But being but few, and their Horses galled with the Stakes, they had only the Honour to die bravely; and indeed they slew more of the English than the whole Army had done before. And now at last, the King being satisfied by the Scouts, that no Enemy was more to be seen, he asked what the Place was called? And being told Agincourt; Well then, said he, this shall be from henceforth called the Battel of Agincourt: A.D. 1416 And presently he caused the whole Army, in their Array as they were, to give God Thanks, causing the Clergy there present to sing the Psalm of David, In exitu Israel de Aegypto; and made Proclamation, that every one at the Verse, Non nobis Domine, sed nomini tuo da gloriam, should kneel down, and the Horse-men bow their Bodies: And then singing Te Deum, and other holy Hymns, they marched to the Enemies Camp, where the Soldiers had Liberty given them to take the Spoil.

A great Victory, no doubt, but yet a Victory by which the English gained not one Foot of Ground in France more than they had before; and which Monstrelet attributed not so much to the Valour of the English, as to the Indiscretion of the French, who had so streightned the Vanguard of their Army, and pent them up so close together, that they had not room to draw out their Swords; so true is that Saying, Quos Deus vult perdere dementat. The next Day after the Battel, French Heralds came to ask Leave to bury their Dead, and had it; and the English Heralds appointed to make Search, made Return, that there were slain of the French above ten thousand, whereof one hundred twenty-six were of the Nobility bearing Banners; of Knights and Gentlemen of Coat-Armour, seven thousand eight hundred seventy-four, whereof five hundred were Knighted the Night before the Battel, and of common Soldiers about one thousand six hundred. Amongst the Slain of the Nobility, were Charles le Bretts, High-Constable; Jaques of Chatillon, Admiral of France, the great Admiral of France, the Master of the Cross-bows, the Duke of Alanson, Brabant, and Barre; the Earls of Nevers, Marle, Vaudemont, Beaumont, Grantpre, Rouffey, Falconbridge, Foys, and L'estruck. There were taken Prisoners Charles Duke of Orleans, John Duke of Bourbon, the Lords Danvert, Fosseux, Humiers, Roy, Cawny, Fancourd, Noel, Bouciqualt; to the Number in all of fifteen hundred. On the English Part were slain Edward Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk, and not full six hundred in all; but, saith Caxton, not above six and twenty in all; and Paulus Emilius saith, besides the two Lords only two Knights, and but ten private Soldiers in all: A Miracle rather than a Victory. But not only King Henry was the Death of the French Lords before-named, in the Field with his Sword; but of another great Prince at home, with his Victory; for Lewis the Dauphin, eldest Son of Charles the Sixth, King of France, presently upon it, without any other Cause apparent, fell sick and died. Yet King Henry, to make his Enemies the better contented with their Overthrow, and to take away the Envy of his Victory, at his Return into England with his Prisoners, which was on the sixth of November following, presently gave strait Order, That no Ballad or Song should be made or sung, more than of Thanksgiving to God for his happy Victory and safe Return; but without Words of either disgracing the French, or extolling the English. At his Entrance into London, the City presented him with a thousand Pounds, and two Basons of Gold, worth five hundred Pounds more. The Bodies of

A.D. 1416 the Duke of York and the Earl of Suffolk were brought into England, and the Dukes buried at Fedringbey in Northamptonshire, the Earls at New-Elm in Oxfordshire.

The Emperor Sigismund comes into England.

About this Time the Emperor Sigismund, Cousin-German to K. Henry, having been first in France, came, accompanied with the Archbishop of Rheims, Ambassador from the French King, into England; for whom there were thirty great Ships sent from the King to waft him over: But approaching to Land at Dover, the Duke of Gloucester with a Company of Gentlemen, having their Swords drawn, stepp'd up to the Knees in Water, saying to him, That if he came as the King's Friend, he should be welcome; but if as claiming any Jurisdiction, they would resist him. Whereupon the Emperor renounceth all Imperial Authority, and is thereupon admitted to Land, and received with as much Honour as could be done him; and afterward, together with Albert Duke of Holland, who was lately likewise arrived at Winchester, is elected Companion of the Order of the Garter, and sat in their Cells at the Solemnity of the Feast. A principal Cause of the Emperor's coming, was to mediate a Peace between England and France; wherein he had brought K. Henry to a good Degree of Inclination, till News came of the besieging of Harfleur by the French, and of the Earl of Armagnac's setting upon the Duke of Exeter, being Governor there: And then he presently grew so averse from Peace, that he would hearken no more to any Treaty of it. Not that he disliked they should treat of Peace with their Swords in their Hands, as all wise Men would do; but that to treat of Peace, and in the Time of the Treaty to do Acts of Hostility, was an Affront to all Honesty, and not to be tolerated with any Patience.

And now the Earl of Armagnac having set down before the Town, the Vice-Admiral of France brought up the whole Navy of the French, with Intent, whilst the Earl should assault it by Land, to have entered the Town by the Water's Side: But of this Purpose the Valour and Diligence of the Duke of Exeter prevented them. As soon as K. Henry had Intelligence hereof, he would presently have gone himself; but being dissuaded by the Emperor, he sent his Brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Earls of March, Oxford, Huntingdon, Warwick, Arundel, Salisbury, Devonshire, and divers others, with two hundred Sail, to the Rescue of Harfleur; who, upon the Feast of the Assumption of our Lady, came to the Mouth of the River Seyne: Whereupon Norbon the French Admiral set forward, and got to the Mouth of the Haven: And here began a Fight, which was resolutely maintained on both Sides, until the English having sunk five hundred Vessels one and other of the French, and taken three great Carricks of Genoua, won the Harbour; and at last, though with some Opposition made by their Gallies, relieved Harfleur, and made the Earl of Armagnac glad to raise his Siege. Upon the News hereof, the Emperor desisted from mediating any further for Peace with France; and entering into a League Defensive and Offensive with King Henry, wherein only the Pope was excepted, on the 19th of October he departed towards Germany, A.D. 1417 whom K. Henry accompanied to Calais, whither the Duke of Burgundy came to confirm the League concluded on before by the Earl of Warwick and him, concerning Flanders and Artois only. In the mean Time the French had hired divers Carricks, and other great Ships of the Genoueses and Italians; which joining with the French Fleet, lay at the Mouth of the River of Seyne, under the Command of Jaques Bastard of Bourbon, to hinder all Succours from coming to Harfleur; but John Earl of Huntingdon (Son to the Duke of Exeter beheaded at Chichester) being sent to scour the Coasts, encountred with him, and after a long Fight took him Prisoner, and three of his great Carricks, with all the Money for the half Year's Pay of the Fleet; and sinking three other of his Carricks, and dispersing the rest, cleared the Mouth of the River, and then returned to the King at Southampton. And now upon the twenty-third of July, in the fourth Year of his Reign, the King himself, with the King Henry Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Huntingdon, Warwick, Devonshire, Salisbury, Suffolk, and Somerset; the Lords Rosse, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh, Clynton, Scroop, Maltrevers, Bourchier, Ferrers of Groby, Ferrers of Chertley, Fanhope, Grey of Codnor, Sir Gilbert Umphrevile, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and an Army consisting of twenty-five thousand five hundred twenty-eight fighting Men, besides a thousand Artificers and Pioneers, took Shipping at Portsmouth, and upon the first of August landed in Normandy near to the Castle of Tonque, which he presently besieged, and upon the ninth of August had it yielded to him; at which Time the Earl of Salisbury took the Castle of Aberwilliers, which the King gave to him and his Heirs, being the first Land given by the King in France.

At the Winning of Tonque, the King made eight and twenty Knights, and from thence marched with his Army to Caen; where, to prevent the Citizens from sallying out, he cast up a Mount; and then making many Assaults, but finding them to do little Good, he caused his Pioneers to undermine the Walls; which being done upon the fourth of September, he offered the Besieged their Lives, if they would submit; which they refusing, he thereupon made a Shew of a general Assault, whilst many of his Men entered the City under the Foundation, of whom the Duke of Clarence with his Company was the first; and then coming upon the Backs of those that defended the Walls, easily overcame them; and then the whole Army entred without Resistance. The next Day the King caused all the principal Men of the Town to come before him at their Senate-house, where some of them, for their stubborn refusing the Grace he had offered them, were adjudged to Death, and the rest fined. The Spoil of the Town was distributed amongst the Soldiers. The Captain of the Castle stood out a while; but being advertised that the King had sworn to shew no Mercy, if he did not surrender, he gave twelve Hostages, That if he were not relieved before the twentieth of September, he would then give it up; which not coming, he performed; and so the King had Possession both of Caen and the Castle.

Citizens of Caen.

And now Charles the new Dauphin, being but seventeen Years of Age, and bare of Money, had got into his Possession all the Jewels, Plate, and Money of the Queen his Mother; which so incensed her against him, that to do him a Spight, she placed the Duke of Burgundy in chief Authority about the King, who by reason of his Infirmary was unable himself to manage the State; and the Duke having now the Sword in his Hand, meant first to repress the growing Boldness of the Dauphin, and afterward to repel the common Enemy: And the Dauphin likewise envying the Duke's Advancement above him, meant first to take down his swelling Greatness, and afterward to fall upon the foreign Adversary: And thus while private Respects were preferred before publick, whilst the Duke and the Dauphin had their first Intentions one against another, not looking after King Henry; but in the second Place, after their own Turns served, an easy Way was left for King Henry's Proceedings, and he went on at his Pleasure with small Opposition: He sent the Duke of Clarence, who took in the City of Bayeux, as likewise the Duke of Gloucester the City of Lyseux; whilst himself remaining still at Caen, put out of the City the Natives that were impotent, or young Infants, to the Number of 1500, and in their Places put English People; and finding a great Mass of Money and Plate deposited by the Citizens in the Castle, he caused the same, upon Proof, to be respectively delivered to the right Owners, upon Condition they would acknowledge him for their Sovereign; which moderate and just Dealing won him more Hearts than the Force of his Arms had won him Knees; especially with the Normans, who are easier to be drawn with Gentleness and Love, than forced by Violence and Compulsion. From hence the King marched the First of October to Corfysse Castle, which within three Days yielded: The fourth of October he came to Argenton, which, not relieved by a Day agreed upon, was likewise surrendered: The Town of Alançon endured eight Days Siege; but in the End did as other their Neighbour-Towns had done. From Alançon the Earl of Salisbury was sent to Fayles, to view the Strength thereof, whom the King presently followed, where the besieged concluded, if it were not relieved before the second of January, then to yield up the Town. No Relief coming, the Town was yielded up, and soon after upon the like Terms the Castle. From hence the King returned to Caen, to put in Execution a Proclamation he had formerly made, That if the Inhabitants of Normandy that were fled, returned not by a Day assigned, he would then grant their Lands to his Soldiers: And thereupon he gave to the Duke of Clarence, during his Life, the Viscounties of Auge, Orver, and Ponthieu, with all the Lands of those that were not returned according to the Proclamation. All the Lent the King lay at Bayeux, whilst his Navy still kept the Seas, and daily took many French Ships; but on the sixteenth of July, such a Tempest took them, that they were driven to fall in with Southampton; and yet, with all their Diligence, could not so save themselves, but that two Balingers, and two great Carricks laden with Merchandize were in the very Haven drowned. In the mean Time the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Talbot besieged the strong Castle of Damfront: The Duke of Clarence took Courton and Bourney; and many other being taken, as Chambois, Bechelouyn, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Crevenner, Arvyillers, Bagles: In all of them he placed Captains and Garrisons, and particularly in Fresny, Sir Robert Brent lately made Viscount: The Duke of Gloucester also, with the Earl of March, and the Lord of Codnor, took in all the Isle of Constantine, except Cherburgh, and thence returned to the King, but was sent back to take in that City also; which after some Time, when no Relief came, was, together with the Castle, likewise surrendered; although by this Time the Duke of Burgundy and the Dauphin, by Mediation of the Pope, were reconciled, and began to join their Forces to make Resistance. And now the Duke of Exeter, the King's Uncle, with a Supply of fifteen thousand Men out of England, came to the King, who presently took in the City of Eureux, and the Earl of Ryme, the strong Castle of Mille le Vesco.

The next Thing attempted was the Siege of Roan, a City strongly fortified, both with Walls and Ditches; and to which there was no convenient Passage but by the City of Lowvies: To this City therefore he first lays Siege; which, when Relief came not within a Time agreed on, was surrendered; and yet there was another Impediment to be removed, a Stone-bridge, which hindered the Approach to Roan, being exceeding strongly guarded: For this King Henry devised Floats of Wicker covered with Beasts Hides, by which the Duke of Clarence with his Quarter passed the River, and then laid Siege to the Town on that Side; and for the other Side, he had other Devices made with Hogheads and Pipes, fastned to Fir-poles and Barges, with which he passed his Men over at Pleasure; and in the mean Time he caused divers of his Soldiers that could swim, to make shew of Passing the River three Miles off another Way; with which the French-men being deluded, drew all their Forces thither, and by this Means the Fort being left unfurnished of sufficient Guard, was presently forced to surrender, and the Soldiers were taken to the King's Grace: The Bridge being thus gained, the Duke of Exeter was sent, and with him Windsor the Herald, to summon the Citizens to surrender the Town; who not only gave proud Answers, but also made a Sally forth, though with the Loss of thirty of their Men. Upon this Obstinacy of theirs the King presently orders his Siege, his own Quarter was the Chartreux; the Duke of Clarence at St. Gervase, the Duke of Exeter at Port St. Dennis, and every great Commander had his Quarter assigned; so as the City was begirt round, and a great Chain of Iron set upon Piles, and a strong wooden Bridge for Passage from one Camp to the other, was made over the River. At this Time the Earl of Kilmmain with sixteen hundred Irish, came to the King and had their Quarter assigned them, who behaved themselves with great Valour. The King's Cousin-german, the King of Portugal, sent likewise a Navy of Ships to the Mouth of the River Seine, which stopped all Passage of Succour to Roan. Many Policies and the Siege.

A.D. 1418 Practices were used against the City, but none prevailed till Famine forced it; for there being in Roan 21,000 Persons at the Beginning of the Siege, and the Siege continuing long, it grew to that Extremity, that the Citizens drank nothing but Vinegar and Water, and had little to eat but Rats and Mice, Cats and Dogs, and such like: Great Numbers of the poorer Sort were thrust out of the City, who not suffered to pass the English Army, miserably perished; only upon Christmas-Day, in Honour of Christ's Birth, the King relieved and suffered to pass as many as were at first put out; but not others that were put out the second Time, but suffered them to perish.

But nothing prevailed till at last Famine,

In this Distress a Parley is required by the Citizens; who notwithstanding their Misery, stood upon such high Terms, that nothing was concluded, only a Truce for eight Days was granted them; the eight Days ended, and nothing yet agreed upon amongst themselves, they crave one Day longer, and neither in that Day could any thing be agreed on: Then they crave four Days more, in which the Multitude and common People so pressed the Magistrates and Governors of the City, that on the fourth Day, being about the nineteenth of January, the City was surrendered, and the Inhabitants themselves and all their Goods were yielded to the King's Mercy; the Duke of Exeter was appointed to take Possession, who accordingly entred with his Soldiers; the next Day after, being Friday, the twentieth of January, the King himself made his Entry, with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Bishops, sixteen Barons and others, and was by the Clergy conducted to our Lady's Church; where, after publick Thanksgiving, he took Homage and Fealty of the Burgeses and Inhabitants, making Proclamation, That all that would come and acknowledge him to be their Sovereign, should enjoy the Benefit of his Protection, and retain their Possessions: Whereupon many came in, and many Towns were surrendered. In this Time of the King's lying at Roan, the Earl of Salisbury took in Honfleur, Munster de Villiers, Eu, and Neufchatet; the Duke of Clarence took Vernon, and Nautes, and the Earl of Warwick, la Roche Guyon.

Roan is yielded up to K. Henry.

A Meeting for Reconciliation appointed between the two Kings of England and France.

And now the Duke of Burgundy seeing the great Successes of K. Henry, could think of no better Way for his own Safety, than to make a Reconciliation between the two Kings; to which End, Ambassadors are sent to procure their Meeting: At which Time K. Henry, for their Service already performed, and in Hope of more hereafter, made the valiant Gascoigne Captain le Beauf, Earl of Longueville, Sir John Gray, Earl of Tankerville, and the Lord Bourchier, Earl of Eu. Upon the last of May, K. Henry, accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence, Gloucester and Exeter, his Uncle Beaufort, the Bishop of Winchester, with the Earls of March and Salisbury, and a Thousand Men at Arms, entred the Place appointed for the Meeting of the two Kings. The French Queen (her Husband being taken with the Frensy) with the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Earl of St. Paul, and a Company of Ladies, amongst whom, as a Bait to entangle the King's Affection, was the King's Daughter, the beautiful

Lady Katharine; with whose Sight, tho' the King was marvellously taken, yet he made no Shew thereof, till other Things should be agreed upon; but the Dauphin having made Means to the Duke of Burgoyne to hinder all Agreement, nothing was effected; whereupon, at their Parting, the King told the Duke, That he would have both the Lady and all his other Demands, or else drive the King of France out of his Kingdom, and him out of his Dukedom. Upon this the Duke thought it best to agree with the Dauphin; and upon this, the sixth of July, Articles of their Reconcilement are signed and sealed. In the mean Time the Earl of Longueville surprized the Town of Ponthoyse, but had scarce been able to make good the Surprize, if the Duke of Clarence had not come to his Succour. From thence the Duke marched to Paris, and there stayed two Days; but perceiving no Shew of Sally to be made, he returned to Ponthoyse, whither the King himself came; and from thence marching on, took in the Castle of Vaynon Villiers; and on the last of August, the Castles of Gyfors, and Galyard, and Dumal; so that now all Normandy (Mount St. Michael only excepted) was reduced to the Possession of the King of England, which had been wrongfully detained from him ever since the Year 1207.

The Dauphin all this while, though outwardly having made a Reconcilement with the Duke of Burgoyne, yet inwardly bearing a Spleen against him, intended nothing so much as his Destruction: Which to effect, he procured a Meeting between the Duke and him, and all the Peers of the Realm at Monstreuil; where the Duke, though humbling himself in Reverence to the Dauphin on his Knee, was most barbarously murdered; which Act was so much the less to be pitied in the Duke, by how much in the like Kind, upon the like Interview, he had caused Lewis, the Duke of Orleans to be murdered. But though this barbarous Act might justly incense Philip, Earl of Charolois, the Duke of Burgoyne's Heir, to seek Revenge; yet, as a wise and politick Prince, he forbore for the present to make any Shew of Choler or Distemperature; and considering with himself, that Difference between the Dauphin and him would but give K. Henry the greater Advantage, he endeavoured to propose an Overture of Peace between the two Kings: And to that End Ambassadors are sent from the King of France and the young Duke of Burgoyne, whom the King kindly entertained, but seemed to intimate unto them, that he could give no great Credit to their Propositions, unless the Lady Katharine would join in them, whose Innocence he knew would never abuse him. Whilst these Things are in Agitation, the Earl of Salisbury took in Fresney, and the Earls of Marshall and Huntingdon entred into Mayne, who approaching Mans, was encountered by the Forces of the Dauphin, whereof they slew five Thousand, and took two Hundred Prisoners; for which News being brought to Roan, whither K. Henry was come to solemnize the Feast of Christ's Birth, Thanksgiving to God was publickly made, and in the Instant thereof arriv'd other Ambassadors from the King

The Duke of Burgoyne treacherously murdered by the Dauphin.

A.D. 1420 King and Queen of France, and a Letter from the Lady Katharine to K. Henry, was secretly by the Bishop of Arras delivered. The Conclusion of all was, that the King of England should speed himself to Troyes, there to be espoused to the Lady Katharine, and to have Assurance of the Crown of France, after the Decease of the present K. Charles. Whereupon with a Guard of fifteen thousand choice Soldiers, accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Huntingdon, Longueville, Tankerville and Eu, the K. of England came to Troyes in Campaigne, upon the 18th Day of May, where he was met by the Duke of Burgoigne, and divers of the French Nobility, who attended him to the Palace, where the Queen with her Daughters, the Duchesse of Burgoigne and the Lady Katharine, gave him Princely Entertainment; and after some Intercourse of Complement between the Princes and the Ladies, K. Henry tendered to the Lady Katharine a Ring of great Value, which she (not without some Blushing) received; and afterwards upon the twentieth Day of May, she was affianced to him in St. Peter's Church, and on the third of June following, the Marriage was solemnized; and therewithal King Henry was published to be the only Regent of the Realm, and Heir apparent to the Crown of France: The Articles whereof with all convenient Expedition were proclaimed both in England and in France, and the two Kings, and all their Nobles, and other Subjects of Account, were sworn to observe them; and in particular the Duke of Burgoigne.

King Henry affianced to the Lady Katharine, the King of France's Daughter; and withal proclaimed Regent of France, and Heir apparent of the Crown.

And thus was the Salique Law violated, and the Heir Male put by his Succession in the Crown, which the Genius of France will not long endure; a while it must; and therefore the main Endeavour of both Kings now is, to keep him down, whom they had put down. And thereupon on the fourth of June, K. Henry with the French King, James King of Scots, who was newly arrived, the Duke of Burgoigne, the Prince of Orange, one and twenty Earls, five and forty Barons, with many Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army consisting of French, English, Scottish, Irish, and Dutch, to the Number of six hundred thousand, marched towards the Dauphin; and upon the seventh Day laid Siege to the Town of Sens, which sided with the Dauphin, which after four Days Siege was yielded up. From thence they removed, having the Duke of Bedford in their Company, who was newly come out of England with large Supplies of Men and Money to Monstreuil which was taken by Escalado, only the Castle held out still: During the Siege whereof, K. Henry created an Officer of Arms to be King of Heralds over the English-men, and entitled him Garter; whom he sent with Offers of Mercy to the Castle, but was by the Captain thereof reproachfully upbraided; for Punishment of which his Presumption, a Gibbet was erected, and in View of Monsieur Guitrey, the said Captain and twelve of his Friends were executed. Whereupon those of the Castle treated for Peace; but the King in eight Days together would not grant so much as a Parley; so that after six Weeks Siege they were enforced (their Lives saved) simply to yield.

From thence the King marched to Melun up-A.D. 1420 on Seyn, and besieged it the thirteenth of July; the Captain whereof was Barbason, a Gascoigne, no less politick than valiant, who countermined some, and stopp'd other Mines made by the English, and fought Hand to Hand in the Barriers with King Henry: Yet at last through Famine and Pestilence was forced to yield; but being suspected to have had a Hand in the Murther of the Duke of Burgoigne, he was sent Prisoner to Paris; and presently thereupon, both the Kings with their Queens, the Duke of Burgoigne and his Duchesse, with a Royal Train came thither, where the French King was lodged in the House of St. Paul, and the King of England in the Castle of Louvre. And here the three States of France anew, under their Hands and Seals in most authentick Manner, ratified the former Articles of King Henry's Succession to the Crown of France; the Instruments whereof were delivered to the King of England, who sent them to be kept in his Treasury at Westminster.

And now King Henry began to exercise his Regency, and as a Badge of his Authority, he caused a new Coin, which was called a Salute, to be made, whereon the Arms of France and England were quarterly stamped: He placed and displaced divers Officers, and appointed the Duke of Exeter with five hundred Men to the Guard of Paris: He awarded out Process against the Dauphin to appear at the Marble-Table at Paris; which he not obeying, Sentence was denounced against him, as guilty of the Murther of the Duke of Burgoigne; and by the Sentence of the Parliament he was banished the Realm.

King Henry makes a new Coin in France, called a Salute.

After this, the King making Thomas Duke of Clarence his Lieutenant-General of France and Normandy, on the 6th of January, with his beloved Queen Katharine, left Paris and went to Amiens, and from thence to Calais; and thence landing at Dover, came to Canterbury, and afterward through London to Westminster, where the Queen upon St. Matthias's Day, the 24th of February, was Crowned; the King of Scots sitting at Dinner in his State, but on the left Hand of the Queen, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the King's Uncle the Bishop of Winchester being on the right Hand. All were served with covered Messes of Silver, but all the Feast was Fish, in Observation of the Lent Season.

A Coronation-Feast all of Fish.

After this the King took his Progress through the Land, hearing the Complaints of his poor Subjects, and taking Order for administering of Justice to High and Low; and then met the Queen at Leicester, where they kept their Easter.

In the mean Time the Duke of Clarence making a Road into Anjou, came to the City of Ampers, where he knighted Sir William Rosse, Sir Henry Goddard, Sir Rowland Vydor, Sir Thomas Beaufort his natural Son; and returning home laden with Prey, was advertised that the Duke of Alançon intended to intercept his Passage: Whereupon he sent the Scout-Master Andrew Fogosa, a Lombard, to discover the Face of the Enemy, who being corrupted, brought Report, That their Number was but small, and those but ill ordered; that if he presently charged,

A.D. 1421 charged, there could be no Resistance. The Duke's Credulity caused him to draw all his Horses together; and leaving his Bows and Bills behind, which were his chiefest Strength, with his Horse only he makes towards the Enemy; but the Traitor leading to a Streight, where by his Appointment an Ambush was laid, that the Duke could neither retreat nor flee, he soon perceived the Treachery, but finding no Remedy, he manfully set Spurs to his Horse, and charged upon the Enemy; but overlaid with Multitude, and wearied with Fight, was himself with the Earl of Tankerville, the Lord Rosse, the Earl of Angus, Sir John Lumley, Sir John Verent, and about two thousand English slain: The Earls of Somerset, Suffolk, and Pearch, Sir John Berkley, Sir Ralph Nevil, Sir William Bowes, and sixty Gentlemen were taken Prisoners. The Body of the Duke of Clarence was by Sir John Beaufort, his base Son (the Duke dying without other Issue) conveyed into England, and buried at Canterbury beside his Father; and this Disaster happened upon Easter-Eve. The King was at Beverly when he heard of his Brother's Death, and presently thereupon dispatched away Edmund Earl of Mortaigne into Normandy, making him Lieutenant thereof; and then calls his High Court of Parliament to Westminster, requiring Aid by Money, to revenge his Brother's Death; which was readily granted: And the King thus provided, sent his Brother the Duke of Bedford with an Army to Calais, consisting of four thousand Men at Arms, and four and twenty thousand Archers, whom about the Middle of May he followeth himself, and safely arriving at Calais, hastened to relieve Chartres, which the Dauphin with seven thousand Men had besieged, but hearing of the King's coming was retired to Tours: The King of Scots, with the Duke of Gloucester, about the 8th of July besieged Dreux; which agreed, if it were not relieved by the twentieth of that Month, then to surrender it; no Relief coming, it was surrendered. The King pursued the Dauphin from Place to Place, but could not overtake him, but in the Way surprizing the Town of Baugency, where all that craved it, he took to Mercy, as likewise he did at Rougement: From thence he went to Orleans, and from thence to Vignes St. Yon, and from thence to Paris; where having fitted himself with Supplies, he went and sat down before Menin in Brye, which after some Opposition, he also took; and thereby had Possession of all the Fortresses in the Isle of France, in Brye, and in Champagne.

1422. Queen Katharine is brought to Bed of a Son at Windsor; and King Henry's Prophetic Speech of him.

Upon St. Nicholas's Day, in the Year 1422, Queen Katharine was brought to Bed of a Son at Windsor, who was by the Duke of Bedford, and Henry Bishop of Winchester, and the Countess of Holland, Christened by the Name of Henry; whereof when the King had Notice, out of a Prophetick Rapture he said, Good Lord! I Henry of Monmouth shall small Time Reign, and much get; and Henry born at Windsor shall long Time Reign, and lose all; but God's Will be done.

About this Time the Dauphin laid Siege to Cosney, which the King was intente to relieve, as being a Town of the Duke of Burgoyne's; and therefore tendered it more than if it had been his own; and making over-hasty Jour- A.D. 1422 nies, he over-heat himself with Travel; and coming to Senlys, found himself so ill at Ease, that he was forced to remain there, and to send his Brother the Duke of Bedford to prosecute his Design; which the Duke performed, and the Dauphin upon his Approach retired into Berry; whereof in Mockage he was after called the King of Berry. But the King's Fever and Flux encreasing, he was removed to Boys de Vincennes; where growing worse and worse, within a few Days he died. But somewhat before his Departure, he had made his Brother the Duke of Bedford Lieutenant-General of Normandy, and Regent of the Kingdom of France; and his Brother the Duke of Gloucester, he had made Protector of England, and of his Son's Person; exhorting all to be true and faithful to the Duke of Burgoyne; to be at Unity amongst themselves; to be loyal to their young Prince; to be serviceable to his dearly beloved Queen; to hold and preserve what he by his Valour and God's Assistance had won; and never to conclude Contract of Amity with the Dauphin or Duke of Alanson, until they had submitted themselves to the King's Grace. And so giving God Thanks for all his Favours and Blessings bestowed upon him, in the midst of saying a Psalm of David he departed this Life, who might have justly prayed God with David, Take me not away in the midst of my Days, for he died about the Age of five or six and thirty Years, which in David's Account is the midst of the Number of the Days of Man's Life; but tho' he died in the midst of his Days, yet he died in the Fullness of his Glory; and of whom it may be said, — Jamque arce potitus, Ridet anhelantes duri ad fastigia montis; when he had reigned nine Years and five Months.

Of his Taxations.

IN his first Year, an incredible Sum of Money was given him by the Clergy to divert him from a Motion propounded to take away their Temporalities; and in the same Year a Subsidy was granted him both by the Clergy and the Laity. In his fourth Year was granted him towards his Wars in France, two whole Tenths of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity; which being far too short to defray his great Charge, he was forced to pawn his Crown to the Bishop of Beaufort his Uncle, for a great Sum of Money, as also certain Jewels to the Lord Mayor of London, for ten thousand Marks. In his ninth Year, at a parliament at Westminster, for Revenge of the Duke of Clarence's Death, two Tenths of the Clergy, and one Fifteenth of the Laity, which, because the Haste of the Business could not stay the usual Course of Collection, the Bishop of Winchester brought in presently twenty thousand Pounds, to receive it again when the Subsidy should be gathered. The same Year also the Duke of Bedford in the King's Absence called a Parliament, wherein was granted towards his Wars, one Fifteenth to be paid in such Money as was at that Time current. These were all the Subsidies that were given him, notwithstanding his many and great Achievements, by which it appears what great Matters

No Gold to be offered in Payment unless it were Weight; and thereupon Weight ordained.

In his ninth Year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, it was ordained that no Man should offer Gold in Payment unless it were Weight; and thereupon were appointed Balances and Weights. An Act made in the thirteenth Year of K. Richard the Second, which disabled the Alien-Religious to enjoy any Benefices within England, was in the Beginning of this King's Reign put in Execution; and further, this King excluded also the French from all Preferment Ecclesiastical; and those Priors Aliens Conventual who had Institution and Induction, were bound to put in Security, not to disclose, or cause to be disclosed the Counsel and Secrets of the Realm.

Sir John Oldcastle censured for maintaining Wickliff's Doctrine.

IN the Beginning of his Reign, the Wickliffists increased greatly, of whom Sir John Oldcastle was Chief; who by Marriage of a Kinswoman of the Lord Cobham's of Cooling in Kent, obtained that Title. This Knight being very valorous, and in great Favour with the King, was in a Synod at London accused for maintaining of Wickliff's Doctrine; whereof the King being informed, sent for him, and instantly dealt with him to submit himself to the Censure of the Church: But Sir John Oldcastle told the King, that he owed his Subjection only to his Majesty: And as for others, he would stand for the Truth against them to the uttermost of his Life. Upon this he was served by Process to appear in the Archbishop's Court, and not appearing, was condemned of Contumacy; and afterwards in a Synod at Rocheſter, was by the Archbishop pronounced to be an Heretick; who then enacted that Decree, That the Holy Scriptures ought not to be translated into the English Tongue. But mark the Judgment that fell upon his own Tongue, whose Roots and Blade shortly after (as it is recorded) grew so big in his Mouth and Throat, that he could neither speak, nor swallow down Meat, but in Horror lay languishing, till at last, starved by Famine, he so died. In the mean Time Sir John Oldcastle wrote his Belief, and presented it himself to the King; which the King would in no wise receive, but suffered him in his Presence and Privy Chamber to be summoned; who appearing before the Archbishop, after divers Examinations, was condemned of Heresy, and committed to the Tower of London, from whence shortly after he escaped, and got into Wales. The King by his Proclamation promised a thousand Marks to any that should bring him in; but so much was his Doctrine generally favoured, that the King's Offer was not much regarded, but he continued four Years after undiscovered: At last he was taken in the Borders of Wales, within a Lordship belonging to the Lord Powis, who brought him to London, before the Duke of

Bedford, Regent of the Realm; where in the A.D. 1422 End he was condemned, and finally was drawn from the Tower to St. Giles's Fields, and there Sir John Oldcastle condemned of Heresy, is hanged in St. Giles's Field in a Chain by the Middle. hanged in a Chain by the Middle, and after consumed by Fire, the Gallows and all. At the Time of his first Conviction, four Years before, it was rumoured, that twenty thousand Men in Arms were assembled in St. Giles's Field: Whereupon the King, at Midnight, himself in Person went thither, where he found many indeed, who upon Examination confessed, that they came to meet their Captain Sir John Oldcastle, but without any Intent against the King: Yet was Sir Roger Aston, and eight and twenty others of them apprehended, and executed in Smithfield; and all the Prisons in and about London were filled with them.

In his third Year, the Order of Church-Service throughout England, was changed from the Use of St. Paul's, to the Use of Salisbury, to the great Disliking of many in those Days.

In his fourth Year, a Council was holden at Constance, whither he sent Ambassadors, the Earl of Warwick, the Bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Worcester. In which Council it was decreed, That England should have the Title of the English Nation, and should be accounted one of the Five principal Nations in Rank before Spain; which often before had been moved, but never granted till then. And herein were all Wickliff's Positions condemned; Also John Huss, and Hierom of Prague (notwithstanding the Emperor's safe Conduct) were both of them burned. In this Council, the Schism of Anti-Popes, which had continued the Space of nine and twenty Years, was reformed. Benedict XIII. had been elected by the Spaniards, Gregory XII. by the French; John XXIV. by the Italians: And now in this Council, begun in February 1414, and continued above three Years; wherein were assembled, besides the Emperor, the Pope, and the Palgrave of Rhine, four Patriarchs, twenty-seven Cardinals, seven and forty Archbishops, one hundred and threescore Bishops; Princes and Barons, with their Attendants, above thirty thousand. The foresaid elected Popes were all put down, or else resigned; and in the Place, as legitimate Pope, was elected Otho Colonna, by the Name of Martin the Fifth.

Sir John Oldcastle condemned of Heresy, is hanged in St. Giles's Field in a Chain by the Middle.

In a Council holden at Constance, England ranked before Spain.

John Huss burned.

Three Anti-Popes put down, and a Fourth established.

In this Year also fell out an Accident, which shews the strict Observance of Ecclesiastical Censures in those Days. The Wives of the Lord Strange, and Sir John Trussell of Warming-ton in Cheshire, striving for Place at a Sermon in St. Dunstan's Church in the East, their Husbands being present, fell themselves to striving in their Wives Behalf, and great Part-taking there was on both Sides, some slain, and many wounded. The Delinquents were committed to the Compter, the Church suspended; and upon Examination, the Lord Strange being found guilty, was by the Archbishop of Canterbury adjudged to this Penance, which was accordingly performed: The Parson of St. Dunstan's went before, after whom followed all the Lord's Servants in their Shirts; after them went the Lord himself bare-headed, with a Wax Taper in his Hand; then followed the Lady bare-footed;

Penance enjoined for striving in the Church.

A.D. 1422 and then last, came the Arch-deacon Reynold Renwood; in which Order they went from St. Paul's, where the Sentence was given, to St. Dunstan's Church: Where, at the Re-hallowing thereof, the Lady filled all the Vessels with Water; and, according to the Sentence, offered to the Altar an Ornament of the Value of ten Pounds, and the Lord a Pixe of Silver of five Pounds. A Penance no doubt which the Lord and the Lady would have redeemed with a great deal of Money, if the Discipline of the Church had in those Days allowed it; but it seems the Commutation of Penance was not as yet come in Use.

In his ninth Year, in a Parliament at Leicester, a hundred and ten Priors alien were suppressed, because they spoke ill of his Conquests in France, and their Possessions were given to the King; but by him, and King Henry the Sixth, were afterward given to other Monasteries and Colleges of learned Men.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his Time.

THIS King re-edified his Royal Mannor, which was then called Shene, now Richmond, and founded two Monasteries not far from it; the one of Carthusians, which he named Bethlehem, the other of religious Men and Women of the Order of St. Bridget, which he named Sion: He also founded the Brotherhood of St. Giles without Cripplegate in London. In the second Year of his Reign, Moor-gate, near to Coleman-street, was first made; by Thomas Fawkenner, Mayor of London, who caused also the Ditches of the City to be cleansed, and a common Privy that was on the Moor without the Wall to be taken down, and another to be made within the City upon Walbrook, into the which Brook he caused the Water of the City to be turned by Grates of Iron in divers Places. In his sixth Year, William of Sevenoke, Mayor of London, founded in the Town of Sevenoke a Free-School and thirteen Alms-houses. This Man was found at Sevenoke in Kent, a new born Infant of unknown Parents, but by charitable People was christned and brought up, bound Apprentice in London, and came at last to be Mayor of the City. Also Robert Chickley, Mayor of London, gave liberally to the Alms-houses founded by his Brother Henry Chickley, Archbishop of Canterbury, at Higham Ferrers in Northamptonshire, where they were born. But Henry Chickley, the Archbishop, founded two Colleges in Oxford, one called Bernard College, renewed by Sir Thomas White, and named St. John's College; the other called All Souls, which continueth at this Day as he left it. Also John Kempe, Archbishop of Canterbury, converted the Parish-Church of Wye in Kent, where he was born, into a College of Secular Priests.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN the fifth Year of his Reign, a great Part of the City of Norwich was burnt, with all the House of the Friars Preachers, and two Friars of that Order. In his third Year, on the Feast of the Purification, seven Dolphins came up the River of Thames, whereof four were taken.

Of his Wife and Issue.

HE married Katharine, the Daughter of A.D. 1422 King Charles the Sixth of France, who was his Queen about two Years and three Months; married at Trois in Champagne the third Day of June 1420, and afterward, February the 14th, Crowned at Westminster. She surviving K. Henry, was re-married to Owen Tudor, an Esquire of Wales, who pretended to be descended from Cadwalader, the antient King of Wales, though some write him to be the Son of a Brewer, whose Meanness of Estate was recompensed by the Delicacy of his Personage, so absolute in all the Lineaments of his Body, that the only Contemplation of it might well make her forget all other Circumstances. By him she had three Sons, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen, and a Daughter that lived but a while. Her Son Owen took the Habit of Religion at Westminster, the other two were by King Henry the Sixth, their half Brother, advanced in Honour: Edmund was created Earl of Richmond, and marrying the sole Heir of John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, was Father by her, unto Henry the Seventh, King of England, the only Heir of the House of Lancaster. Jasper, her second Son, was first created Earl of Pembroke, and after Duke of Bedford, but died without lawful Issue. This Queen, either for Devotion, or her own Safety, took into the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwark, who dying the second of January 1436, she was buried in our Lady's Chappel within St. Peter's Church at Westminster; whose Corpse taken up in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, her Grand-child (when he laid the Foundation of that admirable Structure) and her Coffin placed by King Henry, her Husband's Tomb, hath ever since so remained, and never since re-buried, where it standeth (the Cover being loose) to be seen and handled of any that will. By her King Henry had only one Son, named Henry, who succeeded him in the Kingdom.

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was tall of Stature, lean of Body, and his Bones but small, but strongly made, somewhat long necked, black hair'd, and very beautiful of Face, swift in running, so as he, with two of his Lords, without Bow or other Engine, would take a wild Buck or Doe in a large Park. He delighted in Songs and musical Instruments, insomuch that in his Chappel amongst his private Prayers, he used certain Psalms of David, translated into English Metre by John Lydgate, Monk of Bury. And indeed it may be truly said of him as was said of Aeneas; Quo justior alter, nec pietate fuit, nec bello major & armis; for he seldom fought Battel where he got not the Victory; and never got Victory whereof he gave not the Glory to God, with publick Thanksgiving. He was a better Man when King than a Subject; for till then he was not in his right Orb, and therefore no Marvel if he were something exorbitant. He was of a merciful Disposition, but not to the Prejudice of Wisdom; as thinking wise Cruelty to be

The strange Fortune of William Sevenoke.

St. John's College, and All Souls College in Oxford, by whom founded.

Seven Dolphins in the River of Thames.

A.D. 1422 be better than foolish Pity, he was no less politick than valiant; for he never fought Battel, nor won Town, wherein he prevailed not as much by Stratagem as by Force. He was so temperate in his Diet, and so free from Vain-glory, that we may truly say he had something in him of Cæsar, which Alexander the Great had not, that he would not be drunk; and something of Alexander the Great, which Cæsar had not, that he would not be flattered. He was indeed a great Affecter of Glory, but not of the Glory of the Blast of Mens Mouths, but of the Glory that fills the Sails of Time. He died of full Years, though not full of Years: If he had lived longer, he might have gone over the same again, but could not have gone further. If his Love were great to military Men, it was not small to Clergy-men; insomuch as by many he was called the Prince of Priests.

Of his Death and Burial.

SOME say he was poisoned, which Polydore Virgil saith, was much suspected. The Scots write that he died of the Disease called Saint Piacre, which is a Palsy and a Cramp: Enguerant saith, that he died of St. Anthony's Fire. But Peter Basset Esquire, who at the Time of his Death was his Chamberlain, affirmeth that he died of a Pleurisy, which at that Time was a Sickness strange, and but little known. Being dead, his Body was embalmed and closed in Lead, and laid in a Chariot-royal richly apparelled in Cloth of Gold, was conveyed from Bois de Vincennes to Paris, and so to Roan, to Abbeville, to Calais, to Dover, and from thence through London to Westminster, where it was interred next beneath King Edward the Confessor, upon whose Tomb Queen Katharine caused a royal Picture to be laid, covered all over with Silver Plate gilt, but the Head there- A.D. 1422 of altogether of massy Silver: All which, at that Abby's Suppression, were sacrilegiously broken off and transferred to prophaner Uses. He died the last Day of August, in the Year 1422, when he had reigned nine Years and five Months, lived eight and thirty Years, though some say two Years fewer.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

MEN of Valour in his Time were so frequent, that we may know it to be a true Saying, Regis ad exemplum; and Men of Learning likewise in such Numbers, that we may know the Prince to have been their Patron. First, Alan de Lin, a Carmelite Frier in that Town, who wrote many Treatises; then Thomas Otterbone, a Franciscan Frier, who wrote a History of England; then John Seguerd, who kept a School in Norwich, and wrote sundry Treatises, reproving as well the Monks and Priests as Poets for writing of filthy Verses. Robert Rose, a Carmelite Frier in Norwich, who writing many Treatises, yet said nothing against the Wickliffists. Richard Cayster, born in Norfolk, a Man of great Holiness of Life, favouring, though secretly, the Doctrine of Wickliff: William Wallis, a Black-Frier in Lynn, who made a Book of Moralizations upon Ovid's Metamorphosis; William Taylor, a Priest and Master of Arts in Oxford, a steadfast Follower of Wickliff's Doctrine, and burnt for the same, at Smithfield in London, the last Year of this King's Reign. Bartholomew Florarius, called so of a Treatise which he wrote called Florarium; who wrote also another Treatise of Abstinence, wherein he reproveth the corrupt Manners of the Clergy, and the Profession of the Friars Mendicants.

King H E N R Y VI.

A.D. 1422

THERE hath been a Race of Princes, of which for three Generations together it might be said rightly, Pulcherrima Proles, Magnanimi Heroes nati melioribus Annis; for King Edward the Third had many Sons, not inferior in Valour to the many Sons of King Priamus, not excepting his valiant Son Hector, having so equal a Match for him as Edward the Black Prince, who wanted but an Homer to have been an Achilles. Then John of Gaunt had divers Sons, Men as valorous as any that Age afforded. Then Henry the Fourth had four Sons, of so heroical Disposition all, that you might know them all to be his Sons, only K. Henry the Fifth to be his eldest. And now that in him the heroical Nature was come to the Height, it degenerated again in K. Henry the Sixth, which must needs be attributed to the Mother's Side; who, though in her self she was a Princess of a noble Spirit, yet being the Issue of a crazy Father, what Marvel if she proved the Mother of a crazy Issue? And yet even this Issue of hers, a Prince no Doubt of excellent Parts in their Kind, though not of Parts kindly for a Prince, in a private Man praiseworthy enough, but the Sword of a King required a harder Metal than the soft Temper of K. Henry the Sixth was made of: And in him we may see the Fulfilling of the Text; Vae Genti cujus Rex est puer, Vae to that Nation whose King is a Child; for he was not above eight Months old when he succeeded his Father in the Kingdom. Although that Text perhaps is not meant so much of a Child in Years, for which there may be Helps by good Protectors, as of a Child in Abilities of Ruling, whereof, though possibly there may, yet probably there can be no sufficient Supply; of which in this King we have a pregnant Example; for as long as he continued a Child in Years, so long his Kingdoms were kept flourishing by the Providence of his careful Uncles; but as soon as he left being a Child in Years, and yet continued a Child in Ability of Ruling, then presently began all Things In pejus ruere, & retro sublapsa referri; all Things went to wreck both in France and England. And thus much was necessary to be said by way of a Preface to that great Fall as it were of Nilus, in King Henry the Sixth.

K. Henry but eight Months old when his Father died.

Henry, called of Windfor, because born there, the only Child of K. Henry the Fifth, as yet scarce nine Months old, succeeded his Father, and was proclaimed King of England on the A.D. 1422 last of August in the Year 1422; by reason of whose Infancy King Henry, his Father, had before by his Will appointed, and now the Lords by their Consent confirmed the Regency of France to John Duke of Bedford, the Government of England to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, the Guard of his Person to Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord-Chancellor: Wherein it was wisely provided, that one Man should not rule all, lest it should prove a Spur to Aspiring, and withal stay them from envying one another, when many were alike placed in the highest Form of Authority: And indeed they all carried themselves so uprightly and carefully in their Places, that it well appeared the Trust reposed in them by the dying King, had made a strong Impression of Love and Loyalty towards his Son.

The Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was to keep that by the Sword which King Henry the Fifth by his Sword had gotten; wherein he had many and great Assistants, especially the two Terrors of France, Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot: And amongst the French themselves the Duke of Burgoyne, a Friend no less powerful than firm unto him.

The Dauphin also (now Crowned King at Poitiers, and called Charles the Seventh of France, his Father being newly dead, within a little more than a Month after K. Henry) had likewise great Assistants, the Duke of Alençon and many other Peers of France, and of the Scots many, and some perhaps of the English that took Part with him; by Means whereof the Game of Fortune was a long Time played between them with great Variety. The first Act of the Duke of Bedford's Regency, was an Oration which he made to the French in Paris, which wrought this good Effect, that King Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and such French Lords as were present did their Homages, and took their Oaths to be true unto him. The first Act of Hostility was performed by the new King of France, who sends the Lord Granville to Pont Meaulan, who surprized it, putting all the English Soldiers to the Sword; but the Regent sending thither Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, so strongly beleaguered it, that the Lord Granville not only surrendered it, but swore Allegiance (though he kept it not) to the King of England. From thence the Earl marched to Seine, which he took by Assault; and

K. Henry is proclaimed in Paris, King of England and France.

A.D. 1423 and put all the Soldiers (except the Captain, Sir William Maryn) to the Sword.

The Duke of Bedford marries the Sister of the Duke of Burgoyne. The Parisians aspiring, are repressed by the Regent.

At this Time the Regent, the Duke of Burgoyne, John Duke of Britain, and his Brother in Law the Duke of Richmond (who revolted afterward to the new K. of France, and was by him made Constable in France) met at Amiens; and there not only renewed the old League, but further enlarged it to be offensive and defensive respectively: And to make the Friendship the more firm, the Regent married Anne the Sister of the Duke of Burgoyne at Troyes. In this mean Time the Parisians taking Advantage of the Regent's Absence, conspired to have let in the new King into Paris; but the Day before the Night appointed for his Admission, the Regent with his Power entred, apprehended the Conspirators, and put them to publick Execution. That done, he furnished all the Forts and Places of Strength with English-men, and sent Sir John Falstaffe, who took in Pacye, and Coursay, two strong Castles; whilst himself with his Forces took in Traynels, and Braye upon Seine.

The Montague, Earl of Salisbury, defeats a great Army of the French.

The Constable of France the mean while, with the new King's Forces, laid Siege to Cravant in Burgoyne; but the Regent sent thither the Earl of Salisbury, who set upon the French; and after a long Fight putting them to Flight, slew about eighteen hundred Knights and Gentlemen of Note, and three thousand Common Soldiers, Scots and French, took Prisoners the Constable himself, the Earl of Ventadour, Sir Alexander Alerdyn, Sir Lewis Ferignye, and two and twenty hundred Gentlemen. Of the English Part were slain Sir John Grey, Sir William Hall, Sir Gilbert Halfall, Richard ap Maddock, and one and twenty hundred Soldiers. From thence the Earl led his Forces to Monteguillon, and sat down before it, which after five Months Siege he took, whilst the Duke of Suffolk took in the two strong Castles of Cowcy and le Roche.

1424. James the first, King of Scots, after 18 Years Imprisonment is released, and the Manner of doing his Homage.

Whilst these Things are done in France, in England the Protector ransomed and enlarged the young King of Scots, James the First (who by the Space of eighteen Years had been kept a Prisoner) which he did out of Opinion, that he might withdraw the Scots out of France, taking Homage and Fealty of him for the Crown of Scotland in these Words: I James Stuart, King of Scots, shall be true and faithful to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superior Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my Fidelity for the said Kingdom, which I hold and claim of you, and shall do you Service for the same; So God me help, and these holy Evangelists. And therewithal, with Consent of all the Nobility, the Protector gave him to Wife Jane, Daughter to the deceased Duke of Somerset, and Cousin-german to the King, with a large Dowry, and married them at St. Mary Overy's in Southwark; yet all this Courtesy could not keep him afterward from being unfaithful and unthankful.

And now the Protector sent over to the Regent ten thousand well furnished Soldiers, with which fresh Succour he won many Towns and Places of Strength; which the French seeing, and finding themselves too weak by plain Force to withstand the English, they fought by Subtily to compass their Ends: And first, they work upon the Inconstancy of the Duke of Britain, and his Brother Arthur, by K. Henry A.D. 1424 the fifth, created Earl of Yrvy, whom by Gifts and Promises they suborned, perfidiously to deliver over into their Possession the Castles of Crotoyne and Yerney; but the English, before the French Garrisons were settled, fell upon Crotoyne, and recovered it; and that done, the Regent besieged Yerney; and by secret Mining, and violent Batteries, so shook the Walls, that they agreed to yield it up, if not relieved by a certain Time. Whereupon the Duke of Alanson, with sixteen thousand French, came to the Rescue; but perceiving the English prepared to receive them, he wheeled about to Vernevil, and swore to the Townsmen that he had put the Regent to Flight, and rescued Yerney; which they believing, rendered up Vernevil to him; but the Regent followed him thither, when, by the Encouragement of some fresh Companies of Scots come to his Succour, he came to a Battel in the Field, where the English, with the Loss of two thousand one hundred Common Soldiers, and two of the Nobility, the Lord Dudley and the Lord Charleton, got the Honour of the Day, and slew of their Enemies, five Earls, two Viscounts, twenty Barons, and above seven thousand other of the French, besides two thousand seven hundred Scots lately arrived, and took Prisoners the Duke of Alanson himself, the Lord of Hernis, and divers other French; and Sir John Turnbull, and two hundred Gentlemen, besides Common Soldiers. This Battel was fought the eight and twentieth Day of August, in the Year 1424, and thereupon Vernevil was presently re-delivered.

The Regent gives the French a great Overthrow at Vernevil.

The Earl of Salisbury doth great Acts in France.

After this the Earl of Salisbury, with ten thousand Men, taketh in the strong Town of Mans, the Town of St. Susan, the Fort of St. Bernard, and others; from thence he went to Anjou, where he performed such heroick Acts, that his very Name grew terrible in all France; as for Instance, the new High-Constable, perfidious Richmond, with forty thousand Men, laid Siege to the good Town of St. James in Benyon, the Garrison whereof consisted but of six hundred English; who being driven to some Extremity, sallied forth, crying, St. George! A Salisbury! Which Name of Salisbury so frightened the French, thinking he had been come to rescue them, that casting away their Weapons, they ran all away, saving some few that yielded themselves Prisoners, leaving all their Tents, fourteen Pieces of Ordnance, forty Barrels of Powder, three hundred Pipes of Wine, much Armour, and some Treasure behind them. After which other Castles, as that of Beaumont, of Vicount, Teuney, Gilly, Osce, Ruffj, Vassy, and many other were taken in by Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Falstaffe; so as once again the French are glad to betake themselves to their old Course of Fraud; they compounded with a Gascoigne Captain for Delivery of Alanson to them; whereof the Regent having Notice, he sent the Lord Willoughby and Sir John Falstaffe to prevent it; who encountering with Charles de Villiers, that with two hundred Horse, and three hundred Foot, was come to the Place appointed for Entry, took and slew them all, except some few Horse which saved themselves by flying. After which the Earl of Salisbury took in and demolished above

His very Name defeated an Army of forty thousand.

The French use Fraud, but to their own Hurt.

A.D. 1424 forty Castles and strong Piles, for which there was publick Thanksgiving to God in London.

K. Henry at four Years old dubbed Knight by the Regent.

Richard Plantagenet created Duke of York, Father to K. Edward the Fourth.

The Bishop of Winchester made a Cardinal.

An. Reg. 4. 1425.

The Duke of Gloucester marries another Man's Wife, and the Trouble that grew about it.

Whilst these things were done in France, an unkind Variance fell out between the Protector and his Brother the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor; for appeasing whereof, the Regent having substituted the Earl of Warwick Lieutenant-General in his Absence, came into England; where in a Parliament he compounded all Differences between them. In Honour whereof K. Henry kept a solemn Feast, at which Time the Regent dubbed the King Knight, not yet above four Years old; and then the King presently invested with that Dignity many of his Servants; and Edmund Mortimer, the last Earl of March, at this Time dying, his Inheritance descended to Richard Plantagenet, Son and Heir to Richard Earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton, who was now created Duke of York, and was afterward Father to King Edward the Fourth: And at this Time also, John Mowbray, Son and Heir to Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, banished before by K. Richard the Second, was restored by the Title of Duke of Norfolk. And now all Things peaceably settled in England, the Regent with the Bishop of Winchester returned into France; where, at the Intercession of the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Alençon was ransomed for two hundred thousand Crowns: And the Bishop of Winchester returned to Calais, where he was invested with the Dignity and Hat of Cardinal, which his Brother the Regent put upon his Head.

In the fourth Year of this King's Reign, a Parliament was holden at Leicester, called of the common People, The Parliament of Bats; because, being commanded to lay by their Swords, Servants took great Bats to follow their Lords and Masters to the Parliament.

About this Time the Duke of Gloucester, Protector, took some Blemish in his Honour, by marrying another Man's Wife, Jaqueline Countess of Heynault, Holland and Zealand, who was married before to John Duke of Brabant, yet living, and had lived with him ten Months as his lawful Wife; but at that Time upon some Discontent gone from him, intending to be divorced. At which Injury offered to the Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Burgoyne, being his Cousin, took so great Offence, that first by Friendly Letters he admonished the Duke of Gloucester of it; and that not prevailing, they grew to Terms of Challenge, and a Combat between them was appointed; but in the mean Time the Lady betrayed, was carried to the Duke of Burgoyne, who conveyed her to Gant; from whence, by Friendship of a Burgoyne Knight, in Man's Apparel she escaped into Holland, and there made a defensive War against her Husband the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Burgoyne. To her Aid the Duke of Gloucester sent the Lord Fitzwater, with a Power of a thousand Men; but she being discomfited by the Duke of Brabant, and the Pope also pronouncing the first Marriage legal, the Duke of Gloucester deserted her, and then took for a second Wife Eleanor Daughter of the Lord Cobham of Sterborough, his old Mistress: And the Lady Jaqueline, after the Death of John Duke of Brabant, married a mean Gentleman; whom the Duke of Burgoyne imprisoned, and brought herself to live in much Trouble.

And now in France, the Constable with forty thousand Men, besieged the Town of St. James de Benuron: And having made a Breach fit for way with Assault, whilst his Captains stood straining of Courtesy, which of them should first enter, Sir Nicholas Burdet with all his Forces sallied forth, crying aloud, A Salisbury! A Salisbury! whose Name struck such a Terror into the Besiegers, that they stood like Men amazed, of whom six Hundred were slain, two Hundred drowned in the Ditches, fifty taken Prisoners, with eighteen Standards, and the Constable was glad to quit the Place, and give over the Siege.

At the same Time also the Earl of Warwick, and the Lord Scales, with seven thousand, besieged Ponterson many Weeks together; but Provision waxing scant, the Lord Scales with three thousand Men went a Foraging into the Enemy's Country: And in his Return with Plenty of Provision, was encountered with six thousand French, of whom he slew many Hundreds, took above a thousand Prisoners, and then returned safe into the Camp.

About this Time also Sir John Falstaffe besieged the strong Town of Granville, which after twelve Days, offered to render it self by a Day, if it were not relieved. The Offer was taken, and Pledges delivered; but before the Day came, they within the Town had victualled and manned the Place; and thereupon neglecting their Pledges, refused to render the Castle according to Agreement: Whereupon the Pledges were brought before the Sight of them within the Castle, and there openly put to Death.

And now a Conspiracy of the Clergy and Magistrates in Mans so prevailed, that the Marshals of France with five hundred Men about Mid-night came to the Town-Walls, where the Guard of English, by those that seemed their Friends, were suddenly massacred, and setting upon the Gates, made Way for the Enemy to enter: Whereupon the Alarm given, the Earl of Suffolk, with the surviving English, withdrew to the Castle, wherein they were sharply assailed by the French, who yet had more mind to ransack Houses, and to make good Cheer; whereof the Lord Talbot having Intelligence by Captain Goffe, whom he had sent to discover the State of the French, he secretly gave Notice to the Earl of Suffolk, who thereupon sallied forth of the Castle at a Time when the Lord Talbot was ready with his Troops: And on both Sides crying St. George! A Talbot! they fell upon the careless French, who lost four hundred of their best Men; the rest were all taken, the Town regained, and the Conspirators, thirty Citizens, twenty Priests, and fifteen Friars, condemned and put to Execution.

Whilst these Things went on prosperously in France, a great Disaster fell out in England; for the Right Noble Thomas Beauford (Son of John of Gaunt and Katharine Swinford) Duke of Exeter, and Guardian of the King, makes King Henry his Heir; and at East-Greenwich in Kent, ended his Life: Whose Place was presently supplied by the Earl of Warwick, and the Earl's Place in France by the Earl of Salisbury; who thereupon, with five thousand Men came to Orleans, Forty thousand French frightened a Salisbury!

The Lord Scales defeats an Army of French.

Pledges put to Death for not having Promise kept.

An Army of French defeated with crying, A Talbot!

Tho. Beauford Duke of Exeter dies.

A.D. 1428 Orleans, and besieged the City, and won from the French the great Fort. But here happened another great Disaster, for from an high Tower in this Fort, the Besiegers observed the Passages of the Townsmen; when the Noble Earl of Salisbury, intending to inform himself of the State of the Town, unfortunately looking out at a Window of the Fort, with Sir Thomas Gargrave, a great Shot from the Town striking the Bars of the Window, the Splinters thereof were driven into his Head and Face; of which Wounds within eight Days he died. This was now a second Weakening to the English Party; but in this Place the Earl of Suffolk succeeded, to whom the Regent sendeth Sir John Falstaffe with fresh Supplies; whom the Lord De la Bret endeavours to intercept; but Sir John resolving to abide the Charge, placeth his Carriages behind, the Horse next, and the Foot before, lining his Bows with Bill-men, and pitching Stakes behind the Archers, who having discharged their first Volley, retired behind the Stakes: On which the French, forgetting their former Defeats by that Course, ran and gored their Horses, by which their Van-guard being disordered, their Battel made a Stand; which Sir John perceiving, cried out, St. George! they fly! At which Words they fled indeed, and lost two thousand five hundred of their Men, with the Lord De la Bret, and William Stuart; eleven hundred were taken Prisoners; with whom, and a rich Booty, they came to the Camp before Orleans. And this Battel, because most Part of the Carriage was Herring and Lenten Stuff, was by the French-men called the Battel of Herrings. But the Besieged having Notice of this Defeat, they offered to submit themselves to the Duke of Burgoyne, who was contented to receive them, so as the Regent would consent; but the Regent consented not, and therefore in the mean Time, the Besieged made Means to the Duke of Alanson, who furnished the Town with fresh Forces and Provisions; which put such Spirits into the Citizens, that they made a Sally out, slew six hundred English, and adventured upon the Basile, where the Lord Talbot commanded, who repelled them with great Slaughtering of their Men; but yet the next Day the Earl of Suffolk gave over his Siege, and dispersed his Army into their Garrisons.

And now the Wheel of Fortune began to turn to the French against the English, which once set a going was not easy to be stayed. And first the Duke of Alanson took by Assault the Town of Jargeux, and in it the Earl of Suffolk, and one of his Brothers, and slew Sir Alexander Pole, another of his Brothers, and many other Prisoners in cold Blood, by reason of a Contention amongst the French to whom the Prisoners should belong. Presently upon this, another great Blow was given the English; for the Lord Talbot, Scales and Hungerford, going to fortify the Town of St. Meum, were encountred by the said Duke of Alanson, and Arthur of Britain, with three and twenty thousand Men, with whom the English Lords interchanged some Blows: But oppressed with Multitude, were all three taken Prisoners, all fore wounded, twelve hundred of their Company slain, and the rest hardly escaping to Meum, where they fortified themselves the best they could against future Assaults.

These were great Blows given to the English Fortune in France; Salisbury slain, and now Talbot taken Prisoner; which tho' they made her a little to totter, yet there must be great Blows given before she will fall. And indeed, these Disasters were seconded by the perfidious Surrender of many Towns and strong Holds to the French King; who now encouraged by these Successes, marcheth into Champaigne, where by Composition he took Troyes the chief City of that Province: Chalons rebelleth, and enforceth their Captain to yield it up; by whose Example the Citizens of Rheims do the like, where the French King is a-new Proclaimed, and with accustomed Ceremonies Anointed and Crowned: Whereupon many Towns submit themselves to him, and revolt from the English. Upon this the Duke of Bedford (to make the French know, that all the English Strength consisted not only in Salisbury and Talbot) with ten thousand English, besides Normans, marched out of Paris, and sent Letters of Defiance to the French King, affirming, That deceitfully and by unjust Means he had stolen many Cities and Places of Importance belonging to the Crown of England; which he was come to justify by Battel, if he would appoint a Time and Place. To which the King of France making a slight Answer, the Regent marcheth apace toward him, and as fast the King of France marched away. The Regent followed him, but could not overtake him, till he came near to Senlis: There both the Armies encamped and embattelled, yet only some light Skirmishes passed between them. And a Night or two after, the French King fled with his Army to Bray, which the Duke thinking to be but a Plot to draw him further off from Paris, of whose Fidelity he had no great Assurance, followed him no further, but returned thither. At which Time the Regent's Brother the Cardinal, having prepared Forces to assist Pope Martin in Bohemia, the Regent borrowed them of him for a present Expedition, and with them marched into Champaigne, where he found the French King encamped upon the Mount Piball, whose Number being twice as many as the Regent's, yet by no Provocations could be drawn to Battel, but secretly fled to Crespy; whereupon the Regent also returned to Paris.

Whilst these Things were done in France, in England, upon St. Leonard's Day the 6th of November, 1429, King Henry not yet eight Years old, was with great Solemnity Crowned at Westminster, at whose Coronation were made six and thirty Knights of the Bath, and after the Solemnity, a Feast; and if any Man desire to know much Cookery, he may read in Fabian all the Dishes of Meat that were served at that Feast.

About this Time, in France a strange Impostor ariseth: A Maid called La Pucelle, taking upon her to be sent from God for the Good of France, and to expel the English; and some Good indeed she did; for by her subtil working, the King was received into Champaigne, and many Towns were rendred to him, whilst the Lord Longueville

La Pucelle begins to shew herself.

A.D. 1429 Longueville took by Surprize the Castle of Aumerle, and slew all the English that were in it. But all these were but petty Acquests to the King of France: There is a Knot of Friendship between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoigne, which must be broken, or he will never be able to compass his Designs; he therefore labours by all Means possible to disunite them; wherein he so little prevailed, that the Duke of Burgoigne acquaints the Regent with all the Practices; who thereupon, with many Thanks exhorteth him to continue firm, of which he should never have Cause to repent him: And because Normandy was a principal Part of the English Strength in France, he goeth thither, and by many Reasons persuades them, as their Ancestors had always been, to be faithful to the Crown of England.

In this Time of the Regent's Absence from Paris, the King of France drew all his Forces thither, using all Means possible, by Escalado, Battery, and burning the Gates, to enter the City; but was so withstood by the Vigilancy of the Citizens, that he was glad to sound a Retreat, leaving his slain and maimed Soldiers behind him, all but La Pucelle; who being hurt in the Leg, and almost stifled with Mire in the Ditch, was by a Servant of the Duke of Alanson drawn up, and conveyed after the King to Berry, who by the Way received the Submission of the Inhabitants of Lagny. Some other Services were performed on both Sides, by the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Thomas Kyriel, for the English; by the Bastard of Orleans, and Sir Stephen le Hye, for the French; but of no great Importance: Till at last, La Pucelle (who a little before had caused an English Captain's Head to be cut off, because he would not humble himself to her upon his Knee) was by Sir John of Lutzenburgh taken, and presented to the Duke of Burgoigne, who sent her to the Regent, and he to the Bishop of the Diocess, who judicially proceeding against her as a Sorceress, and Deceiver of the King and his Subjects, she was (after many Delays of Promise to discover secret Practice, and lastly of her feigning to be with Child) publickly burnt at Roan.

An. Reg. 10.
1431.

K. Henry is Crowned King of France in Paris.

And now the Regent finding how much the Crowning of the French King had furthered his Designs, he made Account the like Effect would follow the Crowning of King Henry in France: Whereupon he is sent for to come over; and coming to Paris, was by his Uncle the Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal of St. Eusebius, not yet above nine Years old, with all usual Ceremonies, Crowned King of France, receiving the Oaths of Homage and Fealty of all the French Nobility that were present, and of all the Inhabitants of Paris, and of all the Places adjacent: Upon this Pope Eugenius laboured a Reconciliation between the two Kings, but could effect nothing but only a Truce for six Years: Which agreed upon, King Henry returns into England, and landed at Dover the 11th of February. But the six Years Truce was scarce openly proclaimed, when the French had cunningly possessed themselves of divers Castles and Places of Strength, justifying their Actions, affirming, That what was politickly obtained without Blows, was no Infringement of the Truce; and afterwards perfidiously conveyed two hundred Men into the Castle of Roan, with Intent to have surprized it; but being discovered, they were all taken, and either ransomed or put to Execution. Upon this, the Regent (whose Wife, the Sister of the Duke of Burgoigne, being lately dead, and he married again to Jaqueline the Earl of St. Paul's Daughter, with whom he went over into England) returned again to Paris; to whom the Lord Talbot, having now paid his Ransom, cometh, bringing with him seven hundred tried Soldiers; and with them the Regent takes the Field, where the French Army lay; but the French slunk away in the Dark, as not daring to abide the Hazard of a Battel.

A Truce abused.

About this Time, the Duke of Bourbon, taken at the Battel of Agincourt, after eighteen Years Imprisonment, paying eighteen thousand Pounds for his Ransom, the same Day he was enlarged, died at London.

And now a very great Effect was produced out of a very small Cause: There had been Sparks of Unkindness between the two great Dukes of Bedford and Burgoigne, which break out into a Flame upon this Occasion: A Time and Place was appointed, where they should meet to compound some Differences that were between them: The Place agreed upon, was St. Omers, a Town in Artois: When the Time came they stood upon this nice Point, which of them should first come to the Place; as thinking that he which did so, should hereby acknowledge himself to be the meaner Person. The Duke of Bedford thought he had no Reason to do it, seeing he was Regent of France, and therefore superior to any Subject in the Kingdom; and the Duke of Burgoigne thought he had no Reason to do it, seeing it was to be done in his own Dominions, where he was himself the Sovereign Lord. Upon this nice Point they broke off, and never met; and the Unkindness grew afterward to so great Hatred, that the Duke of Burgoigne chose rather to be Friends with him that had murdered his Father, than ever to have any more Commerce with the Duke of Bedford. Thus was one great Branch of Assistance lopp'd off from the English, which had been a great Means before to make it flourish: And it was not so much, that the Assistance was taken from the English, as that it was added to the French: For after this, the Duke of Burgoigne brought more Assistance to the new King of France, than ever he had done before to the King of England. By which we may see, when the divine Providence hath a Work to effect, what slight Occasions it oftentimes takes to effect the Work.

Great Blows had been given before in France to the English Fortune by the Enemies; but now a Blow was given to it by Destiny, which made the Enemies Blows more incurable; for now the Wife, Valiant, Faithful Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Anjou and Alanson, Earl of Maine, Harcourt, Drieux, Richmond, and Carlisle, and Viscount Beaumont, upon the 13th of September, 1435, ended his Life at Paris, which was in a Manner the ending the Life of the English Fortune in France: All former Blows had been upon inferior Members,

A.D. 1435 Members, but this was a Blow upon the Head, and therefore mortal; and indeed the English Fortune in France ever after lifted up its Head but very weakly. He was buried in our Lady's Church at Roan, as the Nobility of Normandy desired, who would have their own Territory honoured with his Sepulchre: Yet see the Levity of these Men, who a few Years after in the Reign of Lewis the Son of Charles, would have had his Monument to have been demolished, as being dishonourable, such an Arch-enemy to France should be interred in the Metropolitan City of that Province. But Lewis answered, God forbid I should give Way to so dishonourable an Act, to disquiet his dead Bones, who living would have disquieted us all; and it savours of too much Baseness to insult upon a dead Lion.

The noble Disposition of K. Lewis of France.

The Duke of York is made Regent of France, which the Duke of Somerset envying, hinders his Proceedings all he can.

1436. Paris expels all the English, and by their Example many other Towns likewise.

But yet in these Disasters there might have been some Reparation by a good Successor, had not Envy and Ambition bred Disturbance: The Duke of Somerset desired the Succession, but the Duke of York obtained it; which bred such an Envy in the Duke of Somerset towards him, that he laboured nothing so much as to cross his Designs, and was a Means to hinder the Duke of York's going to his Charge so long, that the Parisians had Time to think of freeing themselves from the English Servitude: And thereupon the City, after it had remained seventeen Years in the Possession of the English, yields to the Constable, and upon Composition expels all the English; and which was worse, many other Towns followed this Example of Paris; for what Towns would not willingly do as Paris did, the Epitome as it were of all France? and which they stick not to call, Le Monde de Paris; as though there were upon Earth no other World but Paris. Even the Normans, who had always been most firm to the English, yet had run the same Course, if the Lord Talbot had not kept them in Awe, with the Slaughter of five thousand of them that way enclined. And now after these great Losses, we must be content to play smaller Games, cast at Castles and Forts, and some small Towns, like the Struggling of dying Men, doing Acts of Life, till there be no more Life remaining. And this was now our Case in France. The new Regent with eight thousand Soldiers arrived at Harfleur, and from thence marched to Roan; where he won the Reputation of Justice and Uprightness, notwithstanding all the Calumniation of the Duke of Somerset: When the revolted Duke of Burgoyne pretending Title to the Town of Calais, approacheth it with an Army of Forty thousand Men, takes the poor Bastile of Oye, and slaughters and hangs many of the Defendants. The Picards besieged the Castle of St. Mark, took it, and demolished it; from thence they begirt Calais with a Siege, but were repelled: Then the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lord Croy to besiege the Castle of Guines, but were repelled there also. In the mean Time Pembroke the Herald brought a Defiance to the Duke of Burgoyne from the Duke of Gloucester the Protector, That he would give him Battel if he would abide it: To whom the Duke of Burgoyne answered, He should be sure to find him where he now was. Whereupon he calleth a Council, and whilst they are debating what is best to be done, A.D. 1436 the Calaisians make a Salley, take the Bastile which they had builded by Force, and slew Eightscore of the *Burgoyne*s; which so terrified them, that they upbraid the Duke of Burgoyne, and make both him and the Lord Croy to quit their Quarters; and in such Haste to be gone, that they left a great Part of their best Ordnance, and all their Provision for the Relief and Help of the Besieged: And it seems they had Reason so to do; for the next Day, being the seven and twentieth of July, the Duke of Gloucester landed at Calais with five and twenty thousand good fighting Men; who finding the Enemy recoiled, foraged all the Country thereabout, and for the Space of six Weeks harrowed all the Parts of Flanders, Artois, and Heynault: And then returning by St. Omers, Arde, and Guines, arrived at Calais.

The Duke of Gloucester lands at Calais with twenty five thousand fighting Men.

And now we must look a little at Home; for the Duke of York returning into England, finds the Castle of Roxborough besieged by the King of Scots, with thirty thousand Men; but he hearing of the Earl of Northumberland's Approach, and the Duke's Return, incontinently fled. And now again to France, where the Town of Harfleur was sold to the French; but the Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot, besetting it both by Sea and Land, though the Earl of Eu, and the Bastard of Orleans and Bourbon, with four thousand Men came to relieve it, yet upon Composition it was surrendered.

And here we may have Leave to speak of a private Matter; for about this Time the Duchess of Bedford married Sir Richard Woodville, a gallant young Gentleman, but of small Means; which though it offended her Friends, yet it seems offended not God, who made her Mother of many Children by him; and amongst the rest, of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards married to K. Edward the Fourth. Also about this Time James King of Scots, who before had been eighteen Years Prisoner in England, and afterward released, with a Wife of a noble House, a great Dower, and many honourable Presents, yet proved ungrateful, was murdered in his Bed-chamber by Night, whose Murtherers being found out, were cruelly tortured. And now again to France, when the Duke of Burgoyne could neither by Force nor Policy take Calais, he attempted a ridiculous Practice, to cut a Ditch that should drown both the Town and Country; but after much Labour and Expence, his Design like a Vapour vanished into Air. The Lord Talbot besieged Tankerville, and after four Months Siege had it rendered to him. In Revenge whereof, the French King in his own Person lays Siege to Monstreau; which whilst the Duke of York was providing to rescue, he was discharged of his Office, done on Purpose by his Enemies, to lay a Plot upon him: A lamentable Thing in a State, when private Envy shall be suffered to undermine the publick Safety; and by this Means Sir Thomas Gerard had the more Opportunity to sell the Town, for which, if he were Gainer in Money, he was yet a Loser in Reputation, and hated both of French and English, in much Discontent died.

Sir Thomas Gerard betrays the Town of Monstreau to the French.

A.D. 1437 but were with Dishonour repelled by the Lord Talbot: After this, Le Hyre sent Letters to them, that he had a Promise from divers Burghers of Roan to let them in at any Time appointed; against which Time they came to Ryze, within four Leagues of Roan; but the Lord Talbot having Notice hereof, marched covertly to Roan, and from thence before Day to Ryze, where he surpriseth the French, takes the Lord Fountaines, Sir Alan Geron, with many others, and with a rich Booty returneth to Roan. The sixth Day of November, in the sixteenth Year of the King's Reign, the Earl of Warwick having oftentimes been abroad, and still beaten back by Tempests, landed at Harfleur with a thousand fresh Soldiers, and from thence came to Roan; but in the mean Time the Duke of Burgoigne seeing no new Regent yet come, besieged the Town of Crotoy: To the Relief whereof, the new Regent now come, sent the Lord Talbot with five thousand Men, whose Approach the Duke not enduring, retired to Abbeville, leaving only four hundred, with whom he had manned the Bastile by him there erected, which was soon gained, and all the Soldiers either taken or slain: And there the valiant Talbot sent Word to the Duke, That if he would save his Country from Devastation, he should come to a Battel; but the Duke not liking the Match, conveys himself to Amiens. Twenty Days together did the Lord Talbot with Fire and Sword, pass through Picardy and Artois without Opposition, and then returned. Sir Thomas Kyrriel seized upon the Duke's Carriages and Ordinance; and having left in Crotoy Victuals enough for six hundred Men for a whole Year, he brought the rest to the Earl of Warwick. And now Henry Earl of Mortaigne, Son to Edmund Duke of Somerset, arrived with two hundred Archers and three hundred Spears, took the Castle of St. Anyon, wherein were three hundred Scots and French: The Scots he slew all, and hanged the French, because they had sworn Fealty to England, and broke it; he took likewise the Castle of Algarchie; and by Means of an Ambush, taketh the Lord Camorais, coming to the Rescue thereof. On the other Side, the Towns of Neuxin, Bry, and Susan, were sold and delivered to the French, by the treacherous Burghers. In June the Earl of Huntingdon, with two thousand Archers and four thousand Spears, was sent into Gascoigne, whether the Earl of Danois was lately come to buy Towns and Castles; but the Earl of Huntingdon upon his coming thither, changed all the Captains and Officers, whereby he prevented all such Bargains: And so far had Bribery spread it self at this Time, that even in Normandy the English Captains had but small Confidence in the Natives, and not much in some of their own Nation; whereupon Sir Richard Woodville, Sir William Chamberlain, and William Peto, were sent thither to stop the Current of that Corruption.

At this Time the Council of France procured a Reconcilement between the King and the Dauphin, who had been in long Jealousies and Dissention; which if it had not been done, the Kingdom had been torn with Factions, and never been able to subsist.

And now in a great Frost and Snow, the A.D. 1438 English, under the Conduct of Sir John Clifford, having covered their Armour with white Shirts, and their Heads with white Alman Skulls, came to Ponthois by Night, and undiscovered pass'd the Ditches, scaled the Walls, slew the Guards, and took the Town; but this good Luck was accompanied with a bad of more Importance: For presently upon it the Earl of Warwick died in the Castle of Roan, and conveyed into England, was buried in the Castle of Warwick. To reduce Ponthois, the French King in Person layeth Siege unto it, when Richard Duke of York being the second Time made Regent, having with him the Earl of Oxford, and the Earl of Eu, levies a Power to raise the Siege; and arriving there, sends Word to the King, that the next Morning he would give him Battel: But the King liked not his Bidding, but leaving his Ordinance, at Midnight stole away to Poissy. Thither also the Regent follows him, but with no Provocations could draw him to fight.

About this Time a Treaty for Peace between the two Kings is appointed to be held at Calais, by the Mediation of the Duchess of Burgoigne, a Portugal Lady; Commissioners meet on both Sides, but nothing concluded, only the Duke of Orleans, who had been Prisoner to the English five and twenty Years, is by the Duchess's Mediation ransomed with three hundred thousand Crowns of the Duke of Burgoigne's Money. The Lord Willoughby besieged Diepe, which the Dauphin with sixteen thousand Men cometh to raise; and there young Talbot is taken Prisoner, with Sir John Peto, and Sir John Repley, but are shortly after redeemed by Exchange. And now another Weakening happened to the English Party; the Earl of St. Paul forsakes them, and is reconciled to the K. of France. The English lay Siege to Tartus, for the raising whereof, the French King marched thither with 60,000 Men, relieveth the Town, and then marcheth to Saverine, which he taketh, and in it, Sir John Ramston; after which he took in Arques; but then the English cutting off all Convoys of Victuals from coming to him, he is forced to return; after whose Departure, the English recover all that he had taken; and to boot, take his Lieutenant Prisoner, slaying or hanging all his Soldiers. In this mean while the Lord Talbot taketh in Conquet, and driveth the Bastard of Orleans from the Siege of Gagliarde; but the French in the Castle of Cornbil detained many English Prisoners; for redeeming of whom, Sir Francis the Aragonist used this Stratagem; He apparelled Half a Dozen lusty young Fellows like Peasants, carrying Baskets with Corn and Victuals, and sends them to the Castle, while he with his Company lies in Ambush, in a Valley near the Castle; the six unsuspected are admitted; and coming to the Captain's Chamber, seise upon him, and withal give the Sign to the Ambush; who coming readily on, entred the Castle, put the Soldiers to the Sword, set the Prisoners at Liberty, burnt down the Castle, and with the Booty and Captain of the Castle returned to Roan.

A.D. 1440 the Uncle; the Duke of Gloucester brings Articles against the Cardinal, charging him with affecting Preheminence, to the Derogation of the King's Prerogative, and Contempt of his Laws; which Articles are delivered to the King, and by him to his Council, who being most of the Clergy, durst not meddle in them, for Fear of offending the Cardinal. On the other Side, the Cardinal finding nothing whereof directly to accuse the Duke of Gloucester himself, accuseth his other self, the Lady Eleanor Cobham, the Duke's Wife, of Treason, for attempting by Sorcery and Witchcraft the Death of the King, and Advancement of her Husband to the Crown: For which, tho' acquitted of the Treason, she is adjudged to open Penance, namely, to go with a Wax Taper in her Hand, Hoodless (save a Kerchief) through London, divers Days together, and after to remain in perpetual Imprisonment in the Isle of Man. The Crime objected against her was, procuring Thomas Southwel, John Hunne, Priests, Roger Bolingbroke, a supposed Necromancer, and Margery Jordan, called the Witch of Eye in Suffolk, to devise a Picture of Wax in Proportion of the King, in such sort by Sorcery, that as the Picture consumed, so the King's Body should consume: For which they were all condemned. The Witch was burnt in Smithfield, Bolingbroke was hanged, constantly affirming upon his Death, That neither the Dukes, nor any other from her, did ever require more of him, than only to know by his Art, how long the King should live. John Hunne had his Pardon, and Southwel died the Night before he should have been executed.

About this Time the Countess of Cominges being dead, the King of France and the Earl of Armagnac are Competitors for the Inheritance. The Earl takes Possession, but fearing the King of France's Greatness, makes Offer of his Daughter in Marriage to the King of England, with a large Portion in Money; and besides, to deliver full Possession of all such Towns and Castles as were by him or his Ancestors detained in Aquitaine, and had been formerly by the Progenitors of the King of England conquered. The Ambassadors for his Business were by King Henry graciously heard, and honourably returned: After whom were sent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Ros, and others, to conclude all Things; and the young Lady is by Proxy affianced to King Henry. But the King of France not liking the Proceedings of the Match, sendeth the Dauphin with a puissant Army, who took the Earl, with his youngest Son, and both his Daughters, and gained the Counties of Armagnac, Lovern, Rovergne, Moulleffenois, with the Cities of Severde and Cadeac, chasing the Bastard of Armagnac out of the Country; by Means whereof, the Marriage was then deferred, and left in Suspense.

In this Distraction of Christendom, many Princes, the Kings of Spain, Denmark, and Hungary, became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Ambassadors on both Sides are sent, many Meetings were had, many Motions made; but in Conclusion, only a Truce for eighteen Months is agreed upon. In the mean Time the Earl of Suffolk, one of the Commissioners for the Peace, takes A.D. 1441 upon him beyond his Commission; and without acquainting his Fellows, to treat of a Marriage between the King of England, and a Kinswoman of the King of France, Niece to the French Queen, Daughter to Raynor Duke of Anjou, styling himself King of Sicily and Naples: In which Business he was so intente, that it brought an Aspersion upon him of being bribed: But howsoever, an Interview between the two Kings is appointed, without any Warrant of King Henry's Part, to be between Chartres and Roan. The Commissioners return, the Earl of Suffolk sets forth the Beauty of the proposed Bride, and the great Benefits that would redound to the Kingdom by this Match. The King was easily induced to credit the Relation; but divers of the King's Council, especially the Duke of Gloucester, opposed it; partly for the Meanness of the Match, her Father being only a Titular Prince, and withal but poor, unable to give any Portion at all; and partly for the Wrong which should hereby be offered to the Duke of Armagnac's Daughter, to whom the King had been in solemn Manner publicly affianced. But Reasons could not prevail against Favour: The Earl of Suffolk's Affirmation must not be undervalued. And hereupon, a new Creation of Lords first made, Dukes and John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, made Duke of Somerset; John Lord Talbot, made Earl of Shrewsbury; John Holland Earl of Huntingdon, made Duke of Exeter; Humfrey Earl of Stafford, made Duke of Buckingham; Henry Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, made Duke of Warwick; Edmund Beaufort, Earl of Dorset, made Marquis of Dorset; and William de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, made Marquis of Suffolk. This new Marquis honourably accompanied, is sent into France to fetch the Lady Margaret, the proposed Bride: Who shortly after is married at Southwick in Hampshire, and Crowned Queen of England at Westminster, on the 30th Day of May, 1444, in the three and twentieth Year of King Henry's Reign. And now instead of Benefits by this Marriage, there presently followed great Inconveniencies; for first, in Exchange of her Person, the Duchy of Anjou, the City of Mans, with the whole County of Maine (the best Props of the Duchy of Normandy) are agreed to be surrendered into the Hands of the French: And then the Duke of Armagnac, to revenge the Injury offered to his Daughter, is a Means to expel the English out of all Aquitaine.

At this Time the Duke of Somerset's Spleen against the Duke of York not only is revived, but is grown stronger; for the Duke of York, who was now, after the Death of the Earl of Warwick, made the second Time Regent of France, is so undermined by him, through Assistance of the new Marquis of Suffolk, who bore now all the Sway with the King and Queen, that not only he supplanted him in his Place, but planted himself in it, to the great Heart-burning of the Duke of York and his Friends; but he wisely dissembled his Anger, and for the present passed it over. And now is no Man in Grace but the new Marquis of Suffolk; all Favours from the King and Queen must

A.D. 1444 must pass by him, and the Extent of his Power over-reacheth all the Council: He gets of the King the Wardship of the Body and Lands of the Countess of Warwick, and of the Lady Margaret, sole Daughter and Heir of John Duke of Somerset, afterward Mother to King Henry the Seventh. And now the King's Weakness in Judgment grows every Day more apparent than other, whilst governed by no Counsel but of his Queen, and she by no Counsel but her own Will, and the new Marquess of Suffolk. King Henry is himself the least Part of the King, and serves but to countenance the Devices of others, whereof he little understands the Drift; and which proving ill, the Blame must needs be his; if well, the Benefit and Honour others. For by Instigation of the Queen, he suffers the Duke of Gloucester, for his Care of the Common-wealth called the Good Duke, to be excluded not only from Command, but from the Council-Table; and permits Informers, set on by the Marquess of Suffolk, the Duke of Buckingham, the Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and the Archbishop of York, to come against him; who lay to his Charge, That he had caused divers Persons to be executed contrary to Law; wherein though he justified himself, yet no Justification would be heard. But to avoid tumultuary Part-taking, it was concluded he should be privately convicted and condemned, and to this End a Parliament, by the Procurement of his Enemies, unwitting to the King, is called at Bury; to which the Duke of Gloucester resorting, is on the second Day of the Session, by the Lord Beaumont, Lord High-Constable (abetted by the Duke of Buckingham) arrested and put in Ward, all his Followers sequestered from him, whereof two and thirty are committed to several Prisons, and the next Day after his Imprisonment, he is found in his Bed murdered; yet shewed the same Day as though he had died of an Imposthume, though all that saw his Body saw plainly he died of a violent and unnatural Cause: Some say, strangled; some, that a hot Spit was put up at his Fundament; and some, that he was stifled between two Feather-Beds. It is no unmemorable Thing which Sir Thomas Moor writes of the Pregnancy of this Duke of Gloucester. It happened the King, coming one Time in Progress to St. Alban's, a Beggar born Blind, as he said, at the Shrine of St. Alban obtained his Sight; which Miracle being noised in the Town, the Duke of Gloucester being there with the King, desired to see him, who being brought unto him, he asked if he was born Blind? who told him, Yes, truly; And can you now see? saith the Earl: Yes, I thank God and St. Alban, saith the Beggar: Then tell me, saith the Earl, what Colour is my A.D. 1447 Gown? The Beggar readily told him the Colour: And what Colour, saith the Earl, is such a Man's Gown? The Beggar likewise told him presently, and so of divers others. Then saith the Earl, Go you counterfeit Knave; if you had been born Blind, and could never see till now, how come you so suddenly to know this Difference of Colours? and thereupon, instead of an Alms, caused him to be set in the Stocks. But in the Death of this Duke, the Queen, who had a special Hand in it, was either not so intelligent, or not so provident as she might have been; for as long as he had lived, his Primogeniture would have kept back the Duke of York's Claim to the Crown, being but descended from the fifth Son of Edward the Third, whereas this Duke Humfrey was descended from the Fourth. And here were the first Seeds sown between the Two Houses of Lancaster, whose Badge was the Red Rose, and York, whose Badge was the White Rose. And now upon the Death of this Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York began, amongst his Familiars, privily to whisper his Right and Title to the Crown; but so politickly carried his Intent, that all Things were provided to further his Project, before his Purpose was any whit discovered.

And in this Time the rich Cardinal and Bishop of Winchester dies; who lying on his Death-bed, as Doctor John Baker his Privy-Counsellor and his Chaplain writeth, used such like Words; Why should I die, saith he, having so much Riches? If the whole Realm would save my Life, I am able either by Policy to get it, or by Money to buy it: Fie, will not Death be hired? Will Money do nothing? and other Words to such Purpose. But he being dead, there succeeded in his Bishoprick a more deserving Prelate, William Wanslete, called so of the Place in Lincolnshire where he was born. And now to the End the Marquess of Suffolk might not come behind them in Dignity, whom he went before in Power, he is about this Time made Duke of Suffolk.

The Bishop of Winchester's prophane Speech at his Death.

The Marquess of Suffolk is made Duke of Suffolk.

In France about this Time, a Victory was gotten, which proved no better than an Overthrow. Before the Truce was expired, Sir Francis Surry an Aragonais, a Man thought worthy to be admitted into the honourable Order of the Garter, taking Advantage of the Security of the French Garrisons, suddenly surprizeth a Frontier Town called Fougiers, belonging to the Duke of Britain; the Duke advertiseth the French King thereof, who by his Ambassadors complains both to the King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset then Regent in France: Answer was made, It was the Fault of the Aragonais, who did it without Warrant from either the King or the Council; nevertheless Commissioners are appointed to meet at Louviers, to treat of some Course for Satisfaction; but in the Time of the Treaty News is brought to the Regent, that the French (by a Stratagem of a Carter, that with a Load of Hay coming over the Drawbridge, caused the Axle-tree to break, and whilst the Porter was ready to help the Carter, the Porter's Brains were beaten out) had surprized the Fraud answered by Fraud.

A.D. 1447 the Town of Ardes, and the Lord Falconbridge, Captain thereof, was taken Prisoner: Restitution being required by the English, Answer is made them in their own Language, It was done without Warrant from either the French King, or any of his Council; so it was but one for another; and from thenceforward the Truce is broken off on both Sides, and all Things grow worse and worse. The French King by Composition taketh Louviers, Gerbury, and Vernoile, whilst the Regent stands demurring what was best to be done: If he command, not obeyed; if he counsel, not followed; as it happens to Men once blemished in Reputation, to have an ill Construction made of all their Actions; by which Means the French go on without Resistance, get Constance, Guisard, Gatiard, St. Loe, Feschamp, and many other Places in Normandy. Upon Notice whereof, Mauleffon in Guyen surrenders to the Earl of Fois, and by their Example the City of Roan it self takes Composition to surrender; where the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, Heir to the Earl of Ormond, were kept Pledges till it was performed. It is true, Succours were provided to be sent out of England, under the Conduct of the Duke of York; but a Rebellion happening in Ireland, which was thought of more Importance to be speedily suppressed, diverted him and his Forces thither; where not only he suppressed the Rebels, but so won the Hearts of that People, that it was no small Furtherance to his Proceeding afterward. A fresh Supply indeed of fifteen hundred Men, under the Command of Sir Thomas Kyriel, is sent over; but what could a Handful of Men do against such Multitudes as opposed them? For he marching with the rest of the Army towards Beaujeu, was encountered by the Earl of Clermont, with seven thousand French and Scots, whom yet at first he made to recoil, till the Constable of France, with four hundred Men at Arms, and eight hundred Archers came to their Rescue; and then fresh Men coming upon them that were already tired, the English lost three thousand and above seven hundred, besides divers that were taken Prisoners. After this Loss of Men, follows presently a Loss of Towns; Harsleur is assaulted, and though valiantly for a while defended by Sir Robert Curson, yet surrendered at last upon Composition. Then the French King, with an Army Royal, besiegeth Caen in Normandy, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, defended in his Absence by his Lieutenant, Sir David Hall; but the Duke of Somerset being Regent, in Commiseration of his Duchies being in the Town, notwithstanding the stout Opposition of Sir David Hall, surrenders it upon Composition to the French; whereof Sir David giving Notice to the Duke of York, it bred such a deadly Quarrel between the two Dukes, that they were never after thoroughly reconciled. And thus is all Normandy recovered from the English, after it had been in their Possession a hundred Years; and finally, all France is reduced to the Obedience of Charles the French King.

The French King recovers many Towns through the demurring of the Duke of Somerset.

by civil Dissentions, than was shed before in all A.D. 1449 the Wars of France. This Loss of Normandy and other Parts in Normandy, is imputed much to the Duke of Somerset, at that Time Regent; but the Duke of Suffolk must bear a great Part of the Blame, partly for having been the Cause of the Surrender of Anjou and Maine, and the chief Procurer of the Duke of Gloucester's Death, and partly for having wilfully wasted the King's Treasure, and been a Means to remove the ablest Men from the Council-Board; of all which Aspersions the Queen takes Notice, and knowing how far they trenched upon the Duke's Destruction and her own, she so wrought, that the Parliament assembled at the Black-Friers, is adjourned to Leicester, and from thence to Westminster: But tho' all Means were used to stop these Accusations against the Duke, yet the lower House would not be taken off, but exhibited their Bill of Grievances against him: That he had traiterously incited the Bastard of Orleans, the Lord Presigny, and others, to levy War against the King, to the End that thereby the King might be destroyed; and his Son John, who had married Margaret, Daughter and sole Heir of John Duke of Somerset, whose Title to the Crown the said Duke had often declared, in case K. Henry should die without Issue, might come to be King: That through his Treachery the French King had gotten Possession of the Duchy of Normandy, and had taken Prisoners the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Falconbridge, and others: But to these Accusations he peremptorily affirmed himself not guilty, so much as in Thought. Then were further Allegations made against him; That being with others sent Ambassador into France, he had transcended his Commission; and without Privy of his Fellow-Commissioners, had presumed to promise the Surrender of Anjou, and the Delivery of the County of Mans to Duke Rayner, which accordingly was performed, to the great Dishonour of the King, and Detriment of the Crown: That he had traiterously acquainted the French King with all the Affairs of State, and Passages of Secrecy, by which the Enemy was thoroughly instructed in all the Designs of the King and Council: That he had received Rewards from the French King, to divert and disappoint all Succours sent to the King's Friends in France. Upon these and divers other Accusations brought against him, to blear the Peoples Eyes, he is committed to the Tower; but the Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but he was set at Liberty; which so incensed the common People, that they made an Insurrection; and under the leading of a desperate Fellow, styling himself Blue-beard, they committed many Outrages: But by the Diligence of the Gentlemen of the Country, the Captain was apprehended, and the Rebellion ceased. And now another Parliament is called, where great Care is taken in choosing Burgesses, presuming thereby to stop any further Proceeding against the Duke of Suffolk; but his personal Appearance at the Parliament gave such a general Distaste to the House, though he came in the Company of the King and Queen, that they forbore not to begin the Assembly, with petitioning the King for Punishment to be inflicted upon such as Accusations laid to the Duke of Suffolk.

Upon which committed to the Tower, is presently upon the Dissolution of the Parliament released, An Insurrection made by Blue-beard, soon pacified.

A.D. 1449 had plotted or consented to the Resignation of Anjou and Maine, whereof by Name they instanced in the Duke of Suffolk, John Bishop of Salisbury, Sir James Fines, Lord Say, and others. This Petition was seconded by the Lords of the Upper House: Whereupon, to give some Satisfaction to the Houses, the Lord Say, Lord Treasurer, is sequestred from his Place; the Duke's Officers are all discharged, and himself formally banished for five Years, but with an Intent, after the Multitude had put out of Mind their Hatred against him, to have revoked him:

But God did otherwise dispose of him; for when he was shipped in Suffolk, with Intent to have passed over into France, he was met by an English Man of War, taken and carried to Dover Sands, and there had his Head chopp'd off on the Side of the Long-boat, which, together with the Body, was left there on the Sands, as a Pledge of some Satisfaction for the Death of Duke Humphrey.

Whilst these Things are done in England, the Duke of York in Ireland began to make his Way to the Crown, as descended from Philippa, Daughter and Heir to Lionel, Duke of Clarence, elder Brother to John of Gaunt, great Grandfather to the present King Henry the Sixth. And for a Beginning it is privately whispered, That King Henry was of a weak Capacity, and easily abused; the Queen of a malignant Spirit, and bloodily ambitious; the Privy-Council, if wise enough, yet not honest enough, regarding more their private Profit than the publick Good; that through their Delinquencies, all France was lost, and that God would not bless the usurped Possession of King Henry. With these Suggestions the Kentish Men seemed to be taken; which being observed by an Instrument of the Duke of York, called Mortimer, he takes his Time, and tells the Multitude, That if they will be ruled by him, he will put them in a Course to work a general Reformation, and free them for ever from those insupportable Burthens of Taxations, so often, upon every slight Occasion, obtruded upon them. These Promises of Reformation and Freedom from Impositions, so wrought with the People, that they drew to a Head, and made Mortimer, otherwise Jack Cade, their Leader; who stiling himself Captain Mend-all, marched with no great Number, but those well ordered, to Blackheath, where between Eltham and Greenwich, he lay by the Space of a Month exercising his Men, and sending for whom he pleased, and for what he pleased. Then he presents to the Parliament the Complaints of the Commons, That the Queen's Favourites share amongst them the Revenues of the Crown, whereby the King is enforced for the Supportation of his present Estate, to tax and burthen the Commons, to their utmost Undoing, and to the general Impoverishment of the Kingdom: That the Commons have their Commodities daily taken from them for the Purveyance of the King's Household, for which they are not paid, nor any Assurance for Payment thereof given, but only Court-Promises: That upon the Apprehension of any Man for Treason or Felony, the King's menial Servants, before Conviction, beg the Goods and Lands of the Impatched; whereupon indirect and unlawful

Jack Cade makes an Insurrection, and brings an Army to Blackheath.

He presents the Complaints of the Commons to the Parliament.

Proceedings are used by Subornation of Witnesses, Embracery of Jurors, and great Mens Letters to the Judges; whereby Justice is perverted, and the Innocent after attained, if not executed, yet at least imprisoned to their Undoing: That the Commons have no legal Proceedings in their Law-suits; so as the rightful Owners of Inheritance dare not, if opposed by any Courtier, maintain their Titles, or attempt the Recovery of their Interest, how just soever: That the King's Collectors and other Accomptants are much troubled in passing their Accompts by new extorted Fees; and by being enforced to procure a late invented Writ of Quorum Nomina, for Allowance of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and their suing out their Quietus at their own Charge, without Allowance from the King: That the Bailiffs of Sheriffs, under Colour of the Green Wax out of the Exchequer, do levy greater Sums than are by the Record justifiable, yet maintained: That they cannot have the Freedom of electing Knights and Burgesses for the Parliament, but by Letters from the Favourites of the Court to their Friends and Retainers, the Knights and Burgesses are commonly chosen: That they are too much troubled with too often coming to attend the general Sessions, being enforced in many Places to make five Days Journey to the Place where they are kept. These and some other were the Complaints of the Commons; but the Captain for his own particular (after Protestation made to live and die in the Quarrel of the King) required that his Majesty would be pleased to receive again into Favour the truly Noble Prince the Duke of York, and with him the Right Honourable the Duke of Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, and the antient Noblemen of the Realm, by the undue Practices of Suffolk and his Complices commanded from his Presence; and that all their Opposites might be banished the Court, and put from their Offices: That there might be a general Amotion of corrupt Officers, an Abolition of the Green Wax, and other Instruments of Extortion out of the Exchequer; a Qualification of Proceedings in the King's-Bench; an Inhibition of unequal Purveyance of Provision for the King's Household, and a present Execution of the Promoters, Slegge, Cromer, Isell, and East, whom he pretended by wrongful Information to have abused the King, and wronged his Subjects. These Petitions are sent from the Lower House to the Upper, and from thence committed to the Lords of the King's Privy Council; who having examined the Particulars, explode them as frivolous, and the Authors thereof to be presumptuous Rebels. Whereupon the King is solicited by his Privy-Council to prosecute them by Force rather than Entreaty; which Advice is seconded by the Queen, as conceiving they secretly aimed at her: And hereupon the King draws his Forces to Greenwich, and appointeth divers Lords to assail the Rebels; but the Lords could get no Followers to fight against them who sought only for Reformation of Abuses, and for Punishment of such Traitors as the Lord Say, the King's Chamberlain was. Whereupon the Lord Say is presently committed to the Tower, the King and Queen retire

The Complaints are exploded by the King's Privy-Council.

The King raiseth an Army to suppress the Rebels.

A.D. 1450 retire to London from thence within two Days. The King being now fifteen thousand strong, marcheth in Person towards Captain Mend-all, who politickly withdraweth his Forces into Sevenoke-Wood; upon Notice whereof the King retireth again to London; but the Queen longing for Dispatch, sends the two Staffords, Sir Humfrey and William, with many Hot-spurs in the Court, to follow the Rebels, who were soon cooled, for they found Captain Mend-all in good Order ready to receive them, and in the first Encounter slew Sir Humfrey, and afterwards his Brother, and put all the rest to Flight. The King's Forces being at Blackheath, could neither by Threats nor Entreaties be gotten to go to the Rescue; but rather wished the Queen and her Favourites in the Stafford's Case; or that the Duke of York were in England, to aid his Cousin Mortimer (now first acknowledged to be of his Kindred) and many of them stole away to the Rebels, whose Number from Suffex and Surrey daily encreased, whom yet their Captain restraineth from foraging or taking away any thing by Force; and so returneth again to Blackheath, where the King's Army lay the Night before, but was now fallen down to Greenwich. And now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham are sent to expostulate with the Rebels about their Demands; to whom Jack Cade gave very good Language, but directly affirming no Cessation from Arms, unless the King in Person would hear the Grievances of the Subject, and pass his Princely Word for the Reformation of their Wrongs. This Resolution of his made known to the King, who was not sure of his own Soldiers Faith, made him march presently away to Killingworth-Castle in Warwickshire, where he fortified himself as expecting a Siege, having left the Lord Scales only to guard the Tower. Jack Cade taking Advantage of the King's Departure, cometh to Southwark, where he quarters his Men, straitly charging them to commit no Outrage, nor do Wrong to any; which was duly observed. The next Morning he marched to London-Bridge, where he caused his Men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-Bridge, no Resistance being made against him; and so in good Order marched up by London-Stone, upon which he struck his Sword, saying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London. The Mayor of London, Sir Thomas Chalton, standing upon the Threshold of his Door, bad him take heed he attempted nothing against the Quiet of the City: To whom he made Answer, Let the World take Notice of our honest Intention by our Actions. And indeed this orderly Carriage of himself and his Company, won him a good Opinion amongst the common Sort of People: And now assuming to himself the Place of Chief, he sendeth out his Letters of safe Conduct, to such whom he pleased to make use of; amongst others he wrote this Letter to Thomas Cock, Draper of London.

By this our Writing ensealed, we grant, That Thomas Cock of London, Draper, shall safely come into our Presence, and avoid from us again at his Pleasure, with all other Persons coming in his Company.

Subscribed thus:

His Majesty's loyal Subject, John Mortimer, Captain Mend-all.

Upon Cock's Admission, he had private Conference with Three other that came with him; to whom at their Departure he gave these Instructions in Writing: You shall charge all Lombards and Merchant-strangers, Genoefes, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this Day to draw themselves together, and to ordain for us the Captain, twelve Harnefs compleat of the best Fashion, four and twenty Brigandines, twelve Battle-axes, twelve Gloves, six Horses with Saddle and Bridle compleatly furnished, and a thousand Marks in ready Money: And if they shall fail herein, we shall strike off the Heads of as many as we can get. But they failed not, but sent him what he had demanded: Who thereupon the next Morning, being the third of July, returns to London, and presently sends to the Lord Scales, to bring his Prisoner the Lord Say to the Guildhall, whither he had called the Lord Mayor with his Brethren; before whom he caused the Lord Say to be arraigned, who craving to be tried by his Peers, was forthwith taken from his Keeper, carried to the Standard in Cheapside, and there had his Head chopp'd off; which being pitched upon a Pike, was born before him to Mile-End, whither he went to have Conference with the Rebels of Essex; and by the Way meeting with Sir James Cromer, High-Sheriff of Kent, who had lately married the Lord Say's Daughter, he caused his Head also to be stricken off, and carried before him in Derision. The next Morning he came again to London; where, after publick Execution done upon some of his Fellows, and particularly upon a petty Captain of his, named Paris, that had done Things contrary to his Proclamation, upon a Displeasure taken against Alderman Malpas, he sent and seized upon all his Wares and Goods, and fined Alderman Horn in five hundred Marks. Whereupon, the Citizens finding him to grow every Day more insolent than other, they sent to the Lord Scales for Assistance, who sendeth Matthew Gout an old Soldier to them, with some Forces and Furniture out of the Tower; who presently makes a Stand at the Bridge, where Cade, notwithstanding, forceth his Passage, and then began to set Fire on Houses, where many aged and impotent People perished. Captain Bough, Alderman Sutton, and Robert Hayson, valiantly fighting, were slain; yet upon a fresh Supply, the Londoners recovered the Bridge again, and drove the Rebels beyond the Stoop in Southwark; at which Time, both Sides being weary, agreed of a Truce till the next Day. After the Retreat, Cade finding he had lost many of his best Men, was driven, for Supply, to set at Liberty all the Prisoners in Southwark, as well Felons as Debtors; when now his Company entering into Consideration of their Danger, and of the desperate Services their Captain had brought them to, began to discover by their Countenances, their Willingness to leave this Course: Whereof the Archbishop of Canterbury having Notice, he with the Bishop of Winchester came from the Tower by Water to Southwark, and there shewed the King's General Pardon under the Great Seal of England, which was so welcome to the Rebels, that without taking Leave of their Captain, they withdrew themselves that Night

A.D. 1450 to their several Habitations: Jack Cade, with some few Followers, bent his Journey to Queenborough-Castle, where, being denied Entrance, he disguised himself, and privily fled; but upon Proclamation, with Promise of a thousand Marks to any that should bring him dead or alive, he was afterward by one Alexander Eden, Gentleman, attacked; and making Resistance, in a Garden at Hotbfield in Sussex, was there slain. His Body was brought to London, beheaded and quartered, his Head set upon London-Bridge, his Quarters dispersed in divers Places in Kent. Upon the News whereof, the King sends Commissioners into Kent, to enquire after the Abettors of this Rebellion; whither he followeth himself in Person; and though five hundred were found guilty, yet eight only were executed. Though London was the chief Stage of this Rebellion, yet other Countries were not free, especially Wiltshire; for the Rebels there, upon the nine and twentieth Day of June, drew William Askot, Bishop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, where he was saying Mass in Edington Church, to the Top of the Hill, and there, in his Priestly Robes, most inhumanely murdered him.

Upon this Insurrection in England, the King of France seizeth upon all the English Territories, and leaves the English nothing but Calais.

This Insurrection was not unknown to the King of France, who taking Advantage thereof, seizeth upon all Places which the English had in France, leaving them nothing but only Calais, and the Castles of Hames and Guifnes; and this was the Issue of the Duke of Somerfet's Regency in France: Whereupon coming into England, at a Parliament holden at Westminster, the sixth of November, in the nine and twentieth Year of the King's Reign, he was put under Arrest. Upon Notice whereof the Commons at London despoiled his House at Black-Friers, and ceased not till Proclamation was made to prohibit them; for disobeying whereof, there was one Man beheaded at the Standard in Cheap.

1451. At this Time the Duke of York, under Pretence of coming to the Parliament, comes out of Ireland; and at London had private Conference with John Duke of Norfolk, Richard Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Devonshire, and other his assured Friends; where it was resolved to keep the chief Purpose (the Claim to the Crown) secret, and only to make Shew, that his Endeavours were but to remove ill Counsellors from the King, of whom they instanced in the Duke of Somerfet as Chief; and hereof the Duke sent divers Letters to the King, complaining of the Wrongs the Duke of Somerfet had done him, but withal making Protestation of his own Loyalty. To which the King maketh Answer, That he would take his Complaints into Consideration, but somewhat blames him for the Death of the Bishop of Chester, by his Means suspected to be slaughtered, and for dangerous Speeches uttered by his Servants, tending to Rebellion; concluding, That notwithstanding any thing said or done to the Contrary, he took and esteemed him a faithful Subject, and a loving Kinsman. But the Duke of York, not herewith satisfied, departeth into Wales, and there levieth Men, making his Colour for the Good of the Commonwealth, and the removing of bad Counsellors. The King advertised hereof, presently raiseth an Army, and with the Duke of Somerfet (now enlarged) marcheth A.D. 1451 towards Wales; while the Duke of York, having Notice which Way the King came, by another Way marcheth towards London; who being told the Londoners would not admit him Entrance, he passed the River Thames at Knightsbridge, marched into Kent, and encamped at Burntheath. The King in his Pursuit came to Blackheath, and there pitched his Tents; from whence he sent the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, the Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, to know the Cause of this Commotion; and to make Offer of Reconciliation, if the Duke's Demands were not unreasonable. The Duke made Answer, That nothing was intended against the King's Person, his Crown or Dignity: All that was sought, was to remove ill Counsellors from about the King, but especially Edmund Duke of Somerfet; whom if the King would be pleased to commit to Ward, till his legal Trial might be had in Parliament, he would then not only dismiss his Army, but come into his Presence as a loyal Subject. Hereupon the Duke of Somerfet is committed to Prison: The Duke of York dismisseth his Army, and cometh in Person to the King, in whose Presence, contrary to his Expectation, he found the Duke of Somerfet; which so moved him, that he could not hold, but presently charged him with Treason; which the Duke of Somerfet not only denieth, but recriminates the Duke of York to have conspired the King's Death, and the Usurpation of the Crown. Whereupon the King removeth to London, the Duke of York, as a Prisoner, riding before him, and the Duke of Somerfet at Liberty; which was not a little marvelled at by many. And now the King calleth a Council at Westminster, where the two Dukes are earnest in accusing each other; but while the Council are debating of the Matter, there comes a Flash of Lightning out of France, which diverted them. For the Earl of Candal, and the Lord L'Espar, came Ambassadors from Bourdeaux, offering their Obedience to the Crown of England, if they might but be assured to be defended by it; but withal, at the same Time there came a Report, That Edward Earl of March, Son and Heir to the Duke of York, with a great Power was marching towards London. Here was Matter for a double Consultation; and for this latter, it was resolved on, That the Duke of York should in the Presence of the King and his Nobility, at the High Altar in St. Paul's take his Oath of Submission and Allegiance to King Henry; which he accordingly did, and then had Liberty to depart to his Castle at Wigmore. And for the former, the Earl of Shrewsbury, with about three thousand Men, was sent into Gascoigne, who arriving in the Isle of Mardre, passed forth with his Power, and took Fronfac and other Places; but having received in the Night Instructions from Bourdeaux of certain Conspirators, he makes all the Speed he can thither; and was entred the Town before the French had Notice of his coming; so that many of them were slain by the Lord L'Espar in their Beds. Shortly after there arrived the Earl of Shrewsbury's Son, Sir John Talbot, with the Bastard of Somerfet, and two and twenty hundred Men, by whose Means Bourdeaux

Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, after many Victories, is at last slain.

The Inscription upon his Tomb.

A Difference on Bartholomew Day between the Mayor of London and the Prior of St. John's.

deaux is well manned with English, in which Time the Earl was not idle, but went from Place to Place, to receive the offered Submission of all Places where he came; and having taken Chatillon, he strongly fortified it; whereupon the French King raiseth an Army, and besiegeth Chatillon, to the Rescue whereof the Earl maketh all possible Speed with eight hundred Horse, appointing the Earl of Candal and the Lord L'Espar to follow with the Foot. In his Way he surpriseth a Tower the French had taken, and put all within it to the Sword; and meeting five hundred French-men that had been foraging, many of them he slew, and the rest he chased to their Camp. Upon whose Approach the French left the Siege, and retired to a Place which they had formerly fortified; whither the Earl followeth them, and resolutely chargeth them so home, that he got the Entry of the Camp; where, being shot through the Thigh with an Harquebuss, and his Horse slain under him, his Son, desirous to relieve his Father, lost his own Life, and therein was accompanied with his Bastard-Brother Sir Henry Talbot, Sir Edward Hall, and thirty other Gentlemen of Name. The Lord Molins with Threescore other were taken Prisoners, the rest fled to Bordeaux, but in the Way a Thousand of them were slain. And thus on the last Day of July, in the Year 1453, at Chatillon, the most valourous Earl of Shrewsbury, the first of that Name, after four and twenty Years Service beyond the Seas, ended his Life, and was buried at Roan in Normandy, with this Inscription upon his Tomb: Here lieth the Right Noble Knight John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Wexford, Waterford, Valence, Lord Talbot of Goodrich and Orchenfield, Lord Strange of Blackmere, Lord Verdon of Acton, Lord Cromwel of Winkfield, Lord Livetoft of Warfoppe, Lord Furnival of Sheffield, Knight of the Noble Orders of St. George, St. Michael, and the Golden Fleece, Great Marshal to K. Henry VI. of his Realm of France. The Earl of Candal, the Lords Montferrat, Rosaine, and Dangledas entred the Castle of Chatillon, and made it good against the French the Space of ten Days; but then having no Hope of Succour, they delivered it, upon Composition to have Liberty to depart to Bordeaux: And now the Gascoignes were as ready to open their Gates to the French, as they were before to the English; by Means whereof, in short Time, the French recovered again all Gascoigne except Bordeaux; and that also at length, upon Condition, that both Garrisons and Inhabitants, with all their Substance, might safely depart from England or Calais, and that the Lords L'Espar and Durant, with Thirty others, upon Pain of Death, should never after be found in the Territories of France.

At this Time, upon St. Bartholomew's Day, an antient Custom being, that the Mayor of London and the Sheriffs should be present in giving Prizes to the best Wrestlers, it happened, that at the Wrestling-place near Moor-fields, the Prior of St. John's was there to see the Sports, when a Servant of his not brooking the Disgrace to be foiled before his Master, against the Custom of the Place would have wrestled again, which the Mayor denied; whereupon the Prior fetch'd Bow-men from Clerkenwel, to resist the Mayor, and some Slaughter was committed; A.D. 1453 the Mayor's Cap was shot through with an Arrow; he nevertheless would have had the Sport go on, but no Wrestlers came; yet the Mayor, Sir John Norman, told his Brethren, he would stay a while to make Trial of the Citizens Respect towards him; which he had no sooner said, but the Citizens, with Banners displayed, came in great Numbers to him, and fetched him home in great Triumph. Upon the Neck of this began the Quarrel in Holbourn between the Gentlemen of the Inns of Chancery and some Citizens; in appeasing whereof the Queen's Attorney and three more were slain.

And now the Duke of York by all Means laboureth to stir up the Hatred of the Commons against the Duke of Somerset, repeating often what Dishonour England sustained by Somerset's giving up the strong Towns of Normandy; and how he abused the King and Queen's Favour to his own Gain and the Commons Grievance: Then he addresseth himself to those of the Nobility, that could not well brook his too much commanding over the King and Queen's Affection. Amongst others he fasteneth upon the two Nevils, both Richards, the Father and the Son, the one Earl of Salisbury, the other of Warwick; with whom he deals so effectually, that an indissoluble Knot of Friendship is knit betwixt them; by whose Assistance (the King lying dangerously sick at Clarendon) the Duke of Somerset is arrested in the Queen's great Chamber, and sent to the Tower; and in a Parliament now convoked, appeached of Treason, and many heinous Crimes objected against him. Whereupon the King, though weak, is brought to London on Purpose to dissolve the Parliament; and that dissolved, the Duke of Somerset is presently set at Liberty again; and not only so, but is made Captain of Calais and Guines, the only Remainder the English had in France. Upon this the Duke of York and his Party, with a great Power, march towards London; against whom the King, attended with the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Buckingham and his Son, both named Humfrey, Henry Earl of Northumberland, James Earl of Wiltshire, Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and two thousand Men, marched forwards. At St. Albans both Armies meet: 1455.

The Duke in the Morning sends a Letter to the King, protesting his Fidelity and Sincerity, only he desires the Duke of Somerset may be delivered, to stand or fall by the Judgment of his Peers; and this he would have, or die in the Pursuit. The King for Answer commands him to disband and submit to his Mercy, and not expect that he will deliver any in his Army, who have shewed their Loves in standing to him. Herewith the Duke acquaints his Friends, who hereupon fall every one to his Quarter: The Earl of Warwick fell upon the Lord Clifford's Quarter, where the Duke of Somerset halting to the Rescue was slain, and with him the Earl of Northumberland, Humfrey Earl of Stafford, the Lord Clifford, and about five Thousand others, besides many that were hurt; the King himself shot in the Neck with an Arrow; the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scales in the Faces; the Earl of Dorset so hurt, that he was fain to be carried home

The Duke of Somerset is sent to the Tower.

But soon set at Liberty, and made Captain of Calais.

1455. The Duke of York's Army and the King's have a Battle, where the Duke of Somerset and other Lords are slain.

A.D. 1455 in a Cart: The King's Army had been encreased after his coming forth, to eight thousand, but now they are all dispersed or slain; and the King, unguarded, is left in a poor Thatch'd House, whither, to be freed from the Danger of Arrows, he had withdrawn himself. The Duke of York having Notice where the King was, goes with Warwick and Salisbury, who all three upon their Knees present themselves before him, making humble Petition to him for Pardon of what was past; and now seeing the common Enemy was slain, they had what they aimed at. To whom the King, throughly affrighted, said, Let there be no more Killing then, and I will do what you will have me. This first Battel of St. Alban's was fought upon the three and thirtieth Year of K. Henry's Reign. The Bodies of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, were buried in the Chappel there. And now the Duke of York in the King's Name commands a Surcease from further Hostility; and in all reverend Manner conveyeth the King to London, where they keep the Feast of Pentecost together. At which Time a Parliament is summoned to begin at Westminster the ninth Day of July; and therein it is enacted, That the Duke of Gloucester should be declared publickly a loyal Subject, and that none should mis-report or dispute the Actions of the Duke of York, or of any in his Company: And moreover, the Duke of York is made Protector of the King's Person, and of the Realm; the Earl of Salisbury is made Lord-Chancellor, and the Earl of Warwick Captain of Calais, wherein they all carried themselves with unblameable Demeanor.

The King
flieth.

The Duke of York made Protector of the King's Person, and of the Realm.

The Queen
opposeth it.

In this mean Time, the Queen, not well pleased with these Proceedings, seeks all Means to incite the Lords of her Party, and they as much seek to incite her to make Opposition; she puts the Duke of Buckingham in Mind, that these Traitors had slain his hopeful Son at St. Albans; she tells now the Duke of Somerset, that by them his dear Father lost his Life: And they again put the Queen in Mind of the unsufferable Indignity done to her, in making her Husband only a King in Name, setting a Tutor over him, as though he were a Child, whilst the Duke of York and his Complices manage all. Upon which Incitation all the Enemies of the Yorkshire Faction are assembled by the Queen at Greenwich; where it is debated of some Course to be taken for restoring the King to his former Liberty and Government. At length it is concluded, That the Duke of York should be commanded to give over his Place of Protectorship, for that the King was of Years and Discretion sufficient to rule of himself without a Guardian; and the Earl of Salisbury to surrender his Place of being Lord-Chancellor, for that the Great Seal was never delivered him, seeing that which was now used was made since the King's Restraint, and therefore not sufficient: To which Conclusion of theirs the King, easy to be wrought upon, yields his Consent, and thereupon they are both discharged from their Offices, and summoned to appear at the Council-Table at Greenwich. But the Lords were wiser than to put themselves into their Hands, and therefore make Answer, That none had Power to displace them, nor to command their Appearance in any Place, but in Parliament; and so they continued about London, placing and displacing whom they pleased, and by their triumvirate Authority took John Earl of Holland, Earl of Exeter, out of Sanctuary, and sent him Prisoner to Pomfret Castle. These Proceedings gave Occasion to the licentious Multitude to raise Commotions; and the Apprentices of London, upon a very slight Occasion, fall upon out-landish Merchants, rifle and rob their Houses; and the Mayor assembling a Company of substantial Citizens to suppress them, the Ring-leader of the Disorders flies to Sanctuary; Commissioners are sent to enquire and punish the Offence; but when the Mayor and Commissioners were set, Tidings came, that the Commons were up in Arms; whereupon the Commissioners left the Business to be proceeded in by the Mayor, who so discreetly ordered the Matter, that many of the Offenders were punished, some by Death, others by Fine, and all Things were quieted and appeased.

At this Time the French having little to do against the English in France, would needs be doing something against them in England. They set out two Fleets, one under the Conduct of William Lord Pomyers, the other of Sir Peter Breffy: The Lord fell upon Fulney in the West-Country, the Knight upon Sandwich in Kent, where some Hurt they did, but not of Importance to countervail their Voyage.

And now the Queen, finding the little Respect the Londoners bore to her Party, or the King's, persuades the King, as for his Health and Recreation, to make a Progress into Warwickshire, which he did, by the Way Hunting and Hawking, and the Queen making Shew of minding nothing but Pastimes: And this she did with a Purpose the easilier to entrap the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick; to whom she writ most loving Letters, earnestly inviting them to be at Coventry by an Hour appointed; which they, not doubting any Fraud, intended to have done; but hearing by the Way of the Mischief plotted against them, they caused their Retinue to go on-ward the Way to the Court, as though themselves were coming after; but they provided otherwise for their Safety, the Duke of York, with a Groom and a Page, getting him to Wigmore Castle, the Earl of Salisbury to his Castle of Middleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to the Seaside, and so to Calais. But before they parted, they agreed upon an Alphabet, by which they might have Intercourse of Letters, yet their Intentions kept undiscovered.

The King unwitting of this Mischief intended against the Duke of York and his Friends, returneth to London, where he calleth a Council, and therein of his own Accord desireth that some Course might be invented for a perfect Reconcilement of all Parties, promising upon his Salvation (an Asseveration not usual with him) so to entertain the Duke of York and his Friends, that all Discontents should be removed, and a perfect Amity on all Parts be established: To which End Messengers are dispatched to the Duke of York, and all others of his Party, commanding them upon urgent Affairs

The Apprentices of London make a Commotion.

1457.

The Queen in loving Manner invites the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick, to meet her at Coventry. The Lords hearing of a Plot laid against them, shift away.

The King seeks an Accommodation betwixt him and the three Lords.

A.D. 1458 fairs of the Realm, and upon Royal Promise of safe Conduct, to repair to his Court at London at a Day appointed. The Duke of York accordingly came, and with 400 Men well apparelled, lodged at his House, called Baynard's Castle; the Earl of Salisbury with 500 Men lodged likewise at his House, called the Herbour: The Duke of Exeter, lately released, and the Duke of Somerset with 800 Men, were lodged within Temple-Bar: The Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford, with 1500 Men were lodged in Holbourn: The Earl of Warwick with 600 in red Jackets with ragged Staves, embroidered behind and before, were lodged at the Grey-Friers in London. Upon the seventeenth of March the King and Queen came to London, and were lodged at the Bishop's Palace; the Mayor having five hundred well appointed Men in Readiness, rode with a competent Number all Day long round the City, for Preservation of the King's Peace. The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friers; the other, at the Chapter-house at Westminster: Between both, the Reverend Archbishop of Canterbury, the Son of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, with some other of the most able Prelates, interceded so, that by their Mediation it was at last concluded, that all Wrongs and Misdemeanours on every Side should be forgotten and forgiven; that each Side should be Friends to the other, and both be obedient to the Commands of the King. Besides this in General, there were some particular Articles to be performed by the Duke of York, the Earl of Salisbury and Warwick, which afterward was ratified under the Great Seal of England the 24th Day of March, in the 36th Year of the Reign of King Henry the Sixth. Upon the Publication whereof a solemn Procession was made in St Paul's Church, at which the King was present with his Crown on his Head: Before him Hand in Hand went the Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Salisbury; the Duke of Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick; and so one of the one, another of the other Part, till they were all marshalled: Behind the King came the Queen, the Duke of York leading her by the Hand, who in going made Shew of favourable Countenance towards him. Divine Service ended, they return to the Court in all outward Appearance truly reconciled; but all was dissembled, as will presently appear: For presently upon this, an Affray fell out between a Servant of the Earl of Warwick's and a Courtier, who in the Encounter is dangerously wounded: The Earl's Man flieth; the King's Servants seeing their Fellow hurt, and the Offender escaped, watch the Earl's coming from the Council Table, and assail him; many are hurt, but the Earl getteth a Wherry, and so escapes to London: The Queen incontinently commands the Earl to be committed to the Tower; but he foreseeing the Danger, posts to Yorkshire, where he acquaints the Duke of York, and his Father the Earl of Salisbury, of all the Occurrents, with the palpable Discovery of the Queen's canker'd Disposition, advising them to stand upon their Guard, and to provide against the approaching Storm. Himself speeds to Calais, and being then Lord Admiral, takes with him all the King's Ships that were in Readiness, and scouring the Seas,

An Accommodation is agreed upon.

But all dissembled.

meets with five great Carriicks, three of Genova, A.D. 1458 and two of Spain, and after two Days Fight, takes two of them; with which he returned to Calais; where he unloaded their Freight, and found it worth ten thousand Pounds in Staple-Commodities, besides the Ships and Prisoners.

In the mean Time the Earl of Salisbury, with about five thousand Men, marcheth through Lancashire, to pass that Way to the King, with a Purpose to acquaint him with the Affront offered to his Son, and the inveterate Malice discovered in the Queen against him: The Queen, with the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerset, hearing of his coming, gave Order to the Lord Audley to use Means to apprehend him; who thereupon levieth ten thousand Men in Cheshire and Shropshire, and with them, about a Mile from Draynton, in a Plain called Blorbeath, he attended the Earl, there being but a small Brook of no great Depth between them. Early in the Morning the Earl made a seeming Retreat, which the Lord Audley observing, presently causeth his Troops to pass the River; but before they could be reduced again into Order, the Earl with his whole Strength falls upon them, and with the Slaughter of the Lord Audley, and most of them that had passed the River, he discomfited the rest, and slew about two thousand four hundred of them. Sir John and Sir Thomas Nevil, Knights, the Earls Sons, were forely wounded, who with Sir Thomas Harrington, travelling into the North Country, were apprehended and sent as Prisoners towards Chester, but upon a Message from the March-men were presently released.

1459. The Earl of Salisbury going to acquaint the King, is set upon by the Lord Audley.

Who is slain, and his Army defeated.

And now the Duke of York thinking fit no longer to conceal his Design, makes Preparations to take the Field; the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick do the like; and amongst others of approved Valour, whom the Earl of Warwick had brought from Calais with him, were two principal noted Men, John Blunt and Andrew Trollop. Likewise the King, with the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, draws his Forces to Worcester, from whence Richard Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury, is sent to offer the Yorkists a full and general Pardon, if they would lay down Arms and become Loyal Subjects. Whereunto they answered, That there was no Trust to the King's Pardon, as long as the Queen had a predominant Power; but if they might have Assurance of Safety, they would express their Loyalty, and humbly render themselves at his Service. Hereupon the King advanceth nearer, and approaching the Lords Army, caused Proclamation to be made, That whosoever would abandon the Duke of York, should be received to Mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this, the Night following, Andrew Trollop with all the Calaisians submit to the King; and by him are all the Councils of the Duke of York discovered: Which so much discouraged him, that he with his young Son, the Earl of Rutland, fled first into Wales, and then into Ireland: The Earls of March, Salisbury and Warwick, got into Devonshire, where, by the Means of John Dynham, Esq; (the same Man that afterward by King Henry the Seventh was made Lord Treasurer of England) they were Shipp'd from Exmouth to Guernsey, and so to Calais. All the common Soldiers the King pardons,

The Duke of York takes the Field.

The King doth the like.

Andrew Trollop revolts from the Duke to the King. Whereupon the Duke of York flies into Ireland.

A.D. 1459 pardons, only makes exemplary Punishment of some few Captains, sends the Duchefs of York, and her two younger Children, to the Duchefs of Buckingham, her Sister, to be safely kept; and then having spoiled the Town and Castle of Ludlow, he dismiss'd his Army. And now a Parliament is called at Coventry, wherein the Duke of York, Edward Earl of March his Son, Richard Earl of Salisbury, Richard Earl of Warwick, John Lord Clifford, and many other the Confederates of the Duke of York, are convicted of Treason, and all their Lands and Goods seised on to the King's Use. Henry Duke of Somerset, by the Queen's Means, is made Captain of Calais, whither coming to take Possession, he was by reason of Ordnance shot at him from Ricebank, forced to retire; which the Queen hearing, was so incensed, that in great Passion she gave Order to make ready all the King's Ships, lying at Sandwich, to give Assistance to the Duke of Somerset: But the fore-mentioned John Dynham, out of Love to the Earl of March, boarded those Ships in the Harbour, and took the Lord Rivers, designed Admiral for that Service, and carried both him and the Ships to Calais, from whence the Earl sailed to Ireland, to the Duke of York, who having conferred and concluded what Course to take, he returned to Calais, the new Admiral, the Duke of Exeter, not daring to stop his Course. Sir Simon Montford was appointed to guard the Cinque-Ports, having divers Ships under his Command, to bar the Earl of Warwick's Entrance: But the Earl by his Espials having perfect Intelligence of all Passages, fell suddenly upon Sir Simon, before his Ships were ready, took him Prisoner, ranfack'd the Town of Sandwich, and carried him Prisoner, and the Ships to Calais. By the Way he understood how much the Kentish Men desired his Return, and longed for his coming; whereupon he came the second Time to Sandwich, to whom presently resorted the Lord Cobham, and very many Gentlemen of the Country: So as now his Army was five and twenty thousand strong, with which he marched towards London. Against whom the Lord Scales was appointed to go, and with some convenient Troops to assure London. But the Mayor directly refused to admit him; whereupon he resorted to the Tower, from whence afterwards he did the Londoners no small Displeasure. The Earl of Warwick having Notice, that his Father the Earl of Salisbury was upon march to meet him, passeth over his Men; and without Impeachment, joined with him and his Friends near Exeter.

The Duke of York in a Parliament is convicted of Treason: As likewise the other Lords.

John Dynham doth the Earl of March good Service.

The Earl of Warwick is received of the Londoners.

1460. The Armies of the Earl of March, and of the King, meet at Northampton. The King's Army is defeated; divers Lords slain.

The King, with the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, with a great Army marcheth towards them, and near to the Town of Northampton both Armies meet. The Earl of March, with the Advice of the Earl of Warwick, prepares for the Fight: The Queen (the King more intentive to Devotion than Fighting) did the like; the Fight continued about two Hours, wherein were slain on both Sides above ten thousand Men; but upon the Fall of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, the King's Side was discomfited, and John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas Lord Egremont, John Lord Beaumont, and some others of Account were slain. The Queen with the

Duke of Somerset, taking with them the young A.D. 1460 Prince, fled to the Bishoprick of Durham. The King himself was taken, and as a Prisoner conveyed to London: Where the Tower is yielded to the Earl of Warwick; the Lord Scales in disguised Apparel endeavouring to escape, is taken by the Watermen, and by them beheaded, and his Corpse carelessly left upon the Sands. Thomas Thorpe, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, in the Habit of a Monk, his Crown shorn, purposing to fly to the Queen, is taken and committed Prisoner to the Tower, and after by the Commons beheaded at Highbate. The Duke of York being advertised of this good Success, leaveth Ireland, and posts to London, where in the King's Name, he summoneth a Parliament; which being assembled, he, in the Presence of the Lords in the Upper House, placeth himself in the Imperial Seat, and with great Boldness lays open his rightful Claim to the Crown of England, as being the Son and Heir of Anne, Daughter and Heir of Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Son and Heir of Philippa the sole Daughter and Heir of Lionel Duke of Clarence, the third Son of Edward the Third, and elder Brother of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, Father of the Usurper Henry the Fourth, Grandfather to King Henry the Fifth, who was Father to him that at this Time untruly stileth himself King Henry the Sixth. And after relating the many Miseries that had befallen the Realm since the Time of this Usurpation, he concluded, That he would not expect nor desire Possession of the Crown, except his Descent were indisputable, and his Title without Exception. This being a Business of Importance, required Deliberation; but in Conclusion, the Duke having before-hand prepared the Lords Spiritual, and few of the Nobility being present, that were not of his Part, the Burgesses were easily persuaded: And it was generally resolved, and enacted accordingly, That King Henry, during his Life, should retain the Name and Honour of a King; That the Duke of York should be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown, and Protector of the King's Person, his Lands and Dominions; and that if at any Time any of King Henry's Friends, Allies, or Favourites, in his Behalf should attempt the Disannulling this Act, that then the Duke should have present Possession of the Crown. It is not unworthy the Noting, That while the Earl of March was declaring his Title in the Upper House, it happened in the Nether House, that a Crown which hung in the Middle of the House, to garnish a Branch to set Lights upon, without Touch or Wind, fell down: As likewise at the same Time fell down the Crown which stood on the Top of Dover Castle. A Sign, as some thought, that the Crown of the Realm should be changed. As soon as the Parliament was dissolved, the Duke dispatcheth Letters into Scotland, requiring in the King's Name, the Queen, the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and all other of the Nobility that remained in the Kingdom, with all Speed to repair to his Presence in London: But they had other Work in Hand, for having gotten together of English and Scots to the Number of eighteen thousand, they came marching into England. Against whom went the

The Queen fleeth; the King taken Prisoner, and conveyed to London. The Lord Scales flying away in Disguise, is taken by Watermen, and beheaded. The Duke of York comes out of Ireland: Summons a Parliament, wherein he lays open his Title to the Crown.

It is concluded in Parliament that King Henry should remain King during his Life; and the Duke of York proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown.

Good Omen for the Earl of March.

the Duke of York with his younger Son the Earl of Rutland, and the Earl of Salisbury (leaving the King in the Custody of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Warwick) and approaching near the Queen's Army, he was certified by the Scouts, that the Enemy far exceeded his Power, both in Number, and in all Warlike Preparation (he not having in his Army above five thousand Men) and thereupon the Earl of Salisbury advised him to retire, and to attend the Coming of the Earl of March, who was gone into Wales to raise the March-men: But the Pride of his former Victory made him deaf to all Counsel of declining the Battel; and so hastened on by his Destiny, from Sandal Castle he marcheth on to Wakefield-Green; where the Lord Clifford on the one Side, and the Earl of Wiltshire on the other, were placed in Ambuscade. The Duke of York supposing that the Duke of Somerset, who led the Battel, had no more Forces than what were with him, undauntedly marcheth towards him; but being entred within their Danger, Ambushes on both Sides brake out upon him, and slew him, with three thousand of his Men, the rest fled. The Earl of Salisbury is taken Prisoner, and harmless Rutland not above twelve Years old, who came thither but to see Fashions, is made a Sacrifice for his Father's Transgressions, who kneeling upon his Knees, with Tears begging Life, is unmercifully stabbed to the Heart by the Lord Clifford, in Part of Revenge, as he swore, of his Father's Death: And the Queen most unwomanly in cold Blood caused the Earl of Salisbury, and as many as were taken Prisoners, to be beheaded at Pomfret Castle, and to have their Heads placed on Poles, about the Walls of York. Thus died Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who had taken to Wife Cicely Daughter to Ralph Nevil, the first Earl of Westmorland, by whom he had Issue eight Sons and four Daughters; his eldest Son Henry died young, his second Son Edward was afterward King of England; his third Son Edmund Earl of Rutland, was slain with his Father; John, Thomas, and William, died young; his seventh Son George was after Duke of Clarence; his youngest Son Richard, surnamed Crouchback, was after King of England. Anne his eldest Daughter was married to Henry Holland Duke of Exeter; his second Daughter Elizabeth, married to John de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk; his third, Margaret, to Charles Duke of Burgoyne; his fourth, Ursula, died young. This Duke being dead, had his Head Crowned with a Paper Crown, together with many Circumstances of disgracing him; but this Act of Spight was fully afterwards recompensed upon their Heads that did it.

The Earl of March hearing of his Father's Death, laboured now so much the more earnestly, in that he laboured for himself; and parting from Shrewsbury, whose Inhabitants were most firm unto him, he encreased his Army to the Number of three and twenty thousand, and presently took the Field: And having Advertisement that Jasper Earl of Pembroke, with the Earl of Ormond and Wiltshire, followed after him with a great Power of Welsh and Irish, he suddenly marched back again, and in a Plain near Mortimer's Crofs, on Candlemas Day in the Morning, gave them Battel, where with the Slaughter of three thousand and eight hundred, he puts the Earls to Flight. Owen Tendor, who had married Q. Katharine, Mother to K. Henry the sixth, and divers Welsh Gentlemen, were taken, and at Hereford beheaded. Before the Battel, it is said, the Sun appeared to the Earl of March like three Suns, and suddenly it joined altogether in one; for which Cause some imagine, that he gave the Sun in its full Brightness, for his Badge or Cognizance.

The Queen in the mean Time encouraged by the Death of the Duke of York, with a Power of Northern Men marched towards London: But when her Soldiers were once South of Trent, as if the River were the utmost Limit of their good Behaviour, they fell to forage the Country in a most barbarous Manner. Approaching St. Alban's, they were advertised, that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick were ready to give them Battel; whereupon the Queen's Vaward hasteth to pass through St. Alban's: But being not suffered to pass, they encountered with their Enemies in the Field called Bernard-beath. Who perceiving the main Battel to stand still, and not to move, which was done by the Treachery of Lovelace, who with the Kentish Men had the Leading of it, they soon made the Southern Men to turn their Backs and fly: Upon whose Flight the rest in Doubt of each other's well-meaning shifted away; the Lords about the King perceiving the Danger, withdrew themselves. Only the Lord Bonville coming in a complemental Manner to the King, and saying it grieved him to leave his Majesty, but that Necessity for the Safe-guard of his Life enforced it, was importuned, and Sir Thomas Kyriel, a Knight of Kent, likewise, by the King to stay, he passing his Royal Word that their Stay should be no Danger to them: Upon which Promise they stayed, but to their Cost. For the Queen hearing that the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorp at Highbate, she in Revenge thereof caused both their Heads to be stricken off at St. Albans: So as there were slaughtered at this Battel the full Number of three and twenty hundred, but no Man of Name but Sir John Grey, who the same Day was made Knight, with twelve other at the Village of Colney.

And now the King was advised to send one Thomas Hoe, that had been a Barrister, to the Victors, to tell them, that he would gladly come to them, if with Convenience it might be done; whereupon the Earl of Northumberland appointed divers Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met to their great Joy: But it was now observed, as it were in the Destiny of King Henry, that although he was a most pious Man, yet no Enterprize of War did ever prosper where he was: That we may know the Prosperity of the World to be no inseparable Companion to Men of Piety. At the Queen's Request, the King honoured with Knighthood thirty Gentlemen, who the Day before had fought against the Part where he was: The Prince likewise was by him dubbed Knight, and then they went to the Abby, where they were received with Anthems, and withal an humble Petition to be protected from the Outrage of the loose

The Londoners hearing of this Disorder, seeing there was no more Assurance in the King's Promise, to keep the Northern Men out of their Gates; insomuch that when they were sent to, to send over to the Camp certain Cart-loads of Lenten Provision, which the Mayor accordingly provided, the Commons rose about Crip- legate, and by strong Hand kept the Carts from going out of the City. Hereupon the Mayor sends the Recorder to the King's Council, and withal entreats the Dukes of Bedford, and the Lady Scales, to intercede for him to the Queen; and to excuse his not using Force, considering how dangerous it might be in these doubtful Times, to stir their Fury that would not easily be allayed. It was well advised to send Women to entreat a Woman, for by this Means they prevailed, that some of the Lords of the Council, with a Guard of four hundred good Soldiers were appointed to go for London to enquire and certify of these Things; when suddenly News was brought that the Earl of March with a great Army was marching towards them. For the Earl of Warwick having gathered together his scattered Troops, and joined with the Earl of March, they halted towards London, and were joyfully received upon the eight and twentieth Day of February; and upon Sunday the second of March, the Earl of Warwick mustered all his Army in St. John's Field; and having cast them into a Ring, read unto them the Agreement of the Parliament, and then demanded, Whether they would have King Henry to reign still? Who all cried, No, no: Then he asked them, whither they would have the Earl of March, eldest Son of the Duke of York, by that Parliament proclaimed King, to reign over them? Who with a great Clamour cried, Yea, yea: Then went there certain Captains and others of the City, to the Earl of March at Baynard's Castle, to acquaint him with what was passed; who at first seemed to excuse himself, as unable to execute so great a Charge: But animated by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at last consented to take it upon him. And thereupon the next Morning he went in Procession to St. Paul's, and offered there; and after Te Deum sung, he was in great State conveyed to Westminster: And there in the great Hall seated in the King's Seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand. And then again the People, of whom there was a great Concurrence, were aloud demanded, if they would acknowledge him to be their King? To which with great Willingness they all cried, Yea, yea. Then taking Homage of divers Noblemen there present, he was with Procession and great Solemnity conveyed to the Abby, and placed in the Quire as King, whilst Te Deum was singing. That done, he offered at St. Edward's Shrine, and then returned by Water to St. Paul's, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace; and upon the fourth of March he was generally proclaimed King, by the Name of Edward the fourth. And here, in the Course of all Writers, ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth; that it may be truly said, never came any to be King so soon after his Birth, nor left to be King so long before his Death; for he came to be King at eight Months old, and he left to be King, living twelve Years after. There was indeed in that Space of Time, a certain Vicissitude, sometimes a King, and sometimes no King; the Passages whereof must be related in the following King's Reign.

Of his Taxations.

IN the first Year of his Reign, a Parliament was holden at London, where the Queen Mother with the young King in her Lap came and sat amongst the Lords; and there was then granted a Subsidy of five Nobles upon every Sack of Wool that should pass out of the Land, for three Years: But if carried out by Merchant-strangers, then to pay three and forty Shillings for every Sack. In the third Year of his Reign, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein was granted a Subsidy of twelve Pence in the Pound of all Merchandize coming in, or passing out of the Realm, and three Shillings of a Tun of Wine, for the Term of three Years. In his sixth Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, was granted a Subsidy of every Tun of Wine three Shillings, and other Merchandize, except Wool, Fell, and Cloth, twelve Pence in the Pound: Also of every Parish through the Realm (except Cities and Boroughs) the Benefice being in Value ten Marks, ten of that Parish should pay six Shillings eight Pence; and of every Benefice of the Value of ten Pounds, ten Parishioners should pay thirteen Shillings four Pence; and so ratably of every Benefice, from the lowest to the highest. And for the Inhabitants of Cities and Boroughs, every Man being worth twenty Shillings above his Household Stuff, and the Apparel of him and his Wife, should pay four Pence, and so after that rate to the richest.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his Time.

IN the 32d Year of this King, the Lord Mayor of London first began to go by Water to Westminster to take his Oath, where before they used to go by Land. Also in this King's Reign the Art of Printing was found out at Mogunce in Germany, by a Knight called John Cutenberghen, and brought into England by William Caxton of London Mercer, who first practised the same in the Abby at Westminster, in the Year 1471. In the 23d Year of his Reign, in the Parliament then holden, it was enacted, That when Wheat was sold for six Shillings eight Pence the Quarter, Rye for four Shillings, and Barley for three Shillings, it should be lawful for any Man to carry the said Kinds of Corn into the Parts beyond the Sea, without License, so it were not to the King's Enemies or Rebels; which Act was afterward confirmed by King Edward the Fourth.

IN the six and thirtieth Year of this King, Reynold Peacock, Bishop of Chichester, who had laboured many Years in translating the Holy Scripture into English, was accused and convicted for holding and publishing certain Opinions at that Time held Heretical, which at last openly at Paul's Cross he revoked; That he had held, there was no Necessity to believe that Christ descended into Hell; also no Necessity to believe in the Communion of Saints, or that the Universal Church cannot err in Matters of Faith, or that it is necessary to believe and hold whatsoever a General Council shall determine: Also that he had held, that Spiritual Persons ought to have no Temporal Possessions; and that Personal Tithes were not due by God's Law. These Points he openly renounced, but was notwithstanding deprived of his Bishoprick; only a certain Pension was assigned him to live on in an Abby, where soon after he died.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his Time.

THE King himself founded two famous Colleges, the one in Cambridge, to our Lady and St. Nicholas, called the College-Royal, the King's-College; the other of Eaton, besides Windsor, called of our Blessed Lady; to the Maintenance whereof he gave 3400 Pounds by Year. In the twenty eighth Year of his Reign, his Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queen's-College in Cambridge. In the Time of his Reign also Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded two Colleges in Oxford, one called All-Souls-College, the other Bernard-College. In his Time also Humfrey Duke of Gloucester (but others say Thomas Kemp, Archbishop of Canterbury) built the Divinity-School in Oxford; also the said Archbishop built Paul's Cross in Form; and William Waneffete, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord-Chancellor of England, founded Mary-Magdalen-College in Oxford. In his seventeenth Year, Ralph Lord Cromwel builded the College of Talsbal in Lincolnshire. Also this Year William Eastfield, Mayor of London, caused to be builded at his own Charge the Water-Conduit in Fleet-street. In his ninth Year John Wells, Mayor of London, caused the Conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap, to be builded. In his first Year the West-Gate of London, sometime called Chamberlain-gate, and now Newgate, was begun to be new builded by the Executors of Sir Richard Whittington, Lord Mayor of London. In his fifth Year John Reynewell, Mayor of London, gave certain Lands to the City of London, for which the City is bound to pay for ever all Fifteens that shall be granted to the King (so as it pass not three Fifteens in one Year) for three Wards in London; namely, Dowgate Ward, Billingsgate Ward, and Aldgate. Also this Year the Tower at the Draw-bridge of London was begun by the same Mayor. In his four and twentieth Year Simon Eyre, Lord Mayor of London, builded the Leaden-Hall in London, to be a Store-house for A.D. 1460 Grain and Fuel for the Poor of the City, and a fair Chappel at the East-end of the same, leaving in Stock a thousand Pounds; which afterward K. Edward IV. borrowed, and never paid it again. Also in this King's Time William de la Poole, Duke of Suffolk, and Alice his Wife, Daughter to Thomas Chaucer; Son to Jeffry Chaucer the famous Poet, translated and encreased the Manor-place of Ewelme in Oxfordshire, and builded new the Parish-Church of Ewelme, and an Hospital or Alms-house for two Priests and thirteen poor Men, to which he gave three Manors, Ramruge in Hampshire, Conock in Wiltshire, and Mersb in Buckinghamshire: They also founded the Hospital of Donington Castle.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his fifth Year was so unreasonable Weather, that it rained almost continually from Easter to Michaelmas. In his seventh Year, the 8th of November, the Duke of Norfolk was like to have been drowned passing through London-Bridge, his Barge being set upon the Piles, overwhelmed so, that thirty Persons were drowned, and the Duke, with others that escaped, were fain to be drawn up with Ropes. In his seventeenth Year was so great a Dearth of Corn, that People were glad to make them Bread of Fern-Roots. In his eighteenth Year all the Lions of the Tower died. Also in this Year, the 18th Day of July, the Postern Gates of London by East-Smithfield, against the Tower of London, sank by Night more than seven Foot in the Earth. In his two and twentieth Year, one New-Years-Day, near unto Bedford, a very deep Water, which ran betwixt the Towns of Swellstone and Harlserwood, stood suddenly still, and divided it self, so that by the Space of three Miles the Bottom remained dry; which Wonder many thought to signify the Division of the People, and falling away from the King, which happened shortly after. In the three and thirtieth Year of his Reign, besides a great Blazing-Star, there happened a strange Sight, a monstrous Cock came out of the Sea, and in the Prefence of a Multitude of People at Portland, made a hideous Crowing three Times, each Time turning about clapping his Wings, and beckning towards the North, the South, and the West; as also many prodigious Births. In his six and thirtieth Year, in a little Town in Bedfordshire, it rained Blood, whereof the red Drops appeared in Sheets hung out to dry.

Of his Wife and Issue.

HE married Margaret Daughter of Rayner Duke of Anjou, and Titular King of Jerusalem, Sicily, and Arragon, by whom he had a small Portion, and little Strength of Alliance; yet might it have been a good Match, if they could have changed Conditions with one another, that he might have had her active and stirring Spirit, and she his soft and mild Disposition. She was his Wife six and twenty Years, and after her Husband's Depulsion from the Regal Throne, his Forces being vanquished at the Battel of Tewksbury, in a poor religious House,

A.D. 1460 House, whither she had fled for Safety of her Life, was taken Prisoner, and carried Captive to London, where she remained in Durance, till Duke Rayner her Father purchased her Liberty, unto whom she returned, and lastly died in her Native Country. By her K. Henry had Issue only one Son, named Edward, who, when the Day was lost at Tewksbury, fought to escape by Flight; but being taken, was brought into the Presence of King Edward, whose resolute Answers provoked him so much, that he dashed him on the Mouth with his Gauntlet, and then Richard the Crouchback ran him into the Heart with his Dagger. His Body was buried amongst the poor Persons there slain, in the Monastical Church of the Black-Friers in Tewksbury.

Of his Death and Burial.

UPON K. Edward's recovering the Crown, he was committed to the Tower, where the 21st of May, in the Year 1472, he was murdered by the bloody Hand of Richard, Duke of Gloucester; the Day after he was brought to St. Paul's Church in an open Coffin bare-faced, where he bled; thence carried to the Black-Friers, where he also bled; from thence in a Boat to Chersey Abby, without Priest or Clerk, Torch or Taper, Saying or Singing, and there buried: But afterward, at the Appointment of King Edward, was removed to Windsor, and there interred, and a fair Monument made over him.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of Stature, spare and slender of Body, of a comely Countenance, and all Parts well proportioned. For Endowments of his Mind, he had Virtues enough to make him a Saint, but not to make him a God, as Kings are said to be Gods; for of that commanding Power there being two Parts, Parcere subjectis, & debellare superbos, he wanted the latter. He was not sensible of that which the World calls Honour, accounting the greatest Honour to consist in Humility. His greatest Imperfection was, that he had in him too much of the Log, and too little of the Stork; for he would not move, but as he was moved, and had rather be devoured, than he would devour. He was not so stupid not to know Prosperity from Adversity; but he was so devout to think nothing Adversity which was not a Hindrance to Devotion. He was fitter for a Priest than a King, and for a Sacrifice than a Priest; and he could not choose but die a Martyr, who all his Life had been a Confessor. He had one Immunity peculiar to himself, that no Man could ever be revenged on him, seeing he never offered any Man Injury. By being innocent as a Dove, he kept his Crown upon his Head so long; but if he had been wise as a Serpent, he might have kept it on longer. But all this is not sufficient, if we express not in particular his several Virtues. So modest, that when at Christmas a Shew of Women was presented before him with their Breasts laid out, he presently departed, saying, Fie, fie for Shame, forfooth you be to blame. So pitiful, that when A.D. 1460 he saw the Quarters of a Traitor over Cripple-gate, he caused it to be taken down, saying, I will not have any Christian so cruelly handled for my Sake. So free from Swearing, that he never used other Oath but Forsooth, and Verily. So patient, that to one who struck him when he was taken Prisoner, he only said, Forsooth you wrong your self more than me, to strike the Lord's Anointed. So devout, that on principal Holidays he used to wear Sackcloth next his Skin. Once for all, let his Confessor be heard speak, who in ten Years Confession never found that he had done or said any thing, for which he might justly be enjoined Penance. For which Causes King Henry VII. would have procured him to be canonized for a Saint, but that he was prevented by Death; or perhaps, because the Charge would have been too great, the Canonization of a King being much more costly than of a private Person.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

THERE were Men of Valour in this King's Reign, of extraordinary Eminency; as first, John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, who, when a French Lord upbraided him, that his Sword was of Lead, he made his Answer, and made him feel that it was of Steel. Next him was Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, whose very Name was a sufficient Charm to daunt a whole French Army. Then the next was John Lord Talbot, so great a Terror to the French, that when the Women would still their Children from crying, they would use to say, John Lord Talbot comes. Then was Richard Nevil, Earl of Warwick, so much greater than a King, that which makes is greater than that it makes; and such a one was he. Many other besides these, not much inferiour to these; that we may truly say, There was never a more heroical King of England than Henry V. nor ever a King of England that had more heroical Subjects than Henry VI. And though Arms and Letters seem to be of different Conditions, yet they commonly grow up and flourish together; as in this King's Reign, where John Leland, surnamed the Elder, who wrote divers Treatises for Instruction of Grammarians; William White, a Priest of Kent, professing the Doctrine of Wickcliffe, for which he suffered Martyrdom by Fire. Alexander Carpenter, who wrote a Book called Destructorium vitiorum, against the Prelates of that Time; Peter Basset, Esq; of the Privy-Chamber to K. Henry V. whose Life he wrote: John Pole a Priest, who wrote the Life of St. Walborale, an English Woman: Also Thomas Walden, alias Netter, who wrote divers Treatises against the Wickliffites: Peter Clark, alias Pain, a Student in Oxford, and Defender of Wickliffe's Doctrine; for which he fled, and was put to Death beyond Sea: Thomas Walsingham, born in Norfolk, a diligent Historiographer: Thomas Ringstead the younger, an excellent Preacher, who wrote divers Treatises: Thomas Rudburn, a Monk of Winchester, and an Historiographer: Nicholas Upton, a Civilian, who wrote of Heraldry, of Colours in Armory, and of the Duty of Chivalry: John Capgrave, born

A.D. 1460 born in Kent, an Augustine Frier, who wrote many excellent Treatises, particularly the Legend of English Saints: Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the Realm, well learned in Astrology, whereof he wrote a special Treatise, entituled, Tabula Directionum: John Wethamstead, otherwise called Frumentarius, Abbot of St. Albans, who wrote divers Treatises; and amongst others, a Book of the Record of Things happening while he was Abbot; which Book Holingshead had seen, and in some Passages of his Time followed: Roger Onley, accused of Treason, for practising with the Lady Eleanor Cobham, by Sorcery, to make the King away; and thereof condemned, and died for it: He wrote one Treatise entituled, De sua Innocentia: Henry Walsingham, a Carmelite Frier of Norwich, who wrote sundry Treatises in Divinity: John Lydgate, a Monk of Bury, who had travelled France and Italy to learn Languages, and wrote many Works of Poetry: Thomas Beckington, Bishop of Bath, who wrote against the Law Salique of France: Michael Trigury, born in Cornwal, whom, for his excellent Learning, K. Henry V. made Governor of the Univerfity of Caen in Normandy, after he had conquered A.D. 1460 it: Reynold Peacock, Bishop of Chichester, who wrote many Treatises touching Christian Religion: Robert Flemming, who wrote a Dictionary in Greek and Latin, and a Work in Verse of sundry Kinds: Richard Flemming, Bishop of Lincoln, who wrote divers Books, one of the Etyymology of England: Nicholas Montacute, an Historiographer: John Stow, a Monk of Norwich, and Doctor of Divinity in Oxford: Nicholas Bungy, born in a Town in Norfolk of that Name, who wrote an History called Adunationes Chronicorum: Robert Balsack, who wrote a Book De re militari: Thomas Dando, a Carmelite Frier of Marlborough, who wrote the Life of Alfred, King of the West Saxons: Robert Bale, surnamed the Elder, Recorder of London, who gathered a Chronicle of the Customs, Laws, Foundations, Changes, Offices, Orders, and publick Assemblies of the City of London, with other Matters touching the perfect Description of the same City: He wrote other Works also touching the Estate of the same City, and the Acts of K. Edward III.

L I F E and R E I G N of King E D W A R D IV.

A.D. 1460

EDWARD Earl of March, born at Roan in Normandy, Son and Heir of Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, slain in the Battel at Wakefield, succeeded his Father in the Right, but exceeded him in the Possession of the Crown of England; and that by Virtue of an Act of Parliament lately made, wherein the said Duke of York not only was declared Heir apparent of the Crown, and appointed Protector of the King and Kingdom: But it was further enacted, That if King Henry, or any in his Behalf, should attempt the disannulling of this Act, that then the said Duke, or his Heir, should have the present Possession; which, because his Friends attempted to do, therefore justly doth Edward Earl of March, his Son, by Vertue of this Act take Possession of the Crown, and is proclaimed King of England, by the Name of Edward the Fourth, through the City of London, on the fifth Day of March, in the Year 1460. But before he could have Leisure to be Crowned, he was forced once again to try his Fortune in the Field by Battel; for King Henry in the North was raising a new Army, against whom King Edward upon the twelfth of March marched with his Forces from London; and by easy Journeys came to Pomfret Castle, from whence the Lord Fitzwater was sent to guard the Passage at Ferrybridge, to stop the Enemy's Approach that Way: King Henry likewise advanced forward, sending his Power under the Conduct of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whilst himself, with his Queen and Son, stay at York. The Lord Clifford, very early on Palm-Sunday, with a Troop of Northern Men, falls upon those that guarded Ferrybridge, and defeated them with the Slaughter of the Lord Fitzwater, and the Bastard of Salisbury. The Earl of Warwick hearing of this Defeat, comes posting to King Edward's Camp, and in his Presence killing his Horse, protested his Resolution to stand with him to the Death. Upon this Resolution of the Earl's, the King made presently Proclamation, that all who are afraid to fight, should at their Pleasure depart; but to those that would stay he promised a good Reward; adding withal, That if any that stay'd should after turn his Back, or flee, then he that should kill him should have double Pay. After this he gave Order to the Lord Falconbridge, and Sir Walter Blunt, to lead on the Vaward, who in their March about Dandingdale, encountered with the Lord Clifford (who formerly in cold Blood had slaughtered the young Earl of Rutland) and he being stricken in the Throat with an Arrow, some say, without a Head, and presently dying; the Lord Nevil, Son and Heir of the Earl of Westmorland, was also slain, with most of their Companies, and the rest put to Flight. The next Day likewise (the Duke of Norfolk being dangerously sick, to whom that Place was assigned) Falconbridge and Blunt continue the leading of the Van-guard; and on Palm-Sunday, by Break of Day, they came to a plain Field between Towton and Saxton, from whence they made a full Survey of King Henry's Army, and certified King Edward that the Enemy was threescore thousand strong, whereas his Army was but forty thousand and six hundred. Whereupon a second Proclamation was made through the Camp, that no Quarter should be kept, nor Prisoner taken. The Armies being both in Sight, the Lord Falconbridge gave Direction to the Archers, upon a Signal by him given, to shoot every Man a Flight-arrow, for that Purpose provided, and then to fall back three Strides, and stand. The Northern Men in the mean Time plyed their Bows till all their Sheaths were empty; but their Arrows fell short of their Enemy by threescore Yards; and not only did no Hurt to the Enemy, but did Hurt to themselves; for their Arrows being spent, and coming to Hand-blows, their own Arrows sticking in the Ground, galled their Shins and pierced their Feet. Ten Hours the Battel continued doubtful, till the Earl of Northumberland being slain, with the Lord Beaumont Gray, Dacres, and Wells, Sir John Nevil, Andrew Trollop, and many other Knights and Esquires, the Earls of Exeter and Somerset fled, leaving the Conquest to King Edward; but the bloodiest that ever England felt, for there fell that Day 36,776 Persons, no Prisoners being taken but the Earl of Devonshire. The Battel ended, King Edward hastes to York; where he caused the Heads of his Father and other Friends to be taken down and buried with their Bodies, setting in their Places the Heads of the Earl of Devonshire, and three other, there at that Time executed. The Earl of Somerset acquainting King Henry with this Overthrow, perswades him, with his Queen and Son, to fly to Berwick, where leaving the Duke of Somerset, they fly further for Succour to the King of Scots, who comforteth them with Queen Margaret and her Son are sent into France, who obtained of Lewis the Eleventh, her Cousin, that all of King Edward's Friends were prohibited to stay or traffick in the French King's Dominions; but all King Henry's Friends might live there freely. After this King Edward comes to London, and upon his Entrance to the Tower, makes four and twenty Knights, and the next Day four more; and upon the 28th Day of June, in the Year 1461, he rode from the Tower to Westminster, and was there Crowned in the Abby-Church.

King Henry flies into Scotland, the Queen and her Son into France.

K. Edward is Crowned.

John Earl of Oxford beheaded. Dukes and Earls created.

Shortly after a Parliament is summoned, which began at Westminster the fourth of November; in which all Acts of King Henry the Sixth prejudicial to King Edward's Title, are repealed; and therein John Earl of Oxford, a valiant and wise Man (he who in a former Parliament had disputed the Question concerning the Precedency of Temporal and Spiritual Barons, a bold Attempt in those Days; and by Force of whose Argument, Judgment was given for the Lords Temporal) with his Son Aubrey de Vere, Sir Thomas Tiddingham, Knight, William Tyrrel, and Walter Montgomery, Esquires, were, without Answer, convicted of Treason, and beheaded. And to encourage others to well deserving, King Edward at this Time advanced many in Honour; his Brother George he created Duke of Clarence, his Brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, John Lord Nevil, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, he made first Viscount, then Marquess Montacute: Henry Bourchier, Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, is made Earl of Essex; and William Lord Falconbridge Earl of Kent. And now their new Honours are presently put into Employment; the Earls of Essex and Kent, accompanied with the Lord Audley and Clinton, Sir John Howard, Sir Richard Walgrave, and others, to the Number of ten thousand, are appointed to scour the Seas; who landed in Britain, took the Town of Conquest, and the Isle of Bee, and then returned. At this Time Henry Duke of Somerset, Ralph Percy, and divers others, came in, and humbly submitted themselves to King Edward's Mercy; who protested his Propension of freely pardoning them, and as many others as would submit themselves as they did.

All this Time King Henry was in Scotland, and Queen Margaret in France; where she obtained of the French King, a Company of five hundred Men, with whom she sailed towards Newcastle, and landed at Tinnmouth, but suddenly again returned, and was herself by Tempest beaten to Berwick; but her Company was driven on the Shore before Bamburgh Castle; where they set their Ships on Fire, and fled to an Island called Holy Island; but were so assailed there, by the Bastard Ogle and John Manners, Esq; that many of them were slain, and almost four hundred taken Prisoners, only their Colonel, Peter Bressie, happened upon a Fisherman who brought him to Berwick to Queen Margaret; and by her was made Captain of the Castle of Alnwick, which he with his Frenchmen kept, till they were rescued. Shortly after, Queen Margaret having gotten together a great Company of Scots, and other of her Friends, bringing her Husband with her, and leaving her Son at Berwick, entered Northumberland, took the Castle of Bamburgh, made Captain thereof Sir Ralph Gray; and then came forward to the Bishoprick of Durham, whither she resorted to her the lately reconciled, and now again revolted Duke of Somerset, Sir Ralph Percy, and divers others, who altogether made a competent Army. King Edward hearing hereof, makes Preparation both by Sea and Land; and first he sends Viscount Montacute with some Companies into Northumberland, whom he in Person followeth with his whole Power: The Viscount marcheth towards King Henry, and by the way encountered the Lord Hungerford at Hegley-Moor; but he, upon the first Charge ran away, leaving Sir Ralph Percy alone with his own Regiment, who there valiantly fighting, died. After this the Viscount understanding that King Henry was encamped in Levels-Plain, near the River of Don in Hexamshire, marcheth thither by Night, and set upon him in his Camp; whose Charge the Northern Men receive with a desperate Resolution, but were in the End with great Slaughter overcome. Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, Molens, Hungerford, Wentworth, Hussy, and Sir John Findern, Knight, with many others, are taken Prisoners. King Henry himself, by the Swiftnes of his Horse, escaped, but very hardly; for one of his Hench-men that followed him was taken, who had on his Head King Henry's Helmet, or, as some say, his high Cap of Estate, called Abacot, garnished with two rich Crowns, which was presented to King Edward at York the fourth of May. The Duke of Somerset was beheaded presently at Hexam, the other Lords and Knights were had to Newcastle, and there, after a little Respite, were likewise put to Death. Besides these, divers others, to the Number of five and twenty, were executed at York, and in other Places. This Duke of Somerset was never married, but had a natural Son named Charles Somerset, who was afterward created Earl of Worcester, Sir Humfrey Nevil, and William Talbeis, calling himself Earl of Kyme, Sir Ralph Gray, and Richard Tunstall, with divers others that escaped from this Battel, hid themselves in secret Places; but yet not so closely, but that they were espied and taken. The Earl of Kyme was apprehended in Riddesdale, and brought to Newcastle, and there beheaded; Sir Humfrey Nevil was taken in Holderness, and at York lost his Head. After this Battel called Hexamfield, King Edward came to the City of Durham, and sent from thence into Northumberland the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Montacute, the Lords Falconbridge and Scroop, to recover such Castles as his Enemies there held, which they affected; and taking in the Castle of Dunstamburgh, they found in it John Gois, Servant to the Duke of Somerset, who was brought to York, and there beheaded; and taking the Castle of Bamburgh, they found in it Sir Ralph Gray, whom, because he had sworn to be true to King Edward, and was now

A.D. 1464 now revolted to King Henry, they degraded from his Order of Knighthood at Doncaster, by cutting off his gilt Spurs, renting his Coat of Arms, and breaking his Sword over his Head, and then beheaded him.

In this mean Time, King Henry (upon what Occasion no Man knows; but only led by the Left-hand of Destiny) venturing in Disguise to come into England, and shifting from Place to Place, was at length discovered, and taken by one Cantlow, or as others say, by Thomas Talbot, Son to Sir Edward Talbot of Bashal: Who deceived him, being at his Dinner at Waddington-Hall in Lincolnshire, and brought him towards London, with his Legs tied under the Horse's Belly: In whose Company were also taken Dr. Manting, Dean of Windsor, Dr. Bedle, and one Ellarton, whom the Earl of Warwick met by the Way, and brought them all to the Tower of London; whilst the distressed Queen, with her Son, once again is driven for Shelter into France; whither the new Duke of Somerset and his Brother John sailed also, where they live in great Misery; and the Earl of Pembroke went from Country to Country little better than a Vagabond.

At this Time King Edward, to reward his Followers, distributeth the Lands and Possessions of those that held with King Henry amongst them; but first made Proclamation that whosoever of the contrary Faction would come in and submit, should be received to Grace, and restored to their Patrimonies.

In the fourth Year of King Edward, in Michaelmas Term were made seven Serjeants at Law, Thomas Young, Nicholas Geney, Richard Neal, Thomas Brian, Richard Pigot, John Catesby, and Guy Faux, who held their Feast in the Bishop of Ely's Place in Holbourn, where the Lord Grey of Ruthin, then Lord Treasurer of England, was placed before the Lord Mayor of London, being invited to the Feast; which gave such a Dislike to the Mayor, that he presently departed with the Aldermen and Sheriffs, without tasting of their Feast; and it was registred, not to be a President in Time to come.

And now King Edward, no less intentive to perform the Office of a King in Peace, than he had been before of a Captain in War, considering with himself, that seditious and civil Disfensions must needs breed Disorders in a State, and that Disorders bred by troubled Times, are not like troubled Waters, that will in Time settle of themselves, and recover Clearness; but are rather like Weeds, which once springing up and let alone, will in Time over-run the whole Ground where they grow, he like a good Gardiner seeks to weed them out before they grow too rank, and endeavours to make a general Reformation of Abuses; and to that End, in Michaelmas Term in the second Year of his Reign, three Days together he sat publicly with his Judges in Westminster-Hall on the King's-Bench, to acquaint himself with the Orders of that Court, and to observe what needed Reformation in it either at Bench or at Bar: As likewise he ordered the Officers of his Exchequer to take more moderate Fees, and to be more intentive to the Benefit of the Subject, than to their own unjust Gain. He also daily frequented the Council-Table, which he furnished for the most Part, with such as were gracious amongst the Citizens, whom he employs about References and Busineses of private Consequence; whilst Mysteries of State were intimated only to such whom he selected to be of his more private Cabinet-Council: By whom he being now of the Age of three and twenty Years, was advised that it was now Time to provide for Posterity, by taking a Wife; and to provide also for the present Time, by taking a fit Wife, which they conceived to be no where so fitly found as in France; both thereby to heal old Grudges between the two Nations, and also to avert Assistance from Queen Margaret, the only Disturber in the State. And this being concluded, it only remained to make Choice of a fit Man for that Employment, for which none was thought so fit as Richard Nevil, Earl of Warwick; he therefore is presently sent into France, to treat of a Marriage to be had between King Edward and the Lady Bona, Daughter to Lewis Duke of Savoy, and Sister to the Lady Charlotte, then Queen of France; a Lady no less for Beauty and virtuous Qualities, than for Nobility of Blood, worthy to be a Queen. The Proposition is in France readily embraced, and willingly assented unto on all Parts. But in the mean Time King Edward being Hunting in Wichwood Forest beside Stony-Stratford, he chanced to come to the Mannor of Grafton, where the Duchess of Bedford then lay; and where her Daughter, by Sir Richard Woodville, the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Widow of Sir John Gray of Groby, slain at the last Battel of St. Albans, became a Suitor to him for some Lands which her Husband had given her in Jointure: With whose Beauty and graceful Behaviour, King Edward was so taken, that he presently became a Suitor to her; and when he could not obtain his Suit by Terms of wanton Love, he was forced to seek it by Terms of Marriage.

And here we may well think, there was no small Conflict in King Edward's Mind, between the two great Commanders, Love and Honour, which of them should be most potent: Honour put him in Mind that it was against his Law, to take to Wife a meaner Person than himself; but Love would take no Notice of any Difference of Degrees, but took it for his Prerogative to make all Persons equal. Honour persuaded him that it stood him much upon to make good the Embassage in which he had sent the Earl of Warwick, to a great Prince; but Love persuaded him, that it stood him more upon to make good the Embassage sent to himself from a greater Prince. In Conclusion it appeared to be true which one observes, Improbe amor quid non mortalia pectora cogis? What is it that Love will not make a Man to do? Whether it be, that Love brings upon the Mind a Forgetfulness of all Circumstances, but such as tend to its own Satisfaction; or whether it be that Love is amongst Passions, as Oils amongst Liquors, which will be always supreme, and at the Top. Honour may be honoured, but Love will be obeyed; and therefore King Edward, though he knew no Superior upon the Earth, he obeys the Summons of Love; and upon the first Day of May marries the said Lady Gray at Grafton;

King Edward sits three Days together in the King's-Bench.

The Earl of Warwick sent into France to treat of a Marriage with the Lady Bona.

In the mean Time King Edward marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray.

A.D. 1464 the First of our Kings since the Conquest that married his Subject: At which Marriage none was present but the Duchess of Bedford, the Priest, two Gentlewomen, and a young Man to help the Priest at Mass. The Year after, with great Solemnity she was Crowned Queen at Westminster. It is not unworthy the relating the Speech which King Edward had with his Mother, who sought to cross this Match. Where you say, faith he, that she is a Widow, and hath already Children, by God's blessed Lady, I am a Batchelor, and have some too; and so each of us hath a Proof, that neither of us is like to be barren: And as for your Objection of Bigamy (for his Mother had charged him with being contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) Let the Bishop, faith he, lay it to my Charge when I come to take Orders, for I understand it is forbidden a Priest, but I never wist it was forbidden a Prince. Upon this Marriage the Queen's Father was created Earl Rivers, and made High-Constable of England; his Brother the Lord Anthony was married to the sole Heir of the Lord Scales, and by her had that Barony; her Son, Sir Thomas Gray, was created Marquess of Dorset, and married Cicely, Heir to the Lord Bonville. It may be thought a happy Fortune for this Lady to be thus matched; but let all Things be considered, and the Miseries accruing to her by it will be found equivalent, if not over-weighing all the Benefits. For first, by this Match she drew upon her self the Envy of many; and was the Cause that her Husband fled the Realm, and her self in his Absence glad to take Sanctuary; and in that Place to be delivered of a Prince, in a most unprincely Manner. After which, surviving her Husband, she lived to see her two Sons most cruelly murdered; and for a Conclusion of all, she lived to see her self confined to the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwark, and all her Goods confiscated by her own Son in Law.

The Queen's Father created Earl Rivers, and her Son, Sir Thomas Gray, made Marquess of Dorset.

The Earl of Warwick at his Return finding the King married, grows discontented.

Cotswold Ews sent to the King of Arragon for a Present.

And now the Earl of Warwick, at his Return, found that Knot tied in England, which he had laboured to tie in France: His Ambassage frustrated, the Lady Bona deluded, the King of France abused, and himself made a Stale, and the disgraceful Instrument of all this; which although he resented it in a high Degree, yet he had not been a Courtier so long, but in that Time he had sufficiently learned the Art of Dissembling: He passed it over lightly for the present, but yet carried it in his Mind till a fit Opportunity; and thereupon procures Leave to retire himself to the Castle of Warwick.

King Edward in the mean Time, having just Cause to suspect he had made the French his Enemies, seeks to make other Princes his Friends. He enters into a League with John King of Arragon, to whom he sent for a Present a Score of Cotswold Ews, and five Rams, a small Present in Shew, but great in the Event; for it proved of more Benefit to Spain, and of more Detriment to England than could at first Sight have been imagined. And to secure him at home, he took Truce with the King of Scots for fifteen Years. And where he had married before, his two Sisters, Anne, the Eldest, to Henry Holland Earl of Exeter, and Elizabeth to John de la Pool

Duke of Suffolk, he now matched Margaret A.D. 1465 his third Sister to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which proved a greater Assistance to him, than that which he had lost in France.

By this Time the Earl of Warwick's Spleen began so to swell within him, that he could no longer contain it; and having with much ado drawn to his Party his two Brothers, the Archbishop of York, and the Marquess Montacute, he seeks also to draw in the King's two Brothers, the Duke of Clarence, and the Duke of Gloucester: But he found Gloucester so reserved, that he durst not close with him; the Duke of Clarence he found more open, and to him he addresseth himself, complaining of the Disgrace he had sustained by the King in his Employment in France, and other Wrongs. To whom the Duke presently made Answer, in as great Complaint of his Brother's Unkindness to himself, saying, he had married his Wife's Brother Anthony to the Heir of the Lord Scales, and her Son Thomas to the Heir of the Lord Bonville; but could find no Match of Preferment for him, being his own Brother. And upon his Agreement in Complaints, they agree to join against K. Edward; and to make the Knot the firmer, the Duke of Clarence takes to Wife Isabel the Earl of Warwick's Daughter; and with her hath assured unto him Half the Lands the Earl held in Right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, Daughter of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, deceased. Upon this Marriage the Earl of Warwick discovered to him what hitherto he had concealed, concerning his Project for the Restoring of King Henry, to which Clarence gives Approbation, with Promise to assist him in it to his uttermost.

The Duke of Clarence marries the Earl of Warwick's Daughter.

At this Time Sir Thomas Cooke, late Mayor of London, was by one Hawkins appeached of Treason, for the which he was sent to the Tower, and his Place in London seized by the Lord Rivers. The Case was this, The said Hawkins came to Sir Thomas, requesting him to lend a thousand Marks upon good Surety; who answered he would first know for whom it should be, and for what Intent; and understanding it should be for the Use of Queen Margaret, he refused to lend a Penny. The Matter rested two or three Years, till the said Hawkins was laid in the Tower and brought to the Brake, called The Duke of Exeter's Daughter; by Means of which Pain, he confessed amongst other Things the Motion he had made to Sir Thomas Cooke, and accused himself so far, that he was put to Death. Sir Thomas Cooke lying in the Tower from Whitsuntide till Michaelmas, had his Place in Essex named Gyddiball spoiled, his Deer in his Park destroyed; and though arraigned upon Life and Death, he was acquitted of the Indictment; yet could not be delivered till he had paid eight thousand Pounds to the King, and eight hundred to the Queen.

And now the Earl of Warwick sendeth to his Brothers the Archbishop and the Marquess, to prepare all Things ready to set on Foot the intended Revolt from King Edward, and to procure some rebellious Commotion in the North, whilst he and his new Son in Law would provide to go forward with the Work; which they accordingly did in Yorkshire, and Occasion being taken 1467. The Earl of Warwick causeth a Commotion to be raised in Yorkshire.

A.D. 1467 taken from the Breach of an antient Custom there to give to the poor People of St. Leonard's in the City of York, certain Quantities of Corn and Grain. This Commotion the Archbishop and the Marquess underhand fomented; yet to colour the Matter, the Marquess opposed the Rebels, and cut off the Head of Robert Huldron their Captain; but his Head being cut off, the Rebels got them other Captains; Henry Son and Heir to the Lord Fitzburgh, and Sir Henry Nevil, Son to the Lord Latimer, the one the Nephew, the other a Cousin-German to the Earl of Warwick, with whom they join the valiant Captain Sir John Conyers. These, when they could not enter York, came marching towards London, all the Way exclaiming against King Edward as an unjust Prince, and an Usurper. King Edward hearing of this Commotion, sends Sir William Herbert, whom of a mean Gentleman, two Years before he had made Earl of King Edward sends the Earl of Pembroke to suppress it, who is with divers others slain.

Pembroke, and his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, together with the Lord Stafford of Southwick, to suppress the Rebels; and they with an Army of seven thousand, most Welsh-men, march towards them; but the Lord Stafford being put from his Inn where he used to lodge, by the Earl of Pembroke, took such a Distaste at it, that he withdrew his Archers, and gave over the Business. Yet the Earl of Pembroke, though thus forsaken, with his own Regiment encountered the Rebels, slew Sir Henry Nevil, and divers others; when being upon the Point of Victory, one John Clappam, a Servant of the Earl of Warwick, coming in with five hundred rascally Fellows, and crying aloud, A Warwick! A Warwick! The Welsh-men supposing the Earl had been come, turned presently their Backs and fled: Five thousand of them were slain, the Earl of Pembroke himself, and his much lamented Brother, Sir Richard Herbert, a most goodly Personage, were taken Prisoners, brought to Banbury, where both of them, with ten other Gentlemen, were put to Death. And now the Northamptonshire Men joining with the Rebels in this Fury, made them a Captain named Robert Hilliard, but they named him Robin of Riddefdale; and suddenly came to Grafton, where they took the Earl Rivers Father to the Queen, and his Son, Sir John Woodville, brought them to Northampton, and there without Robin of Riddefdale beheaded the Earl Rivers.

The Lord Stafford beheaded.

Judgment beheaded them. King Edward advertised of these Mischances, wrote to the Sheriffs of Somersetshire and Devonshire to apprehend the Lord Stafford of Southwick (who had treacherously forsaken the Earl of Pembroke) and if they could take him, to put him to Death; who being soon after found in a Village within Brentmarsh was brought to Bridgewater, and there beheaded. After this Battel fought at Hedgecote, commonly called Banbury-Field, the Northern Men resorted to Warwick, where the Earl with great Joy received them; and hearing that King Edward with a great Army was coming thither, he sent for his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, with all Speed to repair unto him; who joining together, and using Means cunningly, by having some Communication of Peace, to make the King secure, and to take little heed of himself, they took Advantage of his Security; and in the Dead of the Night set on his Camp; and killing the Watch before the King was aware, A.D. 1467 at a Place called Wolvey, four Miles from Warwick, they took him Prisoner in his Bed, and presently conveyed him to Middleham-Castle in Yorkshire, to be there in safe Custody with the Archbishop of York. And now they had the Prey in their Hand, if they had as well looked to keep it, as they had done to get it: But King Edward, whether bribing his Keepers, or otherwise winning them by fair Promises, got so much Liberty sometimes for his Recreation to go a Hunting; by which he caused Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas Burgh, and divers of his Friends at a certain Time to meet him, who took him from his Keepers, and set him again at Liberty; whilst the Earl of Warwick, nothing doubting his Brother's the Archbishop's Care in safe Keeping him, and thinking the Brunt of the Wars to be now passed, dismissed his Army, and intended only to find out King Henry, who was kept a Prisoner, but few Men knew where.

The Earl of Warwick surpriseth King Edward, and commits him to Custody.

King Edward gets at Liberty. The Earl of Warwick dismisseth his Army.

King Edward being now at Liberty, posteth to York, and from thence to Lancaster; where his Chamberlain the Lord Hastings had raised some Forces; with which he marcheth to London, and is there joyfully received. The Earl of Warwick likewise sends to his Friends, and makes Preparation for a new Army; whilst in the mean Time, by the Mediation of divers Lords, an Interview in Westminster-Hall is agreed upon, and solemn Oath taken on both Sides for Safety, between King Edward, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick; but each Party standing strictly upon Terms tending to their own Ends, they parted as great Enemies as they met. And so from thence the King went to Canterbury, the Duke and the Earl to Lincoln; whither they had pre-appointed their Forces to repair, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Wells, Son and Heir of the Lord Wells, a Man of great Valour and Experience in the Wars. King Edward, to take off so able a Man from the Earl's Part, sends for his Father the Lord Wells to come unto him; who taking with him his Son in Law Sir Thomas Dymock, and coming to attend the King's Pleasure, was told by his Friends how wonderfully the King was incensed against them; whereupon, for their Safety they take Sanctuary at Westminster. But upon the King's Princely Word they came unto him, who commandeth the Lord Wells to write to his Son, to desist from adhering to the Earl of Warwick, which the Lord Wells accordingly did; but Sir Robert Wells, notwithstanding his Father's Letters, continuing firm to the Earl still, so much incensed King Edward, that he caused both his Father and Sir Thomas Dymock to be beheaded. He supposed, perhaps, that the Lord Wells was himself underhand a Friend to the Earl, and had not dealt sincerely with him, in procuring his Son to leave that Party. But now Sir Robert Wells seeing the King draw near to Stamford, where he had pitched his Tents, and hearing of his Father's Beheading, was much distracted what to do: To decline Battel with the King he thought would shew too much Fear; and to give him Battel before the Earl of Warwick was come with his Forces, would shew too much Boldness. But his Veins were so filled with

The Lord Wells beheaded.

A.D. 1470 with a Desire of revenging his Father's Death, that he thought he could never shew Boldness enough; and thereupon encountering with the King's Army, far greater than his own, oppressed with Multitude was taken Prisoner, together with Thomas de Land, and divers others; who presently in the Place, were put to Execution. As soon as Sir Robert Wells was taken, the Lincolnshire Men, to make themselves the lighter to run away, threw off their Coats; for which Cause, this Battel was afterward called Losscoat-field; in which it is reported, were slain above ten thousand Men.

Sir Robert Wells his Son taken and put to Death.

The Earl of Warwick fled to Calais, where not received, and by what Subtily.

The Earl of Warwick honourably received by the King of France.

The Earl of Warwick hearing of this Defeat, and not having present Means to raise an Army sufficient to oppose King Edward; when he could by no Means draw the Lord Stanley to his Party, he determined to sail into France, and hiring Ships at Dartmouth in Devonshire, he with his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, and their Wives took to Sea; and thinking to land at Calais, of which Town he himself was Captain, he was by the Lord Vauleer, a Gascoigne, whom he had left his Deputy there, repelled; and with so great Inhumanity, that the Dukes of Clarence, who was then in Labour, was fain to be delivered in the Ship (all the Courtesy in that Distress shewed was only to send a Flaggon or two of Wine) which Fact of Vauleer's, when K. Edward heard of, he was so well pleased with it that he presently sent him a Patent to be Captain of the Town, himself; and the Duke of Burgoyne, for the same Service, sent unto him Philip de Comines (who hath written the History of these Times) with a Grant of one thousand Crowns Pension during his Life. Never Man was better paid for one Act of Dissembling; for the Truth was, Præ amore exclusit foras, it was out of his Love that he suffered him not to enter the Town; for he knew there were many great Ones in it addicted to King Edward, and so maliciously bent against the Earl, that if he or any of his Company should have come, they would in all Likelihood have done them some Mischief. And hereof he made a good Proof soon after; for when the Earl took to Sea again, the Lord Vauleer sent him Word, he should take heed where he landed, for that the Duke of Burgoyne lay in wait to take him; which Advertisement did the Earl more good, than the keeping out of Calais did him hurt. The Earl upon this Advertisement landed at Diepe in Normandy, whereof when King Lewis heard, he sent and invited him to come to his Court at Amboise; where he received him with no less Honour than if he had been a King: In the mean Time, King Edward made Enquiry for all such as were Aiders of the Earl of Warwick, of whom some were apprehended as guilty, some fled to Sanctuary, and some submitted to the King's Mercy; as John Marquess Montacute, whom he courteously received. Queen Margaret, who at this Time sojourned with Duke Rayner her Father, hearing of the Earl of Warwick's Arrival, with her Son Prince Edward, came to Amboise; and with her came also Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, lately escaped out of Prison, and fled into France; between whom a new Combination is made, and for a Foundation of firm Amity, K. Henry's Son Prince Edward, marries Anne the Earl of A.D. 1470 Warwick's second Daughter: After which Marriage the Duke of Clarence and the Earls took a solemn Oath, never to leave the War till either King Henry or his Son Prince Edward were restored to the Crown. But now about this Time, comes a Gentlewoman out of England, to the Dissembling Lord Vauleer at Calais, and pays him in his own Coin; for she made a Shew of intending great Good to the Earl of Warwick, but had a Purpose indeed to work his Ruin; and by this Shew she passed unsuspected to the Duke of Clarence, whom she persuaded to forsake the Earl of Warwick, as one that intended wholly the Rooting out of the House of York, and only the advancing of the House of Lancaster, which he might well perceive by his marrying his second Daughter to Prince Edward, King Henry's only Son; and this Reason with some other was so urged by the Gentlewoman, that it sank deeply into the Duke of Clarence's Mind. So fit Agents of State are Women sometimes, that can transact a Business in Covert, which if Men should attempt, they would soon be discovered. And from this Time forward the Duke of Clarence, as if the Gentlewoman had taught him the Art of Dissembling, sought secretly to reconcile himself to his Brother King Edward, but made a fair Shew still to the Earl of Warwick.

And now the Earl of Warwick having been six Months in France, in this Time he had procured from the King of France, both Ships, and Men, and Money; and receiving Letters out of England, that many Lords and others were ready to adventure their Lives in this Quarrel, if he would come (for the People generally held him in such Admiration, that they thought the Sun was taken from the World when he was absent; and this in great Part for his great Hospitality, who it is said, used to spend six Oxen at a Breakfast) he with the Earls of Oxford and Pembroke took to Sea; and though the Duke of Burgoyne had a Fleet at Sea to intercept him, yet his Fleet being by Tempest scattered, and King Edward trusting to that Fleet, having provided no other, the Earl had quiet Passage to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire; where being landed, he made a Proclamation in K. Henry the Sixth's Name, that all good Subjects should prepare to fight against King Edward, who contrary to the Right had usurped the Crown. Upon which Proclamation, it is scarce to be believed, how many Thousands of Men resorted to him; with which Forces he made towards London: Upon Notice of whose Approach, on Sunday next after Michaelmas-day, one Doctor Goddard a Chaplain of his, preaching at Paul's Cross, did so set forth his Earl's pious Intention, that many of his Auditory were moved to favour the Earl's Proceeding; insomuch that the Marquess Montacute, who had in King Edward's Behalf levied six thousand Men about London, found them inclinable to go with him to the Earl of Warwick, and accordingly went and joined with him. King Edward hearing of the great flocking of the People to the Earl, sent forth Letters into all Parts of the Realm, for raising an Army; but few came, and those few with no

The Earl of Warwick removes King Henry out of Prison, where he had been held almost nine Years.

King Edward proclaimed an Usurper.

The extreme Melancholy of Sir William Hawkwood or Hawkford.

At this Time, upon News of the Earl of Warwick's Approach, Queen Elizabeth forsaketh the Tower, and secretly takes Sanctuary at Westminster; where in great Penury forsaken of all her Friends, she was brought to Bed of a Son called Edward, who like a poor Man's Child was christned, the Godfathers being the Abbot and Prior of Westminster, and the Lady Scroop Godmother.

And now the Earl of Warwick entering the Tower, removes King Henry out of his Hold of Durance, where he had been almost nine Years, into his own Lodging, where he was served according to his Estate; which the Earl did more congratulate than the King himself. Upon the sixth Day of October, King Henry, accompanied with the Archbishop of York, the Prior of St. Johns, the Bishop of London, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and other Noblemen, and apparalled in a long Gown of blue Velvet, was conducted through London, to the Bishop's Palace, where he rested till the thirteenth of that Month; on which Day he went in solemn Procession about St. Paul's Church, wearing his Imperial Crown; the Earl of Warwick bearing up his Train, and the Earl of Oxford the Sword before him. The next Day in all usual Places about London, King Edward was proclaimed an Usurper, and all his Partakers Traitors to God and the King; whereof John Lord Tiptoft Earl of Worcester, as a Partaker with King Edward, was made the first Example. This Lord had been Lieutenant for King Edward in Ireland, where having done something for which he fled, he was afterwards found on the Top of a high Tree, in the Forest of Weybridge in the County of Huntingdon; and being there taken, was brought to London, attainted, and beheaded on the Tower-bill, and after buried at the Black-friers.

About this Time happened an Accident not unworthy to be related. Sir William Hawkwood Knight, one of the chief Justices of the Law, who dwelt at Annory in Devonshire, a Man of great Possessions; and having no Son, the Lord Fitzwarren, Sir John Saintleger, and Sir William Bulloin, married his Daughters, and were his Heirs. This Man grew into such Degree of Melancholy, that one Day he called to him the Keeper of his Park, charging him with Negligence in suffering his Deer to be stolen: And thereupon commanded him, that if he met any Man in his Circuit in the Night Time, that would not stand or speak, he should not spare to kill him whosoever he were. The Knight having thus laid his Foundation, and meaning to end his doleful Days, in a certain dark Night secretly conveyed himself out of his House, and walked alone in his Park. The Keeper in his Night-walk hearing one stirring and coming towards him, asked, who was there? But no Answer being made, he willed him to stand; which when he would not do, the Keeper shot; and killed him, and coming to see who it was, found him to be his Master.

On the twentieth Day of November a Parliament is held at Westminster, wherein King Edward and all his Partakers are attainted of high Treason, and all their Lands and Goods seized on to King Henry's Use. George Plantagenet Duke of Clarence is, by Authority of this Parliament, adjudged Heir to Richard Duke of York his Father, and that Duchy settled upon him and his Heirs, notwithstanding the Primogeniture of Edward: Upon him also was entailed the Crown of England, in Case Heirs male of the Body of King Henry failed. Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford are fully restored to their Lands and Honour; and Warwick and Clarence are made Governors of the King and Kingdom. To this Parliament came the Marquess Montacute, excusing himself, that for Fear of Death he had taken King Edward's Part; which Excuse was accepted. Queen Margaret is sent into France, but by Reason of contrary Winds was kept back all that Winter.

About this Time Jasper Earl of Pembroke going into Wales to view his Land in Pembroke-shire, found there the Lord Henry, born of Margaret the only Daughter and Heir of John the first Duke of Somerset, not being then full ten Years of Age, kept in a Manner like a Captive, but honourably brought up by the Lady Herbert. Him he brings with him to London, and presents him to King Henry; whom when the King had a good while beheld, he said to the Lords about him; Lo! this is He, to whom both We and our Adversaries, leaving the Possession of all Things, shall hereafter give Place. Which if it be true, it shews a very propheticall Spirit to have been in King Henry; that could so long before foretel a Thing so unlikely to happen; for this was he that was afterward King Henry the Seventh, before whom at that Time there were many Lives in Being, of both the Houses of York and Lancaster.

King Henry's propheticall Speech of Henry, afterward K. Henry the seventh.

Shortly after this, by the Duke of Burgoyne's Means, King Edward is furnished with eighteen tall Ships, two thousand Dutchmen, and fifty thousand Florens of Gold; and thus furnished, he took to Sea, and landed at Ravenspur in York-shire, where they found but cold Entertainment;

H h h

never-

A.D. 1471 nevertheless he made a weary March to York, where likewise he found no great Expression of Welcome; so as he was forced to change his Pretence; swearing deeply, and receiving the Sacrament upon it, that he came not to disturb King Henry, but only to recover his own Inheritance; and for the more Shew thereof, wearing an Ostrich Feather, Prince Edward's Liveries; which Proposition seemed so reasonable, that many, who resisted him before, were as ready to assist him now: And if he be blamed for breaking his Oath, it must be considered it was Regni causa, to recover his Kingdom, which perhaps was the Inheritance he meant, when he took his Oath, that he intended nothing but to recover his Inheritance: And so he broke not his Oath neither. From York he marched towards Wakefield and Sandal, leaving the Castle of Pomfret upon his Left-hand, where the Marquess Montacute with his Army lay, but did not offer to stop him: From Wakefield he came to Doncaster, and from thence to Nottingham, where there came to him Sir William Parre, and Sir James Harrington with six hundred Men; also Sir Thomas Burgh, and Thomas Montgomery, with their Aids, who caused him to make a Proclamation in his own Name, affirming they would serve no Man but a King. From Nottingham he came to Leicester, where three thousand able Men, and well armed came unto him: From Leicester he came before the Walls of

He comes to Coventry, where the Earl of Warwick lay, but would not come forth to Battel.

Coventry, into which City the Earl of Warwick had withdrawn himself, keeping himself close therein with his People, being about six or seven thousand Men: Three Days together King Edward provoked him to come forth to Battel; but he stayed for more Forces, and would not do it: Whereupon King Edward marched forward to Warwick, eight Miles from Coventry, thinking thither at least he should have drawn the Earl of Warwick; but neither would that do it: Indeed the Earl looked for the coming of the Duke of Clarence with twelve thousand Men to join with him; but that Expectation proved vain. For the Duke was now fully reconciled to his Brother King Edward, and brought all his Forces to join with him, only he sought to make Amity between King Edward and the Earl: But though King Edward offered general Pardon, and other fair Conditions; yet none would please the Earl without maintaining King Henry. But now to repair the Defection of the Duke of Clarence, there came to the Earl of Warwick and Coventry, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Exeter, and the Marquess Montacute; by whose coming that Side was not a little strengthened; yet all this Aid would not make the Earl of Warwick to come to Battel: Whereupon King Edward marched forward towards London. Both Sides seek to make London their Friend; the Earl of Warwick sends to his Brother the Archbishop of York, to labour in it; who thereupon caused King Henry to mount on Horseback, and to ride from St. Paul's thro' the Cheap, down Walbrook, supposing that this shewing of the King would have allured the Citizens to assist him; but this Device prevailed little, brought not in above seven or eight thousand Men, a small Proportion to withstand King Edward: And when the Archbishop of York saw this Backwardness in the Citizens, or rather indeed an Inclination to King Edward, he secretly sent to him to receive him into Grace; which upon Promise to continue faithful hereafter, he obtained. The eleventh of April, in the Year 1471, and the eleventh of his Reign, King Edward made his Entry into the City of London, riding first to St. Paul's Church, and from thence to the Bishop's Palace, where the Archbishop of York presented himself to him, and having King Henry by the Hand, delivered him to King Edward (six Months after his re-adeption of the Crown) and then King Edward being seized of his Person, went from St. Paul's to Westminster, and there gave God most hearty Thanks for his safe Return. The Reasons alledged here by Philip Commynes for the Citizens receiving of King Edward, seem scarce worthy of so good an Author: One Cause, saith he, was because King Edward, being extremely indebted in the City, if they had not received him, they should have lost their Debt; another, because he had won the Love of many Citizens Wives, who importuned their Husbands to receive him.

The Earl of Warwick having Intelligence that King Edward was received into London, and King Henry delivered into his Hand, marched out, and encamped at St. Alban's, and after some Refreshing of his Army, removed towards Barnet, and in a large Plain there called Gladmore-beath, pitched his Camp; which King Edward hearing, on Easter-eve the thirteenth of April, he marched forth, and came that Evening to Barnet, where he would not suffer a Man of his Army to stay in the Town, but commanded them all to the Field, and lodged with his Army nearer to the Enemy than he was aware, by reason of a Mist, railed as some say by one Bungy a Conjuror, which made it so dark, that it could not well be observed where they were encamped. In taking his Ground he caused his People to keep as much Silence as was possible, thereby to keep the Enemy from knowing of their Approach. Great Artillery they had on both Parts, but the Earl more than the King; and therefore in the Night Time, they shot from his Camp almost continually, but did little Hurt, because they still over-shot them, as lying nearer than was conceived. On Easter Day, early in the Morning, both Armies are ordered for Battel; the Earl of Warwick appointed the Command of the Right Wing, which consisted of Horse, to his Brother the Marquess Montacute, and the Earl of Oxford; the left Wing, consisting likewise of Horse, was led by himself and the Duke of Exeter; and the main Battel consisting of Bills and Bows, was conducted by the Duke of Somerset. On the King's Part, the Vanguard was commanded by the Duke of Gloucester; the Battel, in which was King Henry, was led by King Edward himself; and the Lord Hastings brought on the Reer. After Exhortations for Encouragement of their Soldiers, the Fight began; which with great Valour was maintained by the Space of six Hours, without any apparent Disadvantage on either Side; only the Earl's Vanguard, by the Valiancy of the Earl of Oxford seemed somewhat to over-match the King's, which made some flying towards London, to carry News that

A.D. 1471 King Edward makes his Entry into London, and is joyfully received.

King Henry is delivered into his Hands.

The Earl of Warwick comes with his Army to Barnet.

The two Armies meet.

A.D. 1471 the Earl of Warwick had won the Field; and he had perhaps done so indeed, but for a strange Misfortune which happened to the Earl of Oxford, and his Men; for they having a Star with Streams on their Liveries, as K. Edward's Men had the Sun, the Earl of Warwick's Men, by reason of the Mist, not well discerning the Badges so like, shot at the Earl of Oxford's Men that were on their Part; whereupon the Earl of Oxford cried Treason, and fled with eight hundred Men. At length, after great Slaughter made on both Sides, K. Edward (having the greater Number of Men, as some write, though others say the contrary) caused a new Power of fresh Men, which he had kept on Purpose, to come on; which the Earl of Warwick observing, being a Man of an invincible Courage, nothing dismayed, rushed into the midst of his Enemies, where he adventured so far, that amongst the Press he was stricken down and slain. (Though some write, That the Earl seeing the desperate Estate of his Army, leaped on a Horse to fly; and coming to a Wood, where was no Passage, one of K. Edward's Men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked Skin) The Marquis Montacute, thinking to succour his Brother, lost likewise his Life, and left the Victory to K. Edward. On both Sides were slain, as Hall saith, Ten thousand at the least: Fabian saith but Fifteen hundred, but then he means only of the King's Side. Upon the King's Part were slain the Lord Cromwel, the Lord Say, the Lord Montjoy's Son and Heir, Sir Humfrey Bourchier, Son and Heir to the Lord Berners, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. On the Earl's Part were slain the Earl himself, the Marquis Montacute, and three and twenty Knights, of whom Sir William Tirrel was one. The Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Oxford fled into Wales, to Jasper Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Exeter being stricken down, and so wounded, that he was left for dead, amongst other the dead Bodies, because he was not known; but coming to himself he got up, and escaped to Westminster, and there took Sanctuary. The dead Bodies of the Earl and Marquis were brought to London in a Coffin, and by the Space of three Days lay open-faced in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, and then buried with their Ancestors in the Priory of Bissam. This Earl of Warwick was Richard Nevil, Son and Heir of Richard Nevil, Earl of Salisbury, who married the Daughter of Richard Beauchamp, the sixth Earl of Warwick, and in her Right was Earl of Warwick, in his own, of Salisbury. He was also Lord Montthomer, Great Chamberlain, and High Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the North Marches towards Scotland, and High Steward of the Duchy of Lancaster. He had Issue two Daughters, Isabel, married to George Duke of Clarence, and Anne, first married to Prince Edward, K. Henry the Sixth's Son, and after to Richard, Duke of Gloucester.

We may here observe a Constellation of disastrous Influences, concurring all to the Overthrow of this great Warwick; whereof if any one had been missing, the Wheel of his Fortune had not perhaps turned; for if the City of York had not too credulously believed K. Edward's Oath, not to disturb K. Henry, or if the Marquis Montacute had stopped, as he might, his Passage at Pomfret; or if the Duke of Clarence had not, at the very Point of the Battel at St. Albans, deserted his Party and joined with K. Edward; or if Queen Margaret had not by Tempest been kept from coming into England in Time; or if the Londoners had not been retrograde and deceived his Expectation, he had never perhaps been overthrown as he was. But, Fata viam invenient, Destiny will find Ways that were never thought of, will make Way where it finds none; and that which is ordained in Heaven, shall be effected by Means, of which Earth can take no Notice.

Queen Margaret, when it was too late, accompanied with John Longstrother, Prior of St. Johns, and the Lord Wenlock, with divers Knights and Esquires, took Shipping at Harfleur, March the 24th, but by Tempest was kept back till the 13th of April; and then with her Son Prince Edward, she landed at Weymouth, and from thence went to an Abby hard by, called Ceern, and then to Beaulieu in Hampshire, whither there came unto her Edmund Duke of Somerset, and Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, with divers others; amongst whom it is resolved once more to try their Fortune in the Field. But then the Queen would have had her Son Prince Edward to be sent into France, there to remain in Safety, till the next Battel were tried; but they being of a contrary Mind, and especially the Duke of Somerset, she at length consented, though afterward she repented it. From Beaulieu she, with her Son and the Duke of Somerset, passeth on to Bristol, intending with what Power they could raise in Gloucestershire, to march into Wales, to join with Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, who was there making Preparation of more Forces. K. Edward hearing of these Things, resolves to cross this Conjunction, and follows Q. Margaret with a great Power so close, that near Tewksbury in Gloucestershire he overtakes her Forces, who resolutely turn and make Head against him; where Somerset on the Queen's Part leading the Vanguard, performed the Part of a valiant Commander; but finding his Soldiers through Weariness begin to faint, and that the Lord Wenlock, who had the Conduct of the Battel on the Queen's Part, moved not, he rode unto him, and upbraiding him with Cowardise or Treachery, never staid, but with a Pole-ax beat out his Brains; and now before he could bring in his Men to the Rescue, their Vanguard was routed, and John Earl of Devonshire, with above Three thousand of the Queen's Part were slain. The Queen her self, John Beaufort, the Duke of Somerset's Brother, the Prior of St. Johns, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers others were taken Prisoners; all which, except the Queen, were the next Day beheaded. At which Time Sir Richard Crofts presented to K. Edward, K. Henry's Son Edward, whom he had taken Prisoner; to whom K. Edward at first shewed no uncourteous Countenance; but demanding of him, how he durst so presumptuously enter into his Realm with Arms? And he answering, though truly, yet unseasonably, To recover my Father's Kingdom and Heritage: K. Edward with his Hand thrust him from him, or, as some say, struck

Queen Margaret cometh over, and gets two Armes.

But is overthrown by K. Edward.

The Queen is taken Prisoner.

A.D. 1471 struck him with his Gantlet, and then presently George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Gray Marquis of Dorset, and William Lord Hastings standing by, fell upon him in the Place, and murdered him. His Body was homely interred with other ordinary Corpse in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-Friers in Tewksbury. After the Victory thus obtained, K. Edward repaired to the Abby-Church at Tewksbury, to give God Thanks for his good Success, and finding there a great Number of his Enemies that were fled thither to save themselves, he gave them all free Pardon; only Edmund, Duke of Somerset, John Longstrother, Prior of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Tresham, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers other Knights and Esquires, who were apprehended there, and brought before the Duke of Gloucester, sitting that Day as Constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk as Marshal, were all arraigned, condemned, and judged to die; and accordingly upon the Tuesday, being the 7th of May, they were all, and twelve other Knights more, on a Scaffold set up in the Middle of the Town, beheaded, but not dismembred, and permitted to be buried. The same Day Queen Margaret was found in a poor House of Religion not far from thence, into which she was fled for Safeguard of her Life; but she was after brought to London, and there kept a Prisoner, till her Father ransomed her with great Sums of Money. This was the last pitched Battel that was fought in England in K. Edward the Fourth's Days; which happened on the 4th of May, being Saturday, in the eleventh Year of his Reign, and in the Year of our Lord, 1471.

Falconbridge

London.

K. Edward being assured that as long as any Partakers of K. Henry lived and were at Liberty, he should never be free from Plots against his Life, sent Roger Vaughan, a Gentleman much reckoned of in his own Country, to entrap Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, who had escaped from the last Encounter: But he having Notice of the Plot before, prevented it by striking off Vaughan's Head.

After these great Clouds were thus dispersed, there arose a little Cloud, which gave the Realm, at least the City of London, no small Disquiet. For now the Bastard, Sir Tho. Falconbridge, who had been employed by the Earl of Warwick to scour the Seas, hearing of these Defeats, having enriched himself by Piracy, gathered together an Army of seventeen thousand Men; and coming to London, imperiously commanded Admission into the City, and Release of K. Henry out of Prison: But being denied Entrance, and hearing that K. Edward, with a great Power, was coming towards him, he brings up his Shipping to St. Katharines, and taking with him his most desperate Men, with them he marched to Kingston-bridge; but finding that Bridge broken down, and all the Places of Passage guarded, he withdrew his Forces into St. George's Field, from whence he prepared to assault the City of London: For the Effecting whereof he landed all his Ship-Ordnance, and planted them all along the Bank's-side, with which he batter'd down many Houses, and much annoyed the City; but the Citizens on the other Side lodged their great Artillery against their Adversaries, with which they so galled them, that they durst not abide in any Place along the Water-side, but were driven even from their own Ordnance. Then he appointed his Men to set Fire on the Bridge, and withal caused Three thousand to pass over the Thames, and some of them to assault Aldgate, and some Bishopsgate; but they were in all Places, by the Industry of the Citizens, repelled, and chiefly by Robert Bassett, and Ralph Jocelyne, Aldermen. Upon this he retired to Blackheath, and there encamped by the Space of three Days; but then hearing that K. Edward was coming with a great Army, he got him to his Ship, but the rest fled, some one Way, some another. The 21st of May, the King coming to London, thanked the Citizens for their Pains and Care, and dubbed the Mayor, John Stockton, the Recorder, Thomas Urswike, and eleven Aldermen, Knights.

And now the Time was come for K. Henry to be delivered out of all his Troubles; for the bloody Duke of Gloucester entering the Tower, where he found K. Henry nothing at all troubled with all his Crosses, struck him into the Heart with his Dagger, and there slew him. And now we have had, within the Space of half a Year, one Parliament proclaiming K. Edward an Usurper, and K. Henry a lawful King; and another proclaiming K. Edward a lawful King, and K. Henry an Usurper: That we may know in humane Affairs, there is nothing certain but Uncertainty; nothing stable but Unstability.

K. Edward, presently after the Interment of K. Henry, draws his Forces towards Sandwich in Kent, where some of the Followers of Falconbridge, to the Number of eight or nine Hundred, had in the Castle there, strongly fortified themselves; but upon their asking Pardon, and submitting themselves to the King, with Promise to be faithful Subjects ever after, they had their Pardon granted them, and then they delivered up both Castle and Ships, to the Number of thirteen, to the King's Use. But how this Composition was observed, may be imagined; when Falconbridge, who was comprised in the same Pardon, was afterward taken and executed at Southampton; Spicing and Quintine, the Captains that assailed Aldgate and Bishopsgate, and were in Sandwich Castle at the Surrender thereof, were presently beheaded at Canterbury, and their Heads placed on Poles upon those Gates. And by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, many, both in Essex and Kent, were arraigned and condemned for this Rebellion, and more fined.

And now K. Edward desiring to be secured from all suspected Persons, sent the Archbishop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, over to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe Custody; and there he remained a long Time, till at length by Friendship he was delivered, and shortly after died. Likewise John Earl of Oxford, who after Barnet Field yielded himself to K. Edward, had his Life pardoned, but yet was sent over Sea to the Castle of Hammes, where, for the Space of twelve Years, he was shut up in a strong Prison, and narrowly looked to; whose Lady all that Time was not suffered to come un-

A.D. 1472 to him, nor had any thing to live upon, but what People of their Charities gave her, or what she could get by Needle, or other Work. As for the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond, who were fled out of the Realm to the Duke of Brittain, King Edward sent to the Duke, requiring to have them delivered up to him, upon Promise of great Rewards; to which the Duke made Answer, that he could not with his Honour deliver them up, whom he had taken into his Protection, but that for King Edward's Sake, he would take such Care of them, that he should not need to take any, and to that End he sequestered their own Servants from them, and appointed Britains to attend upon them.

K. Edward seeks to get the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond into his Hands.

It was now the thirteenth Year of King Edward's Reign, in which a Parliament was called at Westminster; wherein all Acts formerly made by him, are confirmed or revived, and all their Lands and Goods confiscated that had taken Part against him and were fled, and all their Lands and Goods restored to such as had taken Part with him.

1473. King Edward being destined to be always in Troubles, now that he had Quietness at home, was drawn into new Broils abroad; for the Duke of Burgoyne at this Time having Wars with France, thought he could no way make a better Harvest to himself, than by sowing Seeds of Dissention between France and England; and to this End he sent Ambassadors to King Edward, to sollicite him to set on Foot his Title to the Crown of France, making great Offers, with Protestation to assist him in it, both with Purse and Person. This Proposition being seriously debated by the King's Privy-Council, is at last approved of, as being both lawful and behoveful, for the Honour of the King, and Good of the Kingdom. Only Means to bear the Charges of the War were wanting; to supply which by a Parliamentary Course, would ask too much Time; a new Course therefore is devised, to procure Money from the Subjects by way of Benevolence; and this Course was taken.

A Benevolence to raise Money.

Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter, his miserable Life and Death.

About this Time Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter, and Earl of Huntingdon, disinherited by Act of Parliament in the fourth Year of this King (though he had married King Edward's Sister) yet grew to so great Misery, that passing over into Flanders, I there saw him, saith Commynes, running bare-legged after the Duke of Burgundy's Train, begging his Bread for God's Sake; whom the Duke of Burgundy at that Time not knowing (though they had married two Sisters) but hearing afterward who he was, gave him a small Pension to maintain him; till not long after he was found dead upon the Shore of Dover, and stripped all naked; but how he came to his Death, could never by any Enquiry be brought to Light.

1474. Provision for this French Expedition being thoroughly made, and Order taken for the quiet Government of the Kingdom in his Absence, and the Stop of Incurfions, if any by the Scots should be made; King Edward, with an Army of fifteen hundred Men at Arms, all of the Nobility and Gentry, fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback, eight thousand common Soldiers, and three thousand Pioneers, came down to Dover; whither the Duke of

K. Edward with an Army passeth over into France.

Burgoyne had sent five hundred flat-bottom'd A.D. 1474 Boats to transport the Horse to Calais; yet for all that Help, it was two and twenty Days before the King's Forces were all passed over. Before the King's Departure from Dover (to the End he might not seem to surprize him) he sent an Herald named Garter, a Norman by Birth, with a Letter of Defiance to the French King (so well written, saith Commynes, that he thought it not of any English-man's inditing; as though English-men could not write as well as the French) requiring him to yield unto him the Crown of France, his unquestionable Inheritance; which, if he should dare to deny, he would then endeavour to recover it by the Sword. This Letter the French King read, and thereupon withdrawing himself, caused the Herald to be brought to his Presence, to whom, in private, he gave this Answer: That the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Earl of Saint Paul the Constable (by whose Instigation he knew the King of England was drawn to this Design) would but delude him; for that they were Dissemblers and Impostors; and therefore said, it would conduce more to the Honour of the King of England to continue in League with him, though an old Adversary, than to hazard the Fortune of the Wars upon the promised Assistance of new-come Deceivers: And so commend me, saith he, to the King, thy Master, and say what I have told thee; and then, with an honourable Reward of three hundred Crowns, dismissed him. The Herald promised to do all that in him lay, and beyond his Commission, shewed the French King Ways (by working upon the Lords to do Howard and Stanley) by which he might enter into a Treaty for Peace, which he doubted not would sort to a good Conclusion. The French King, glad to hear it, gave the Herald, besides the other Reward, a Piece of Crimson Velvet of thirty Yards long; and withal sent to King Edward the goodliest Horse he had in his Stable, as also an Ass, a Wolf, and a wild Boar, Beasts at that Time rare in England: And then the Herald returning to Calais, delivered to K. Edward the French King's Answer.

He sends a Herald to the King of France, to demand the Crown.

The French King's Answer to the Herald.

1474. The Herald adviseth the King of France what to do.

And now to make good the French King's Allegation to the Herald, the Duke of Burgoyne, who had promised on the Word of a Prince, to bring to Calais by this Time two thousand Launces, and four thousand Stradiots, or Light-horse, failed to come: Whereupon the Lord Scales is by King Edward sent to the Duke, to put him in Mind of his Promise, and to hasten his coming with his promised Forces: But the Journey was to little Purpose, only it occasioned the Duke with a small Troop of Horse to come to the King, formally to excuse himself for having been so backward; but the Cause, he said, was, for that having been embroiled in the Siege of Nuz, he could not depart thence without infinite Disgrace, if neither Composition nor Submission were enforced; which now notwithstanding, because he would not too much trespass upon his Patience, he was enforced to do, by the Obstinacy of the Besieged, but promised to supply all Defects, both with his Presence and Power, and that speedily.

The Duke of Burgoyne and the Constable of France fail King Edward in Performance of their Promises.

A.D. 1474 The Constable likewise, by his Letter, perswades the King of England to proceed in the Action, and not to doubt both from the Duke and himself to be sufficiently every way accommodated.

King Edward thus encouraged, passeth on, but in his Way found no Performance of Promises, either on the Duke's or Constable's Part; for the Duke did not accommodate the Soldiers at their coming to Peronne, with Victuals or Lodging, in such Manner as was requisite and expected; and the Constable, instead of surrendering up St. Quintins according to Agreement, made a Sally out upon such as were sent from the King of England to take Possession, and played upon them with his great Ordnance; whereupon King Edward began to suspect the Truth of the French King's Description of the Duke and Constable's Conditions; and from thence forward stood upon his own Guard, and gave no further Credit to their Protestations; which the Duke of Burgoyne resenting, pretending Occasions for the hastening forward his Forces, and promising speedy Return together with them, taketh his Leave, and departeth, which did not a little encrease the King's Suspicion.

The French King having Intelligence of the Duke of Burgoyne's Departure, fore-casting the Danger if they should unite their Forces, resolved with himself to essay what might be done to mediate a Peace in the Duke's Absence; and yet so to treat, that if it took not Effect, he might disclaim the Knowledge of the Overture:

The King of France sends a counterfeit Herald to K. Edward to propound Conditions of Peace.

Whereupon he privately dispatcheth a Messenger, in Shew an Herald, but was indeed a Fellow of no Office or Estimation, and not known to any of the King's Household, but to Villiers, the Master of the Horse, who only was acquainted with the Plot and Party. This counterfeit Pursuivant at Arms, with a Coat made of a Trumpet's Banner-roll, addressed himself to the King of England, and upon Admission to his Presence, insinuates the French King's Desire; which was, to have Commissioners on both Parts assigned, to confer of the Means to reconcile the Differences between the two Kings; or at least to conclude a Cessation from Arms for some Time. And so well this Messenger delivered his Errand, that it was credited, and the King's Request granted; and thereupon Letters of safe Conduct are sent of both Sides, for such Commissioners as to this Purpose should meet at Amiens. For King Edward came, the Lord Howard, Saint Anthony Sentleger, and Doctor Morton, after made Lord Chancellor of England. For King Lewis came, the Admiral of France, the Lord Saint Piers, and Heberg, Bishop of Eureux. After long Conference, Articles of Peace are concluded on to this Effect; That the French King should pay presently to the King of England threescore and fifteen thousand Crowns, and from thenceforth annually fifty thousand Crowns, during the Life of King Edward: That within one Year, the French King should send for the Lady Elizabeth, the King of England's Daughter, and join her in Marriage to the Dauphin: That the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheyney, Master of the Horse, should remain in Hostage there, till the English Army had quitted France, and a general Peace for nine Years; wherein the Dukes of Burgoyne and Britain are included, if they will accept thereof. This Conclusion was the more easily compassed by the King of France, his following the Herald's Counsel; for he distributed sixteen thousand Crowns amongst King Edward's Counsellors and Favourites; two thousand Crowns to the Lord Hastings, the King's Chamberlain; and to the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Anthony Sentleger, and Montgomery, the Residue; besides great Store of Plate and Jewels distributed amongst inferior Officers of the Court. The Duke of Gloucester only opposed this Accord, as not suiting with his Design; nevertheless it proceeded, and Notice thereof is presently sent to the Duke of Burgoyne, who thereupon, only with fifteen Horse, comes posting to the English Camp, whom King Edward perswades to enter into the Peace, according to the Reservation; but he, in great Chafe, reproacheth King Edward for entering into it himself, saying, That his Predecessors had by many brave Exploits gotten Fame and Reputation from the French, and now he had brought his Soldiers only to shew them the Country, and return as they came; adding withal, that to make it appear he was able without Help of the English to subsist of himself, he utterly disclaimed any Benefit of that Truce, until three Months after the English were returned to their own Country; and so in a great Snuff returned home.

The Conditions of Peace between the two Kings.

The Duke of Burgoyne reproacheth K. Edward for making the Peace.

For the better Confirmation of what is agreed upon between the two Kings, an Interview is desired; but before the same is effected, the French King sends the English Army an hundred Tun of Gascoigne Wine, to be drank amongst the private Soldiers, and therewithal free License for Commanders and Gentlemen to recreate themselves in Amiens, where they were lovingly entertained by the Burghers of the Town, by the King's express Command. The Place of Interview of these two Kings is agreed on to be at Pequigny, a Town three Miles distant from Amiens, seated in a Bottom, through which the River of Some runneth; over which a strong Bridge was built, and in the Midst thereof a Grate made overthwart with Bars, no wider asunder than a Man might well thrust in his Arm, covered with Boards over Head, to avoid the Rain; four of the Bed-Chamber on both Sides, are appointed to search the Rooms, to prevent Traps or Instruments of Treachery; and being by them certified that all was clear, the Kings advance themselves. King Edward being come in Sight of the Place, made a Stand; being told, that the Circumstance of coming first to the Place was a Matter of great Disparagement in Point of State; but the French King, more regarding Substance than Circumstance, gave the King of England the Advantage to come at his Pleasure, and went first to the Bar appointed for Conference, and there did attend King Edward's Leisure. He had in his Company John Duke of Bourbon, with his Brother the Cardinal, and eight hundred Men at Arms. King Edward had with him his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Chamberlain and Chancellor, and at his Back his whole Army in Battel. The Kings lovingly salute each other, and Complements

A.D. 1474 ments of Courtesy reciprocally pass : Which finished, they, with their Noblemen there present, take all their Oaths upon the holy Evangelists, in all their Power, to observe the Articles of Accord agreed on. After which, in private, the French King importunes King Edward that the Duke of Britain might be left out of these Articles ; but after much urging to that Purpose, King Edward gave this resolute Answer, that if King Lewis desired the Friendship of England, he should not molest the Duke of Britain ; for that he was resolved, at any Time to come in Person to relieve him, if he were disturbed : King Edward pretended the many Kindnesses he had formerly received of the Duke of Britain ; but it was conceived, that the Desire of compassing the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke, now in the Duke of Britain's Country, were the greatest Motives of his standing so firmly for him. After more serious Discourse, King Lewis told King Edward, that he would one Day invite him to Paris, there to court his French Ladies, with whom, if he committed any Sin, he merrily told him, that Cardinal Bourbon should be his Confessor, who, he might be sure, would assign him an easy Penance, as one that loved to kiss fair Ladies himself : But when King Edward seemed not unwilling to accept his Offer, he was then glad to put it off with other Discourse : For that, as he told Commynes, too many English Princes had been there before.

The Money to be paid to King Edward by the Articles, is accordingly paid : And thereupon the French Hostages are delivered, and the English Army retire to Calais, and from thence is transported into England ; and then the English Hostages are likewise delivered. This Peace was said to be made only by the Holy Ghost, because on the Day of Meeting, a white Dove came and sat upon the King of England's Tent ; though the Dukes of Gloucester and Burgoyne thought it was made by no good Spirit.

1475. King Edward being returned into England, had his Mind running still upon the Danger that might grow from the Earl of Richmond : He therefore dispatched Dr. Stillington, and two other his Ambassadors, to the Duke of Britain, to send him over to him, under this subtle Pretence that he meant to match him in Marriage with the Lady Cicely his younger Daughter ; and withal, sent also no small Store of Angels to speak for him ; which so prevailed with the Duke, that he delivered the Earl of Richmond to the Ambassadors, who conducted him thence to St. Malo, where, whilst they stayed for a Wind, the young Earl by the cunning Plotting of Peter Landois, the Duke's Treasurer (more out of Scorn that he was not gratified by the English Ambassador, to the Proportion of his Place, than for any Love to the Earl) escapes into the Sanctuary ; from whence neither Prayers nor Promises could get him out : Nevertheless upon Peter Landois's Promise he should be safe kept there ; the Ambassadors departed, and returned home, acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Britain's Courtesy in delivering him, and their own Negligence in suffering him to escape ; only making Amends with the Promise of Peter Landois ;

King Edward sends to the Duke of Britain to deliver the Earl of Richmond to him. The Earl is delivered, but makes Escape, and how.

which might be to King Edward some Contentment, but was no Satisfaction.

At Christmas following, being the sixteenth Year of his Reign, he created his eldest Son Edward, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. His second Son he made Duke of York ; giving the Order of Knighthood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He created also four and twenty Knights of the Bath, whereof Brian Chief Justice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common-Pleas were two.

About this Time, there were two Examples of Severity seen, not unworthy the Relating, if but only to make us see how dangerous a Thing it is Ludere cum sanctis, to speak Words that may be taken as reflecting upon the King. The first was of one Walter Walker, a wealthy Citizen, dwelling at the Crown in Cheapside : This Man one Day when his Child cried, bid him be quiet, and he would make him Heir of the Crown ; which Words being subject to Interpretation, he was called in Question about them, arraigned, condemned, and put to Death. The other was of Thomas Burdet, of Arrow in Warwickshire, Esq ; It happened that King Edward hunted in his Park, he being from home, and there killed a white Buck, whereof Master Burdet made special Account ; so as coming home, and finding that Buck killed, he wished it Horns and all in his Belly that had counselled the King to kill it : And because none counselled the King to kill it but himself, it was thought those Words were not spoken without a malignant Reflecting upon the King : And thereupon Burdet was arraigned and condemned, drawn to Tyburn, and there beheaded ; though Markham, then Chief Justice, chose rather to lose his Place, than assent to the Judgment.

And now began Ambition to boil in Richard Duke of Gloucester ; whereof the first Heat fell upon his Brother the Duke of Clarence, how to rid him out of the Way ; to which End, he seeks to raise Jealousies in King Edward's Head against him, telling him, that some of Clarence's Followers were Sorcerers and Necromancers, and had given forth Speeches, that one whose Name begun with G. should disinheret his Children, and get the Crown : And for a Colour of this Suggestion, one of the Duke of Clarence's Servants, who came with him out of Ireland from Dublin, where the Duke was born, is in his Master's Absence, by the Procurement underhand of the Duke of Gloucester, indicted, arraigned, condemned, and executed at Tyburn for a Conjuror, and all within the Space of two Days : And the Duke of Gloucester, to make shew that he had no Hand in this Fellow's Death, set on the Duke of Clarence to complain of it to King Edward ; and in the mean Time finds Matter, at least Colour of Matter to make him be committed to the Tower : And then again, to make shew he had no Hand in his Imprisonment, bids him be of good Cheer ; for it should not be long e'er he would see him released : And he kept his Word ; for not long after, by his Procurement, he was drowned in a Butt of Malmsey (and this was his Release) and then laid in his Bed, to make the People believe

A.D. 1478 lieve that he died of Discontent; whose Death King Edward, though perhaps consenting to it, so much repented, that afterwards, when he was sued to for any Man's Pardon, he would sighing break out into such Words: O unfortunate Brother! for whose Life not one Man would open his Mouth. Being dead, he was buried at Tewksbury in Gloucestershire, by the Body of his Duchess, who great with Child, died of Poison a little before.

A Match treated on between the King of Scots eldest Son, and a Daughter of King Edward:

But dallied by the King of Scots.

Whereupon King Edward enters Scotland with an Army,

And brings the Scots to Submission.

Causes of K. Edward's Discontentment.

It was now the two and twentieth Year of King Edward's Reign, when James King of Scotland sent Ambassadors to treat of a Marriage between his eldest Son James Duke of Rothsay, and Cicely King Edward's second Daughter. This Overture for a Match, was by the King and his Council readily embraced, and a great Part of the Portion was delivered to the Scots, with this Proviso, That if the Marriage did not proceed, the Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh should be bound to repay it again. But the Scottish King, who had other Phantasies in his Head, and would take Counsel of none but his own Will, and diverted also perhaps by the King of France, not only dallied the Proceedings in the Match, but affronted those of the Nobility that persuaded him to it; insomuch that his Brother the Duke of Albany was enforced to abandon the Country, and to fly for Refuge into England: By whom King Edward being informed of King James's fickle Disposition, was so much incensed, that under the Conduct of the Duke of Gloucester, accompanied with the Duke of Albany, he sent an Army of twenty thousand against Scotland; who in their Way took in Berwick, and besieged the Castle; which being resolutely defended by the Earl of Bothwell, the Duke left the Lord Stanley to continue the Siege, whilst he with the rest of the Army, marcheth towards Edinburgh; where within the Castle, King James had immured himself. But the Nobility of Scotland seeing the Danger they were in, endeavoured by humble Submission to procure a Peace, at least a Cessation from War; which with much Importunity they obtained, upon these Conditions; That full Satisfaction should be presently given for all Damages sustained by the late Incurfions: That the Duke of Albany should be fully restored to Grace and Place, with an Abolition of all Discontents between his Brother King James and him: That the Castle of Berwick (which had been now out of the Possession of the English one and twenty Years) should immediately be surrendered into the General's Hands, and from thence no Reduction of that, or the Town attempted: That all such Sums of Money as upon Proposition of the Marriage had been delivered, should be repaid. All which, except the first Article, were accordingly performed.

When this Business with Scotland was indifferently accommodated, King Edward receives Intelligence from his Ambassador Legier in France, that the French King not only denied the Payment of the Annual Tribute of fifty thousand Crowns, agreed upon and sworn to, upon the Ratification of the late concluded

Peace, but had also married the Dauphin of France to the Lady Margaret, Daughter of Maximilian, Son of the Emperor; which so much incensed King Edward, that he resolves to revenge it; and by the Advice of his Council, open War was presently proclaimed against France. But whilst King Edward is making Preparation, and intentive to the Business, he is attached by the Hand of Death, and upon the 9th of April, in the Year 1483, at Westminster, ended his mortal Life.

1483. He falls sick and dies.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second Year, he sent his Privy Seal through England, to move Men to give him a certain Sum of Money towards resisting the Scots, which was granted and given liberally: In his seventh Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were resumed all Manner of Gifts, which the King had given from the first Day he took Possession of the Realm, to that Time. In his eighth Year, at a Parliament were granted two Fifteens and a Demy. In his thirteenth Year, a Parliament was holden wherein a Subsidy was granted; and the Year following, towards War to be undertaken in France, a new Way of raising Money is devised, called a Benevolence, by which great Sums of Money were gotten of the Subjects: And it is not unworthy the Relating, what an old rich Widow at this Time did; whom King Edward, amongst others, having called before him, merrily asked, what she would willingly give him towards his great Charges? By my Troth, quoth she, for thy lovely Countenance, thou shalt have even twenty Pounds. The King looking scarce for half that Sum, thanked her, and lovingly kissed her; which so wrought with the old Widow, that she presently swore, he should have twenty Pounds more; and paid it willingly. Not long before his Death he was by ill Counsellors put upon a distasteful Course for raising of Money; which was, by fining Men for Delinquencies against Penal Statutes: By which Course some Money was gathered; but before it came to full Execution, he dying, that also died with him.

A merry Passage between King Edward and an old Widow.

Money gathered upon Penal Statutes.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his fourth Year, he newly devised the New Coin both of Gold and Silver; the Gold he named Royals and Nobles, the Silver Groats, and half Groats; the new Groat weighing scanty three Pence, and the Noble of six Shillings eight Pence, appointed to go for eight Shillings four Pence. In his fifth Year it was proclaimed in England, that the Beaks or Pikes of Shoes and Boots should not pass two Inches, upon Pain of curfing by the Clergy, and forfeiting twenty Shillings to be paid, one Noble to the King, another to the Cordwainers of London, and the third to the Chamber of London: And for other Countries and Towns the like Order was taken. Before this Time, and since the Year 1382, the Pikes of Shoes and Boots were of such Length, that they were fain to be tied up to the Knees with Chains of Silver, and gilt, or at least with filken Laces.

The Length of Beaks and Pikes of Shoes limited.

Affairs

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

A.D. 1483 IN this King's Time the Jubile, which was before but every fiftieth Year, was, by Pope Sixtus the Fourth, brought to be every five and twentieth Year. Also, where before this Time, the Scotish Bishop had no Metropolitan, but the Bishop of York was Metropolitan and Primate of Scotland: Now in this King's Time, Pope Sixtus appointed the Bishop of St. Andrews to be Metropolitan of Scotland, who had twelve Bishops under his Obedience.

Works of Piety done in his Time.

THIS King laid the Foundation of the new Chappel at Windsor, and his Queen Elizabeth founded the Queen's College in Cambridge, and endowed it with large Possessions. About his fifteenth Year, Doctor Woodlark, Provost of King's College in Cambridge, founded Katharine-Hall there. In his seventeenth Year, the Wall of the City of London, from Cripplegate to Bishopsgate, was builded at the Charges of the Citizens; also Bishopsgate it self was new built by the Merchants Almans of the Steel-yard. Also in this Year died Sir John Crosby, Knight, late Mayor of London, who gave to the Repairing of the Parish-Church of St. Helen's, in Bishopsgate-street, where he was buried, five hundred Marks; to the Repairing the Parish-Church of Henworth in Middlesex, forty Pounds; to the Repairing of London-Wall, an hundred Pounds; to the Repairing Rochester-Bridge, ten Pounds; to the Wardens and Commonalty of the Grocers in London, two large Pots of Silver chased half gilt, and other Legacies. About this Time also, Richard Rawson, one of the Sheriffs of London, caused a House to be builded in the Church-yard of St. Mary Hospital without Bishopsgate, where the Mayor and Aldermen use to sit and hear the Sermons in Easter Holy-days. In his nineteenth Year, William Taylor, Mayor of London, gave to the City certain Tenements; for which the City is bound to pay for ever, at every Fifteenth granted to the King, for all such as shall dwell in Cordwainer-street Ward, seised at twelve Pence a-piece, or under. In his three and twentieth Year, Edward Shaw, Goldsmith, who had been Mayor of London, at his own Costs re-edified Cripplegate in London, which Gate in old Time had been a Prison.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his third Year, the Minster of York, and the Steeple of Christ's Church in Norwich, were burnt. In his seventeenth Year, so great a Pestilence reigned in England, that it swept away more People in four Months, than the Wars had done for fifteen Years past. Also in his nineteenth Year was another Pestilence; which beginning in the latter end of September, continued to the Beginning of November, twelve Months following; in which Space of Time innumerable People died.

Of his Wife and Issue.

KING Edward had been contracted to Eleanor Daughter to John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, married after to Sir John Butler, Baron of Sudely; but he married Elizabeth the Widow of Sir John Gray, Daughter of Richard Woodvile, by his Wife Jaqueline Duchess of Bedford: She liv'd his Wife eighteen Years and eleven Months, by whom he had three Sons and seven Daughters. Edward his eldest Son, born in the Sanctuary at Westminster; Richard, his second Son, born at Shrewsbury; George, his third Son, born also at Shrewsbury, but died a Child. Elizabeth, his eldest Daughter, promised in Marriage to Charles Dauphin of France, but married afterward to King Henry the Seventh; Cicely, his second Daughter, promised in Marriage to James Duke of Rothsay, Prince of Scotland; but was married afterward to John Viscount Wells, whom she out-lived, and was again re-married, but by neither Husband had any Issue; she lieth buried in the Isle of Wight. Ann, his third Daughter, was married to Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, Earl-Marshal, and High-Treasurer of England, by whom she had two Sons, both dying without Issue; she lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolk: Bridget, his fourth Daughter, born at Eltham in Kent, became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford in Kent, which King Edward had founded. Mary, his fifth Daughter, was promised in Marriage to the King of Denmark, but died in the Tower of Greenwich, before it could be solemnized; she lieth buried at Windsor. Margaret, his sixth Daughter, died an Infant. Katharine, his seventh Daughter, was married to William Courtney, Earl of Devonshire; to whom she bare Lord Henry, who by King Henry the Eighth was created Marquess of Exeter.

Concubines he had many; but Three especially, and would use to say, that he had three Concubines, who in their several Properties excelled; one, the Merriest; another, the Wyliest; the Third, the holiest Harlot in his Realm; as one whom no Man could lightly get out of the Church to any Place, unless it were to his Bed. The other Two were greater Personages than are fit to be named: But the Merriest was Shore's Wife, in whom therefore he took special Pleasure. This Woman was born in London, worshipfully descended, and well married; but when the King had abused her, anon her Husband (as he was an honest Man, and did know his Good, not presuming to touch a King's Concubine) left her up to him altogether.

By these he had natural Issue, Arthur, Sir-named Plantagenet (whose Mother, as is supposed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) created Viscount Lisle, by King Henry the Eighth, at Briderwell in London; and Elizabeth, who was married to Sir Thomas Lumley, Knight; to whom she bare Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did descend.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

A.D. 1483 HE was, saith Commines, the goodliest Personage that ever mine Eyes beheld, exceeding tall of Stature, fair of Complexion, and of most Princely Presence; and we may truly say, he was of full Age before he came to one and twenty; for being but eighteen Years old when his Father died, he sued out his Livery presently: So as he began the Race of his Fortune just like Augustus Caesar, each of them at the same Time succeeding an Ancestor after a violent Death; and each of them left to set on a Roof, where but only a Foundation was laid before. For his Conditions, he was of an erected Composure both of Body and Mind, but something sagging on the Flesh's Side; and never any Man that did marry for Love, did so little love Marriage; for he took as much Pleasure in other Mens Wives as in his own. He was never more confident, than when he was in Danger, nor never more doubtful than when he was secure. Of the four Cardinal Virtues, Fortitude and Prudence were in him naturally: Temperance and Justice but to serve his Turn. He was politick even to Irreligion; for to compass his Ends, he would not stick to swear what he never meant. Yet he was religious beyond Policy; for before Battels, he used to make his Prayers to God, after Victories to give him Thanks. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious; and could use Familiarity, and yet retain Majesty. He was a great Briber, and what he could not get by Force, he would by Rewards; as much as what he could not get by Battery, he would by Mines. He was too credulous of Reports, which made him be in Error, sometimes to the Hurt of himself, oftentimes of others. He had made the White Rose to flourish as long as Henry the Fourth made the Red, if he had not made it change Colour with too much Blood. He had been fortunate in his Children, if he had not been unfortunate in a Brother; but he was well enough served, that would think a Wolf could ever be a good Shepherd. He had an excellent Art in improving his Favours; for he could do as much with a small Courtesy, as other Men with a great Benefit: And that which was more, he could make Advantage of Disadvantages; for he got the Love of the Londoners by owing them Money, and the good Will of the Citizens, by lying with their Wives.

Of his Death and Burial.

WHether it began from his Mind, being extremely troubled with the injurious Dealing of the King of France, or from his Body by Intemperance of Diet, to which he was much given; he fell into a Sicknes (some say a Catarrh, some a Fever) but into a Sicknes whereof he died. In the Time of which Sicknes, and at the very Point of Death, Sir Thomas More makes him to make a Speech to his Lords; which I might think to be the Speech of a sick Man, if it were not so found; and of a weak Man, if it were not so long: But it seems A.D. 1483 Sir Thomas More delivers rather what was fit for him to say, than what he said; the Contents being only to exhort the Lords, whom he knew to be at Variance, to be in Love and Concord amongst themselves; for that the Welfare of his Children, whom he must now leave to their Care, could not otherwise be preserved but by their Agreement. And having spoken to this Purpose as much as his Weakness would suffer him, he found himself sleepy; and turning on one Side, he fell into his long Sleep, the ninth of April, in the Year 1484, when he had lived one and forty Years, reigned two and twenty and one Month; and was buried at Windsor, in the new Chappel, whose Foundation himself had laid.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

MEN of Valour in his Time were many, but himself the Chiefest; the rest may be observed in reading his Story. For Men of Letters, we may have Leave at this Time to speak of some Strangers, having been Men of extraordinary Fame; as Johannes de Monte Regio, Purbachius and Blancanus, all great Astronomers; Ludovicus Pontanus, Paulus Castrensis, and Anthonus Rossellanus, all great Lawyers; Servisanus, Savonarola and Barzizius, all great Physicians; Bessarion and Cusanus, both great Cardinals; Argyropole, Philephus, Datus, Leonardus, Aretinus, and Poggius, all great Men in humane Literature: And of our Countrymen, John Harding, Esquire, born in the North Parts, who wrote a Chronicle in English Verse; and, among other special Points therein touched, hath gathered all the Submissions and Homages made by the Scotish Kings, even from the Days of King Athelstan: Whereby it may evidently appear, how the Scotish Kingdom, even in a Manner, from the establishing thereof here in Britain, hath been appertaining unto the Kings of England, and holden of them as their chief and superiour Lords. Juliana Barnes, a Gentlewoman of excellent Gifts, who wrote certain Treatises of Hawking and Hunting; also a Book of the Laws of Arms, and Knowledge appertaining to Heralds. John Fortescue, a Judge and Chancellor of England, who wrote divers Treatises concerning the Law and Politick Government. Rochus a Charter-house Monk, born in London, who wrote divers Epigrams. Walter Hunt, a Carmelite Frier, who for his excellent Learning was sent from the whole Body of the Realm to the General Council holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence, by Pope Eugenius the Fourth; where he amongst others disputed with the Greeks, in Defence of the Order and Ceremonies of the Latin Church. William Caxton, who wrote a Chronicle called Fruetus Temporum, and an Appendix unto Trevesa, besides divers other Books and Translations. John Milverton, a Carmelite Frier of Bristol, and Provincial of his Order; who, because he defended such of his Order as preached against Endowments of the Church with Temporal Possessions, was committed to Prison in the Castle of Saint Angelo in Rome, where he continued three Years.

A.D. 1483 Years. David Morgan, a Welsh-man, who wrote of the Antiquities of Wales, and a Description of the Country. John Tiptoft, a Noble-man born, who wrote divers Treatises, but lost his Head in the Year 1471. Robert Huggon, born in Norfolk, who wrote certain vain Prophecies. Thomas Norton, born in Bristol, an Alchymist. Scogan, a learned Gentleman, and a Student for a Time in Oxford; who for his A.D. 1483 present Wit and merry Conceits, was called to Court. But most worthy of all to be remembered, Thomas Littleton, a reverend Judge of the Common-Pleas, who brought a great Part of the Law into Method, which lay before confusedly dispersed; and his Book called Littleton's Tenures. Thomas Littleton, who wrote the Tenures, at this Time lived.

A.D. 1483
K. Edward Proclaimed King; but never Crowned.

KING Edward the Fourth being dead, his eldest Son Edward, scarce yet eleven Years old, succeeded in the Kingdom, but not in the Crown; for he was Proclaimed

King, but never Crowned: And it may not so properly be called the Reign of Edward the Fifth, as the Tyranny of Richard the Third; for from the Time of King Edward's Death, though not in Name, yet in Effect, he not only ruled as King, but reigned as a Tyrant. Prince Edward, when his Father died, was at Ludlow in Wales, where he had lived some Time before, the better by his Presence to keep the Welsh in Awe; he had about him of his Mother's Kindred many; but Sir Anthony Woodville, the Earl Rivers his Uncle, was appointed his Chief Counsellor and Director. The Duke of Gloucester was at this Time in the North, but had Word presently sent him from the Lord Hastings, Lord Chamberlain, of his Brother King Edward's Death, who acquainted him withal, that by his Will, he had committed the young King, his Queen, and other Children, to his Care and Government; and thereupon putting him in Mind, how necessary it was for him speedily to repair to London: But the Duke of Gloucester needed no Spur to set him forward, who was already in a full Career; for he had long before projected in his Mind, how he might come to attain the Crown; and now he thought the Way was made him. For as it is said, the very Night in which King Edward died, one Misselbrook, long e'er Morning came in great Haste to the House of one Potter, dwelling in Redcross-street, without Cripplegate; where he shewed unto Potter, that King Edward was departed: To whom Potter answered, By my Troth, Man, then will my Master the Duke of Gloucester be King: What Cause he had so to think, is hard to say; but surely it is not likely he spake it of nought. And now the young King was coming up to London with a strong Guard, partly to make a first Expression of his Greatness, and partly to oppose any Disorders that might be offered. But the Duke of Gloucester finding this Proceeding like to be a Rub in his Way, at least, not fit for his Designs, he presently falls to undermining; writes most loving Letters to the Queen, protesting all humble and faithful Service to the King and her; but withal perswading her, that this great Guard about the King might be presently dismissed, A.D. 1483; which did but minister Matter of Suspicion, and would be apt to breed new Jealousies in them who were now thoroughly reconciled. The Queen, of a Nature easy to be wrought upon, gives Credit to his glozing Letters; and thereupon sends in all Haste to her Son, and to her Brother the Lord Rivers, requiring them by all Means, for some Causes to her known, to dismiss their Guard (not mentioning by whose Advice she writ them, which if she had done, they would never have done it) but now upon her Letters they presently did, and came forward with only a sober Company. And now is Gloucester's first Work done; but he, knowing that the Work yet behind was too great to be done by himself alone, gets the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Hastings, two of the greatest Men of Power at that Time in the Kingdom, to join with him in Opinion, that it was not fit the Queen's Kindred should be so wholly about the King; and others of better Blood and Desert, to be estranged from him; and therefore by all Means for to endeavour to remove them: To which the Duke of Buckingham is easily wrought, upon a Promise to have the Earldom of Hertford conferred upon him; and the Lord Hastings not hardly, upon a Hope by this Means to cut off many, whom in King Edward's Days he had justly offended. And now another great Work was done; it remains in the next Place, to put it in Execution, which was presently thus effected: The young King had been at Northampton, and from thence went to Stony-Stratford, whither the two Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham arrived; but pretending the Town to be too little for the Entertainment of their Companies, they went back to Northampton, and alight at the same Inn where the Earl Rivers had taken up his Lodging for that Night, intending the next Morning early to overtake the King. Upon this their accidental Meeting, great Shews of Courtesy passed between them; and Supper ended, the Dukes pretending Weariness, retire to their Lodgings, the Earl to his: But the Dukes being entred into their Chambers, enter into Consultation with their private Friends, in which they spent a great Part of the Night, and then secretly get the Keys of the Inn-Gates, suffering none to pass either in or out; whereof the Earl having Notice by his Host, though he suspected the worst, yet setting

ting a good Countenance upon the Matter, and trusting to his own Innocency, he boldly went to the Duke of Gloucester's Chamber, where he found the Duke of Buckingham and the rest closely set in Council; with whom he expostulates the Reason of this Course, to imprison him in his Inn against his Will: But they, instead of Answer, command presently to lay Hands on him, charging him with many Crimes, whereof themselves were only guilty: And then taking Order for his safe Imprisonment, they speedily took Horse and came to Stony-Stratford, at such Time as the King was taking Horse, whom in all reverend Manner they saluted: But presently in the King's Presence, a Quarrel is picked against the Lord Richard Gray, the King's Half-Brother: The Duke of Buckingham making Relation to the King, that he and the Marquess his Brother, with the Earl Rivers the Queen's Brother, had endeavoured, and almost affected, to draw to themselves the whole Managing the Affairs of the Kingdom, and to set Variance between the Peers of the Realm; and particularly, that the Lord Marquess, without any Warrant, had taken out of the Tower of London both Treasure and Armour, to a great Quantity: But to what Purpose though they were ignorant, yet there was just Cause to suspect it was to no good End: And therefore it was thought expedient, by the Advice of the Nobility, to attach him at Northampton, to have him forth-coming to make his Answer for these and many other his overbold Actions. The King, unable to sound the Depth of these Plots, mildly said unto him; What my Brother Marquess hath done I cannot say; but for my Uncle and Brother here, I dare answer that they are ignorant of any unlawful Practices either against me or you. O! saith the Duke of Buckingham, that hath been their Cunning to keep their Treachery from your Grace's Knowledge: And thereupon, instantly in the King's Presence, they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, Sir Richard Hall, and brought the King and all his Company back to Northampton, putting away all his old Servants, and placing in their Rooms Creatures of their own, whom they had Power to command. At which dealing the young King wept, but it booteth nothing; and to colour the Matter, the Duke of Gloucester at Dinner sent a Dish from his own Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good Cheer, for all shortly would be well. But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to carry it to the Lord Richard, with the same Message for his Comfort, as one to whom such Adversity was strange; but as for himself, he had all his Days been acquainted with it, and therefore could the better bear it.

The Earl Rivers and other Lords beheaded at Pomfret. The Duke of Gloucester gives out Colours for these Lords Imprisonment.

But for all the comfortable Courtesy of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North Country, into divers Places to Prison, and afterwards to Pomfret, where, in Conclusion, they were all beheaded.

And now the Duke of Gloucester having thus gotten the Custody of the King, set forwards towards London, giving out by the Way, that the Marquess and the Queen's Kindred had plotted the Destruction of the King, and of all the antient Nobility of the Realm, and to alter the Government of the Common-wealth; and that they were only imprisoned to be brought to their Trial according to Law. And the better to settle these Suggestions in the Apprehension of the Vulgar, they brought along with them divers Carts laden with Armour, of their own providing, with dry Fats and great Chefts, wherein they reported to be Treasure for the Payment of Soldiers, with which they so possessed the common People, that all was believed for Truth which was thus rumoured: But the finest Device of all was, to have five of the Duke of Gloucester's Instruments manacled and pinioned like Traitors; and these in every Place where the King lodged, to be dispersed and given out to be Men of great Birth, drawn into this vile Plot of Treason by the Queen's Brother, who must seem to be penitent for their Offence, and to confess their own Guilt: And this Device continued acting till the King came to London, where their Vizards were pulled off, and the Disguise was soon discovered.

The Queen in the mean Time having Intelligence of these doleful Accidents, and fearing there were worse to follow, with her second Son and five Daughters takes Sanctuary at Westminster; and the young King hearing of these Things, with Tears and Sighs expressed his Grief: But the Dukes making Protestation of their Fidelity, and Care of his Safety, seemed only to marvel why he should be melancholick.

At this Time a Messenger came from the Lord Chamberlain to the Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellor of England, to signify to him, that there was no Fear of any thing, for that he assured him all should be well. Well! quoth the Archbishop, be it as well as it will, I assure him it will never be so well as we have seen it. And thereupon, presently after the Messenger's Departure, he calleth up his Servants, being then in the Night, and taking the great Seal with him, came before Day to the Queen, whom he found sitting alone on the Rushes, all desolate and dismayed, whom he comforted the best he could, assuring her, that if they Crowned any King but her Son, whom they had with them, he would presently after Crown his Brother whom she had with her; and therewithal delivering to her the Great Seal, departed: But soon after bethinking himself better, he thought he had done too rashly, to deliver the Great Seal to the Queen; and therefore sent for it again, and had it delivered him: Yet shortly after, reproved for delivering it, by the Council-Table, he had it taken from him, which was then delivered to Dr. Ruffel, Bishop of Lincoln, the most learned Man at that Time.

The Lord Chancellor delivers the Great Seal to the Queen, and after fetcheth it from her again.

And now the Duke of Gloucester so respectfully carries himself towards the King, with so much Shew and Care of Faithfulness, that by a general Consent of the Council, he is appointed and established Protector of the King and Kingdom; and by this Means he hath the King in his Custody: It remains now how to get his Brother the Duke of York; for without having both, he were as good, as to his Purpose, have neither: And to effect this, he

The Duke of Gloucester is appointed Protector of the King and Kingdom.

A.D. 1483 makes the Effect to become a Cause: For whereas by his undue Dealings, he had made the King melancholick, he now makes that Melancholy a Cause to require his Brother's Company to make him merry: And therefore wishes some Course may be taken, either by Persuasion or otherwise, to procure the Queen to send the Duke of York to keep his Brother the King Company.
Here the Archbishop of York, the Lord Cardinal, the Man thought most fit to be sent in this Employment, riseth up and saith, he would do his best Endeavour to persuade her; but if he could not, he then thought it was not to be attempted against her Will, for that it would turn to the high Displeasure of God, if the Priviledge of that holy Place should now be broken, which had so many Years been inviolably kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy Ground was more than five hundred Years ago, by St. Peter, in his own Person, accompanied with great Numbers of Angels by Night, so specially hallowed and dedicated to God; and for Proof hereof, there is yet in the Abby, St.
Peter's Cope to shew, that from that Time hitherward, there never was so undevout a King that durst violate that sacred Place, nor so holy a Bishop that durst presume to consecrate it:
And therefore, saith he, God forbid, that any Man, for any Earthly Thing, should enterprise to break the Immunity and Liberty of that sacred Sanctuary: And I trust, with God's Grace, we shall not need it, at least my Endeavours shall not be wanting; if the Mother's Dread and Womanish Fear be not the Let. Womanish Fear, nay Womanish Forwardness, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, for I dare take it upon my Soul, she well knoweth there is no need of any Fear, either for her Son, or for herself:

And prosecuting his Discourse, declareth at large, that there was no just Cause for the Queen to keep her Son, so there was great Cause for them to require him; and that for Breach of Sanctuary in this Case there could be none; for that he had often heard of Sanctuary-Men, but never heard of Sanctuary-Children. And to this Purpose having spoken much, it was well assented to by the Lords that were present, and with this Instruction is the Archbishop (upon whom the Queen specially relied) sent unto her: Who after humble Salutations, acquaints her with his Message, earnestly persuading her not to oppose the Lord Protector's Request, and giving her many Reasons, first that she ought not, and then that she could not keep him in Sanctuary. She answered all his Reasons, though with great Mild-ness, yet with great Earnestness; so as the Archbishop finding little Hope to prevail with her by Persuasion, turns the Tenor of his Speech another Way, telling her plainly, that if she did not consent to send her Son, he doubted some sharper Course would be speedily taken.
This Warning sunk so deep into the Queen's Mind, that after a little Pausing, taking her Son by the Hand, she said, my Lord Archbishop, here he is; for my own Part I will never deliver him, but if you will needs have him, take him, and at your Hands I will require him: And therewith weeping bitterly, Dear

Child, saith she, let me kiss thee, before we part. God knows whether ever we shall meet again: And so the Child weeping as fast as she, went along with the Archbishop to the Star-Chamber, where the Lord Protector, and other Lords had stayed all the while looking for his coming back: And as soon as he was entred the Room, the Protector spying the Child, riseth up and embraceth him, saying, Dear Nephew, now welcome with all my Heart; next to my Sovereign Lord your Brother, nothing gives me so much Contentment as your Presence: And we may believe him, he spake as he thought; for now he had the Prey which he so much desired, a few Days after, pretending to have them lodged in a Place of more Security, until the Distempers of the Common-wealth might better be quieted; he caused them in great Pomp and State to be conveyed through London to the Tower, there at Pleasure to remain till the Time of Coronation; whereof there was great Shew of Preparation made.

But now the great Work is to be done, the Princes are to be made away; and how to have it done, Hoc opus, hic labor est: There must be potent Instruments, and none so potent as the Duke of Buckingham; and he, by a Match to be concluded betwixt their Children, and an equal Partition of the Treasure of the Realm betwixt them two, not only is drawn to con-descend, but most forward to contrive and plot Stratagems to effect it. The first Rub in the Way was the Lord Hastings; who being found so firm to his old Master King Edward's Sons, that nothing could remove him, it was fit to remove him out of the Way; which was done in this Manner: All the Lords of the Privy-Council, in the Protector's Name, are convoked to the Tower; where fitting Preparations for the Coronation of the young King, are proposed, until the Protector came in; who taking his Chair, very affably saluted them, merrily jesting with some, and more than ordinarily pleasant with them all: When after a little Talk, he said to the Bishop of Ely, My Lord, I hear you have very good Strawberries at your Garden in Holbourn; I pray let us have a Mess of them. Most gladly, said the Bishop, and presently sent for some: And then the Protector rising up, prayed the Lords to spare his Absence a little; and so departed. Within the Space of an Hour he returned; but so changed in Countenance, and with such inward Perturbations, which with Sighings and other passionate Gestures he expressed so, that it made them all to marvel. After long Silence (the better to prepare them to the more Attention) he confusedly interrogates, What they deserved that nefariously had practised his Destruction? This unexpected Interrogation struck such Amazement amongst the Lords, that they all sat gazing on one another, and were as it were stricken dumb: At length the Lord Hastings, by Buckingham's Instigation, as one presuming on his Intimacy with the Protector, boldly answered, that they deserved the Punishment of Traitors; which all the rest by their Silence approved: Whereat the Protector riseth up, and with a stern Look upon the Lord Hastings, replied; Why, it is the old Sorcerers my Bro-

A.D. 1483 ther's Widow, and her Partner, the common Strumpet Jane Shore, that have by Incantation conspired to bereave me of my Life; and though by God's Grace I have escaped the End of their Malice, yet see the Mischief they have done me; for behold (and then he bared his left Arm to the Elbow, and shewed it) how they have caused this dear Limb of mine to wither, and grow useless! and so should all my Body have been served, if they might have had their Will a little longer. Those to whom the Queen's religious Courses were not unknown, and who knew his withered Arm to have been such from his Birth, sat gazing one upon another, not knowing what to think or say, until the Lord Hastings, thinking thereby to leave all Blame upon the Queen, and excuse his Paramour Mistress Shore (whom ever since the Death of King Edward he had entertained for his Bed-fellow, and had but that Morning parted from her) with a sober Look, submissively said, If the Queen have conspired—Which Word was no sooner out of the Lord Hastings's Mouth, than the Protector clapping his Hand upon the Board, and frowningly looking upon him, said, Tellest thou me of If and And? I tell thee, They, and none but they have done it; and thou thy self art Partaker of the Villany. Who I, my Lord, quoth he? Yea, thou Traitor, quoth the Protector; and therewith, upon a Watchword given, those prepared before for that Purpose, in the outer Chamber, cried, Treason, Treason! when presently a great Number of Men in Arms came rushing in, as it were to guard the Protector; one of which, with a Pollax, struck a main Blow at the Lord Stanley, and wounded him on the Head, and had slain him outright, if he had not avoided the Stroke by slipping backward, and falling down to the Ground. Forthwith the Protector arrested the Lord Hastings of High Treason, and wished him to make Haste to be confessed; for he swore by Saint Paul, his usual Oath, that he would not touch Bread, nor drink, till his Head were off. It booted not to ask, why; for he knew the Protector's Actions were not to be examined, so he was led forth unto the Green, before the Chappel, within the Tower, where his Head was laid down upon a long Log of Timber, and there stricken off. His Body afterwards, with his Head, were interred at Windsor, besides the Body of King Edward. In this Man's Death we may see how inevitable the Blows of Destiny are; for the very Night before his Death, the Lord Stanley sent a secret Messenger to him at Midnight, in all Haste, to acquaint him with a Dream he had; in which he thought that a Boar with his Tusks so goared them both by the Heads, that the Blood run about their Shoulders; and forasmuch as the Protector gave the Boar for his Cognizance, this Dream made so fearful an Impression in his Heart, that he was thoroughly resolved to stay no longer; and had made his Horse ready, requiring the Lord Hastings to go with him, and that presently, to be out of Danger, before it should be Day. But the Lord Hastings answered the Messenger; Good Lord! leaneth your Master so much to such Trifles, to put such Faith in Dreams, which either his own Fear fantasieth, or else do rise in the Night's Rest, by reason of the Day's A.D. 1483 Thoughts? Go back therefore to thy Master, and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and have no Fear; for I assure him, I am as sure of the Man he wotteth of, as of my own Hand. The Man he meant, was one Catesby, well learned in the Laws of the Land; who by his Favour was grown into good Authority in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings's Estate lay. Of this Man he made himself so sure, that he thought nothing could be plotted against him, which he would not presently reveal unto him. But this Man deceived him, and was grown so inward with the Protector, that being set by the Protector to draw him to be a Party in his Designs, and finding he could not do it, was himself the first Mover to rid him out of the Way. Another Warning the Lord Hastings had, the same Morning in which he was beheaded: His Horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to falling; which, though it often happen to such to whom no Mischance is toward, yet hath it of old been observed as a Token foregoing some great Misfortune. Also at the Tower-Wharf, near to the Place where his Head soon after was stricken off, he met with one Hastings, a Pursuivant of his own Name, to whom he said, Ah, Hastings, dost thou remember I met thee here once with a heavy Heart? Yea, my Lord, saith he, I remember it well; and God be thanked that Time is past. In Faith Man, saith the Lord Hastings, I never stood in so great Dread of Life, as I did when thou and I met here: And lo, how the World is changed! Now stand my Enemies in the Danger, as thou mayest hap to hear hereafter (for the Enemies he meant, were the Lord Rivers, and other of the Queen's Kindred, who that very Day were beheaded at Pomfret) and I never so merry, nor in so good Surety as now I am. That we may know, there is not a greater Omen, or Sign of ill Fortune, than to presume of Good. And indeed, such is the Uncertainty of our Estate in this Life, that we seldom know when we are in a Tempest at Sea, nor when we are in a Calm on Shore; thinking our selves oftentimes most safe, when we are most in Danger, and oftentimes to be in Danger, when we are most safe: He only is in the true Haven that can say, as Christ teacheth us, Thy Will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven.

But this Lord being thus put to Death, the Lord Protector, to colour the Matter, immediately after Dinner, in all Haste, sent for many substantial Citizens; at whose coming, himself, with the Duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old rusty Brigandines, to make a Shew they were forced by the sudden Danger to take such as they could first come by: And withal, a Herald of Arms is sent with a Proclamation in the King's Name, signifying that the Lord Hastings, with some others, had conspired the same Day to have slain the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, as they sat in Council; and after to have taken upon them to rule the King and Kingdom at their own Pleasures. Now was this Proclamation made within two Hours after the Lord Hastings was beheaded; and was so curiously indited, and so fair written in Parchment, and withal so long, that every Child might perceive it was prepared before, which

How the Lord Protector colours the Death of the Lord Hastings.

A.D. 1483 which made one that was School-matter of St. Paul's, standing by when the Proclamation was read, to say, Here is a gay goodly Cast, foul cast away for Haste: To whom a Merchant answered, It was written by Prophecy. And now by and by, as it were in Revenge of his Offence, the Protector sent the Sheriffs of London into the House of Shore's Wife, and spoiled her of all her Goods, above the Value of three thousand Marks; and then conveying her through London to the Tower, there left her Prisoner; where he laid to her Charge, that she went about to bewitch him, and was of Council with the Lord Hastings to destroy him. In Conclusion, she was laid into Ludgate, and by the Bishop of London put to open Penance for Incontinency, going before the Cross in Procession upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her Hand: In which, although she were out of all Array, save her Kirtle only; yet went she so fair and lovely, and withal so Womanly and demurely, that many who hated her Course of Life, yet pitied her coarse Usage, and were not a little grieved to see her Misery. And indeed, this may be said in her Behalf, that being in extraordinary Favour with King Edward, yet she never used it to the Hurt of any, but to the Relief of many; and was ever a Mediator, an Oppressor never.

Shore's Wife, how punished.

Now it was contrived by the Protector, that the very Day in which the Lord Hastings was beheaded at London, and about the very same Hour, there were beheaded at Pomfret the Lord Rivers, and the other Lords and Knights that were taken from the King at Northampton, and Stony-Stratford, which was done in the Presence, and by the Order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Knight, whose Service the Protector specially used in that Business; who bringing them to the Scaffold, and not suffering them to declare their Innocency, lest their Words might have enclined Men to hate the Protector, caused them hastily, without Judgment or Order of Process, to be beheaded.

When these were thus rid out of the Way, then thought the Protector, that now was the Time to put himself in Possession of the Crown: But all the Study was, by what Means this Matter, being so heinous in it self, might be broken to the People in such wise as that it might be well taken: For which Purpose, it was thought fit to call to this Council Edmund Shaw, Knight, the then Mayor of London, who, upon Promise of Advancement, should frame the Peoples Inclination to it. And because spiritual Men are best hearkened to for Matters of Conscience, some of them were used also, among whom Choice was made of John Shaw, Clerk, Brother to the Mayor, Frier Penker, Provincial of the Order of the Augustine Friars, both great Preachers, of more Learning than Virtue, of more Fame than Learning. These two were appointed to preach, the one at St. Paul's Cross, the other at the Spittle, in Praise of the Protector: Penker in his Sermon so lost his Voice, that he was fain to leave off, and came down in the Midst: Shaw by his Sermon lost his Reputation, and soon after his Life; for he never after durst come abroad for very Shame of the World.

But now was all the Labour and Study to find out some convenient Pretext, for which the People should be content to have the Prince A.D. 1483 deposed, and the Protector be received for King; to which Purpose many Things were devised; the chief was, to alledge Bastardy either in King Edward himself, or in his Children, or in both. To lay Bastardy to King Edward, founded openly to the Reproach of the Protector's own Mother, who was Mother to them both; he would therefore that Point should more favourably be handled; but the other Point, concerning the Bastardy of his Children, he would have enforced to the uttermost. The Ground whereof was, that King Edward had been formerly contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, by whom he had a Child; though the said Lady, having been examined about it, confessed plainly, they were never assured. Yet upon this Pretext, Doctor Shaw taking for his Text, Bastard Plants shall take no deep Root; in his Sermon declared, that King Edward was never lawfully married to the Queen, but was before God, Husband to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, and so his Children Bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himself, nor the Duke of Clarence were reckoned very sure for the Children of the noble Duke Richard, as those that by their Favours more resembled other known Men; but the Lord Protector, saith he, is the Father's own Figure, his own Countenance, the very Print of his Visage, the plain express Likeness of that noble Duke. Now it was before devised, that just at the speaking of these Words the Protector should have come, to the End that these Words meeting with his Presence, might be taken among the Hearers, as though the Holy Ghost had put them in the Preacher's Mouth, and so should move the People even then to cry, King Richard! King Richard! that it might be after said, he was specially chosen by God, and in a Manner by Miracle: But this Device failed; for whether by the Protector's Slackness in coming, or the Doctor's Haste in preaching, he had passed these Words, and was gone clean to another Matter before the Protector came; so as afterward seeing him come, he was fain to leave the Matter he had in Hand, and out of all Order and Frame begin to repeat those Words again: This is the very noble Prince, the Father's own Figure, his own Countenance, the very Print of his Visage, the plain express Likeness of that noble Duke. While these Words were in speaking, the Protector, accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, pressed through the People into the Place where the Doctors sit; and there sat to hear the Sermon. But the People were so far from crying King Richard, that they cried Shame on the Preacher for abusing his sacred Function with so shameful a Sermon.

The Tuesday following this Sermon, the Duke of Buckingham, with divers Lords and Knights, came to the Guild-hall in London, and there, before the Mayor and whole Assembly of Citizens, made a very solemn and long Oration, wherein he recited many Grievances of the late King Edward's Government; his many unnecessary Taxations and unjust Severities; thereby to bring his Children into Hatred, and then remembered them of the late Sermon made at St. Paul's Cross, by a learned Doctor, who clearly

Heir to the Crown.

A.D. 1483 clearly shewed the Bastardy of King Edward's Children, and that Richard Duke of Gloucester was the only rightful and indubitate Heir to the Crown of England: Which the Lords of the Kingdom having taken into their Consideration, had thereupon agreed to accept him for their King; and now himself was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their Consents. Which Oration ended, all Men stood wondering at the Motion, but no Man offered to speak a Word. At which the Duke marvelling, as supposing the Mayor had prepared them before; he asked the Mayor privately, what this Silence meant? Who answered, That perhaps they had not heard or understood what it was he said. Whereupon the Duke with a more audible Voice repeated the same Matter again, in a more earnest and plain Expression; yet neither did that move them to shew any Inclination to the Motion. Then the Duke whispering with the Mayor, it was thought that the Citizens being used to have such Motions made them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him, and thereupon the Recorder is commanded to move them in it: But the Recorder (called Fitzwilliams) being an honest Man, and newly come to his Place, repeated only, as near as he could, the Words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; so as neither did this move the People to break their Silence. At last the Duke, seeing their resolved Sullenness, told them plainly, That all the Nobility and Commons of the Realm were agreed to choose the Protector for their King, as the true and undoubted Heir; so as he needed not to have moved them to it, but only for the great Respect they all bear to this honourable City, and therefore required them plainly to speak their Minds, whether they would join with them in this Choice or no. At this, certain Servants of the Duke's, and others of their procuring, standing at the lower End of the Hall, cast up their Caps, and cried aloud, K. Richard! K. Richard! Whereat, though the whole Multitude of Citizens marvelled what they meant, yet the Duke taking Advantage of it, as of an unanimous Consent; A goodly Cry, saith he, and thanked them all for their universal Approbation, promising he would acquaint the Protector with the great Love they shewed toward him; and then requiring the Mayor and chief Citizens to meet him the next Morning at Baynard's Castle, where the Protector then lay, there to join with him in petitioning the Protector to accept of this their freely proffered Subjection, he took his Leave, and so departed.

The Duke of Buckingham and the Mayor of London make Suit unto the Protector to take the Crown upon him.

The next Morning, according to Appointment, they all meet at Baynard's Castle; where the Duke of Buckingham sends up Word to the Lord Protector, that himself, with the Lord Mayor and his Brethren, were come to present a Supplication to him concerning a Business of great Importance: But the Protector (though pre-acquainted with all Passages, yet) made it strange what their Supplication should be; and answered, That though he suspected nothing which the Duke of Buckingham presented to him, yet he desired at least some slight Intimation to what it might tend. To this it was answered, That the Business they came about was to be made known to himself in Person; and therefore humbly besought him for Admission to his Presence. Upon this, as if not yet well assured of their Meaning towards him, he appears unto them in an upper Gallery, making Semblance as though he would prevent all Danger, by standing something aloof, and in his Fort. To whom the Duke of Buckingham, in Behalf of the Mayor and Nobility there present, in most respectful and reverend Manner, makes Request that his Grace would pardon what he should deliver to him: And much Circumstance he used, before he would discover their Cause of coming; but though long first, yet at last he told it: That in respect of the urgent Necessities of the Commonwealth, they all humbly entreated him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom, as in his own Right; to whom they all rendered their Allegiance. At which Words the Protector starting back, as if he had heard something most displeasing to him, passionately answered; I little thought, good Cousin, that you of all Men would have moved me to a Matter, which of all Things in the World I most decline: Far be it from me to accept of that which, without apparent Wrong to my dear deceased Brother's sweet Children, and my own upright Conscience, I cannot well approve of. And then being about to proceed in his premeditated Dissimulation, the Duke, in a seeming abrupt Passion, kneeling upon his Knee, said, Your Grace was pleased to give me free Liberty to deliver unto you in the Name of this worthy Assembly, the Tender of their dutiful Obedience to you: But I must further add, that it is unanimously resolved on, That your late Brother King Edward's Children, as being generally known to be Illegitimate, shall never be admitted to the Crown of England; and therefore, if your Grace shall neither regard your self nor us so much as to accept it, we are directly determined to confer it upon some other of the House of Lancaster, that will be more sensible of his own and our Good. These Words wrought so powerfully upon the Protector's Passions, that with some Change of Countenance, and not without seeming Reluctation, he said; Since I perceive the whole Realm is so resolved, by no Means to admit my dear Nephews, being but Children, to reign over you; and seeing the Right of Succession belongs justly to me, as the indubitate Heir of Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, my illustrious Father; We are contented to condescend to your Importunities, and to accept of the Royal Government of the Kingdom; and will, to the Uttermost of my Power, endeavour to procure and maintain the Welfare thereof. And having so said, he came down from his Gallery, and very formally saluted them all; which so pleased the giddy Multitude, that presently they fell to Acclamations, Long live K. Richard, our dread Sovereign Lord! and then every Man departed.

The Protector started at their Motion.

But yet accepts it.

THE LIFE and REIGN of King RICHARD III.

A.D. 1483 IT was now the 18th Day of June, in the Year 1483, when Richard Duke of Gloucester took upon him the Crown: So as the imaginary Reign of Edward V. continued but just ten Weeks. The next Day K. Richard with a great Train went to Westminster-Hall, and placed himself in the Court of the King's-Bench, saying, He would take the Crown upon him in that Place where the King himself sitteth and ministreth the Law, because he considered that it is the chiefest Duty of a King to administer the Laws. And here, to get the Love of the People by a feigned Clemency, he sent for one Fooge out of Sanctuary, who for Fear of his Displeasure was fled thither; and there, in the Sight of all the People, caused him to kiss his Hand.

K. Richard marries the Relict of Prince Edward, Son to Henry VI.

After his Return home, he took to Wife the Lady Anne, youngest Daughter of the Great Warwick, and the Relict of Prince Edward, Son of Henry VI. though she could not be ignorant, that he had been the Author both of her Husband's and Father's Death. But Womens Affections are eccentric to common Apprehension; whereof the two Poles are Passion and Inconstancy.

Lords created.

Against his Coronation he had sent for five thousand Men out of the North; and these being come under the leading of Robin Riddefdale, upon the 4th Day of July, together with his new Bride, he went from Baynard's Castle to the Tower by Water, where he created Edward his Son, a Child of ten Years old, Prince of Wales; John Lord Howard, Duke of Norfolk, his Son Sir Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey; William Lord Berkley, Earl of Nottingham; Francis Lord Lovel, Viscount Lovel, and his Chamberlain; and the Lord Stanley (who had been committed Prisoner to the Tower, in regard his Son the Lord Strange was reported to have levied Forces in Lancashire) not only that Day was released out of Prison, but was made Lord Steward of his Household. The Archbishop of York was likewise then delivered; but Morton, Bishop of Ely (as one that could not be drawn to the disinheriting of K. Edward's Children) was committed to the Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brecknock in Wales, there to be in Custody. The same Night were made seventeen Knights of the Bath; Edmund, the Duke of Suffolk's Son; George Gray, the Earl of Kent's Son; William,

Morton, Bishop of Ely, committed to the Duke of Buckingham.

the Lord Zouch's Son; Henry Aburgaveny, A.D. 1483 Christopher Willoughby, Henry Babington, Thomas Arundel, Thomas Boleyn, Gervis Clifton, William Say, Edmund Bedingfield, William Enderby, Thomas Lewknor, Thomas of Urmond, John Browne, and William Berkley, Esqs. The next Day, being the 5th of July, the King rode through the City of London to Westminster, being accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk, Buckingham, and Suffolk; the Earls of Northumbreland, Arundel, Kent, Surrey, Wiltshire, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincoln; the Viscounts Lisle and Lovel; the Lords Stanley, Audley, Dacre's, Ferrers of Chartley, Powis, Scroop of Upsale, Scroop of Bolton, Gray of Codnor, Gray of Wilton, Sturton, Cobham, Morley, Aburgaveny, Zouch, Ferrers of Groby, Wells, Lumley, Matrevers, Herbert, and Beckham, and fourscore Knights. On the Morrow, being the 6th of July, the King, with Queen Anne his Wife, came down out of the White Hall into the great Hall at Westminster, and went directly to the King's Bench; and from thence, going upon Ray-cloth bare-footed, went to St. Edward's Shrine, all his Nobility going with him, every Lord in his Degree. The Bishop of Rochester bore the Cross before the Cardinal: Then followed the Earl of Huntingdon, bearing a Pair of gilt Spurs, signifying Knighthood: Then followed the Earl of Bedford, bearing St. Edward's Staff for a Relick: After him came the Earl of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointless Sword in his Hand, signifying Mercy: The Lord Stanley bore the Mace of Constableship: The Earl of Kent bore the second Sword, on the Right-hand of the King, naked, with a Point which signified Justice to the Temporality: The Lord Lovel bore the third Sword on the King's Left-hand, with a Point which signified Justice to the Clergy: The Duke of Suffolk followed with the Sceptre in his Hand, which signified Peace: The Earl of Lincoln bore the Ball and Cross, which signified Monarchy: The Earl of Surrey bore the fourth Sword before the King in a rich Scabbard, which is called the Sword of Estate: Then went three together; in the Midst went Garret King of Arms, in his rich Coat; and on his Right-hand went the Mayor of London, bearing a Mace; and on his Left-hand went the Gentleman-Usher of the Privy-Chamber: Then followed the Duke of Norfolk, bearing the King's Crown

K. Richard and his Queen in great State are Crowned, and the Manner of it.

A.D. 1483 Crown between his Hands : Then followed King Richard in his Robes of Purple Velvet, and over his Head a Canopy, born by four Barons of the Cinque-ports ; and on each Side of the King went a Bishop : On one Side the Bishop of Bath ; on the other, of Durham : Then followed the Duke of Buckingham, bearing the King's Train, with a white Staff in his Hand, signifying the Office of High-Steward of England. Then followed the Queen's Train, before whom was born the Sceptre, the Ivory Rod, with the Dove (signifying Innocency) and the Crown : Her self, appalled in Robes like the King's, under a rich Canopy, at every Corner thereof a Bell of Gold. On her Head she wore a Circlet, set full of precious Stones, the Countess of Richmond bearing her Train ; the Duchesses of Norfolk and Suffolk in their Coronets, attending with twenty Ladies of Estate most richly attired. In this Order they passed the Palace into the Abby : And going up to the High Altar, there shifted their Robes ; and having other Robes open in divers Places from the Middle upward, were both of them Anointed and Crowned ; and then after the Sacrament received (having the Host divided betwixt them) they both offered to St. Edward's Shrine, where the King left St. Edward's Crown wherewith he had been Crowned, and put on his own ; and this done, in the same Order and State as they came, they returned to Westminster-hall, and there held a most Princely Feast, at the second Course whereof, there came into the Hall Sir Robert Dymock the King's Champion, making Proclamation, that whosoever would say that King Richard was not lawful King of England, he was there ready to prove it against him ; and thereupon threw down his Gantlet, and then all the Hall cried, King Richard ! King Richard ! And thus with some other Ceremonies the Coronation ended, and the King and Queen returned to their Lodgings.

King Richard sends to make Amity with the King of France, but he rejects it. Presently after this, King Richard sent a solemn Ambassage to Lewis King of France, to conclude a League and Amity with him : But the French King so abhorred him, and his Cruelty, that he would not so much as see or hear his Ambassadors ; but sent them away with Shame, in Disgrace of their Master.

At this Time with his Queen, he made a Progress to Gloucester, under Colour to visit the Place of his old Honour ; but indeed to be out of the Way, having a special Villany to be acted ; for though he had satisfied his Ambition, by depriving his dear Nephews of their Livelihoods ; yet it satisfied not his Fear, if he deprived them not also of their Lives. For effecting whereof, his old Friend the Duke of Buckingham was no fit Instrument ; it must be one of a baser Metal, and to find out such a one he needed not go far ; for upon Enquiry, he was told of two that lay in the next Chamber to him, Sir Thomas and Sir James Tyrrel ; two Brothers like Jacob and Esau, not more near in Blood, than different in Conditions ; of equal Goodliness of Personage both, but not of equal Goodness of Mind ; Sir Thomas a Man of an honest and sober Disposition ; but Sir James of a turbulent Spirit, and one who gaping after Preferment, would not stick to make a Fortune out of any Villany. Being told of this Man as

A.D. 1483 he was sitting on the Close-stool, he presently rose and went to him ; where being met, the Match is soon made up between them ; for he found Sir James more ready to undertake the Work, than he was himself to set him about it. It only remained to procure him free Passage to the Place where the Work was to be done ; for King Richard had formerly sent a trusty Privado of his, named John Green, to Sir Robert Brackenbury then Lieutenant of the Tower, thinking that he, having been raised by him, would not have refused to do the Deed himself ; but when he heard how averse he was from it, Good Lord, said he, whom may a Man trust ! Once he saw plainly, that whilst he was Lieutenant, there was no Possibility to affect it. To remove therefore this Rub, he sends his Letters Mandatory to Brackenbury, to deliver presently the Keys of the Tower to Sir James Tyrrel, who being now Lieutenant for the Time, and having the two innocent Princes under his Custody, gets two other, as very Villains as himself, the one Miles Forrest, the other James Dighton, his Horsekeeper, a big sturdy Knave ; and these he makes his under Agents ; who coming into the Childrens Chamber in the Night (for they were suffered to have none about them, but one black Will, or William Slaughter, a bloody Rascal) they suddenly lapped them up in their Cloaths, and keeping down by Force the Feather-bed and Pillows hard under their Mouths, so stifled them, that their Breath failing, they gave up their innocent Souls to God, whom when the Murtherers perceived, first by their struggling with the Pains of Death, and then by their long lying still, to be thoroughly dead, they laid their Bodies out upon the Bed, and then fetched Sir James to see them ; who presently caused their Bodies to be buried under the Stairs, under a Heap of Stones ; from whence they were afterward removed to a Place of Christian-burial, by a Priest of Sir Robert Brackenbury's, who dying within a few Days after, and none knowing the Place but himself, was Cause that it hath not been known to this Day ; and gave Occasion afterward to the Imposture of Perkin Warbeck in King Henry the Seventh's Reign. [Since this was written, the Bones of these young Princes were found in the Year 1674, in the Place where they were buried : And King Charles the Second gave Order that they should be put in a Marble Urn, and deposited among the Remains of the Royal Families in Westminster-Abby.] And now see the divine Vengeance upon the Actors of this execrable Murther : Miles Forrest, at St. Martins le Grand, rotted away piece-meal : Dighton lived at Calais a long Time after, but detested of all Men, died in great Misery : Sir James Tyrrel was beheaded afterward on the Tower-bill for Treason : And King Richard himself, after this abominable Fact done, never had a quiet Mind, was troubled with fearful Dreams ; and would sometimes in the Night start out of his Bed, and run about the Chamber in great Fright, as if all the Furies of Hell were hanging about him ; that it was verified in him, Ultrix Tisiphone vocat agmina sæva sororum.

The Princes are murdered.

But where buried not known.

The Murtherers miserable Ends.

Con-

A.D. 1483

King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham fall at Variance.

Confederacies in Evil are seldom long-lived, and commonly end in a reciprocal Destruction; and so was it now with King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham: They had confederated together to the Destruction of many; and now their Confederacy dissolves in both their Ruins. But what the Cause was of their Dissolving, is not so certain; whether it were that the Duke thought not himself so well rewarded as his great Services had deserved; or whether it were, that King Richard thought not himself absolute King as long as the Duke, by whose Means he came to be King, was in such a Height and Greatness; or whether it were, as was rather thought, that the Duke being a Man ambitious, and of an aspiring Spirit; though he had himself been the Means to bring King Richard to the Crown; yet when the Crown was put upon his Head, so envied at it, that he turned his Head another Way, as not enduring the Sight; and for the same Cause, was willing not to have been present at the Coronation, pretending Sickness in Excuse of his Absence; but that King Richard sent him a sharp Message, requiring him to come, or he would fetch him; whereupon the Duke went, but with so ill a Will, that he bore it in Mind ever after. Whatsoever it was, certain it is, that presently after the Coronation there grew great Jealousies between them, and the Duke retired himself to his Castle at Brecknock, where he had the Bishop of Ely in Custody. And here we may observe the unsearchable Depth of the divine Providence, the Bottom whereof, the soundest Judgment of Man can never fathom, as working Effects by contrary Causes: For whereas King Richard had committed the Bishop to the Duke, as to one that would have a most watchful Eye over him, this which the King did for the Bishop's greater Punishment, proved a Means afterwards of the Bishop's greater Advancement, and a Means, at the present, of King Richard's Ruin: For the Duke being retired Home, and having his Head so full of Thoughts, that of Necessity it required Vent; for his own Recreation would sometimes fall in Talk with the Bishop, with whose Discourse (as he was a Man of great Wit and solid Judgment) the Duke was so taken, that he grew to delight in nothing more than to be conferring with him.

The Duke of Buckingham
plots with Morton Bishop of Ely, to put down
King Richard, and to bring in the Earl of Richmond.

One Time it happened, that the Duke had opened his Mind something freely to him; and the Bishop following him in his own Way, and cunningly working upon that Humour of the Duke which he found most working in the Duke; which he perceived to grow out of Envy to King Richard, he said to this Purpose; My Lord, you know I followed first the Part of King Henry the Sixth, and if I could have had my Wish, his Son should have had the Crown, and not King Edward: But after that God had ordained King Edward to Reign, I was never so mad, that I would with a dead Man strive against the quick. And so was I to King Edward also a faithful Chaplain, and glad would have been that his Child had succeeded him: Howbeit, if the secret Judgment of God have otherwise provided, I purpose not to labour to set up that which God pulleth down. And as for the Lord Protector, and now King — and even there he left, saying, he had already meddled too much with the World; and would from that Day meddle with his Books and his Beads, and no further. Then longed the Duke exceedingly to hear what he would have said, because he ended with the King, and there suddenly stopped; and thereupon entreated him to be bold to say whatsoever he thought; whereof he faithfully promised there should never come Hurt, and peradventure more Good than he would think; and withal, that himself intended to use his secret Counsel; which he said, was the only Cause for the which he had procured of the King to have him in his Custody. The Bishop humbly thanked him, and said, In good Faith my Lord, I love not to talk much of Princes, as a Thing not at all out of Peril, though the Word be without Fault; for so much as it shall not be taken as the Party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And ever I think on Aesop's Tale, that when the Lion had proclaimed, on Pain of Death, that no horned Beast should abide in a certain Wood, one that had in his Forehead a Bunch of Flesh, fled away a great Pace: The Fox that saw him run so fast, asked him whither he made all that Haste? who answered, in Faith I neither wot nor reck, so I were once hence, because of the Proclamation made of horned Beasts: Why Fool, quoth the Fox, thou mayest abide well enough, the Lion meant it not by thee, for it is no Horn that is on thy Head: No, marry, quoth he, that wot I well enough: But what if he call it a Horn, where am I then? The Duke laughed at the Tale, and said, My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boar shall pick any Matter from any thing here spoken; for it shall never come near their Ear. Then said the Bishop, in good Faith, Sir, if it did, the Thing I was about to say, taken as well as afore God I meant it, could deserve but Thanks; and yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turn me to little Good, and you to less. Then longed the Duke much more to hear what it was: Whereupon the Bishop said, My Lord, as for the late Protector, sith he is now King in Possession, I purpose not to dispute his Title: But for the Weal of the Realm, I could wish he had in him those excellent Virtues which God hath planted in the Person of your Grace; and there left again. The Duke somewhat marveling at this sudden Pause, said, My Lord, I cannot but note your sudden Stoppage in your Speech, so as your Words come not to any direct Sentence, whereby I may have Knowledge, either what your inward Intent is now toward the King, or what your Affection is toward me: I therefore entreat you to use no more such Obscurity, but plainly to disclose your Mind unto me, who upon mine Honour will be as secret in the Case as the deaf and dumb Person is to the Singer, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop then upon Confidence of the Duke's Promise, said, My Lord, I plainly perceive the Kingdom being in the Case as it is, under such a King as now we have, must needs decay and be brought to Confusion; but one Hope I have, that when I consider and daily behold your noble Personage, your Justice, your ardent Love towards your Country, and in like Manner the great

A.D. 1483 great Love of your Country towards you ; I must needs think this Realm fortunate, that hath such a Prince in Store, meet and apt to be a Governour ; in whose Person consisteth the very undoubted Image of true Honour. And then taxing the present King with many Cruelties and Oppressions, he concluded, saying, And now, my Lord, if ever you love God, your Lineage, or your native Country, you must your self take upon you the Crown and Imperial Diadem of this Realm ; but if your self will refuse to take it upon you, I then adjure you, by the Faith you own to God, and by the Love you bear to your native Country, to devise some Way how this Realm may by your Princely Policy be reduced to some convenient Regiment, under some good Governour by you to be appointed : And if you could devise to set up again the Lineage of Lancaster, or advance the eldest Daughter of King Edward to some puissant Prince ; not only the new Crowned King should little enjoy the Glory of his Dignity, but all Civil War should cease, and Peace and Profit should again flourish. When the Bishop had ended his Saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a good while, which sore abashed the Bishop, and made him change Colour, which the Duke perceiving, he said, Be not afraid, my Lord, all Promises shall be kept ; so for that Time they parted. The next Day the Duke sent for the Bishop, and having rehearsed unto him the Communication had between them the Day before, he went on and said ; My Lord of Ely, since I perceive your true Heart, and sincere Affection toward me, I will now discover unto you all that hath passed my own Imaginations. After I had found the Dissimulation and Falseness of King Richard, and especially after I was informed of the Murder of the two young Princes, to which (God be my Judge) I never condescended, I so much abhorred the Sight, and much more the Company of him, that I could no longer abide in his Court ; but feigning a Cause to depart, I took my Leave of him (he thinking nothing less, than that I was displeased) and so returned to Brecknock to you ; but in that returning, whether it were by Inspiration, or else through some melancholick Disposition, I had divers Imaginations how to deprive this unnatural and bloody Butcher of his Royal Seat and Dignity. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take upon me the Crown, now was the Time, when this Tyrant was abhorred and detested of all Men ; and knowing not of any that could pretend Title before me : In this Imagination I rested two Days at Tewksbury ; in my Journey from thence, I mused and thought, that it was not best nor convenient to take upon me as a Conquerour, for then I was sure that all Men, and especially the Nobility, would oppose me ; but at last there sprung up a Branch in my Head, which I surely thought would have brought forth fair Flowers, but they turned indeed to dry Weeds ; for I suddenly remembered that the Lord Edmund Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather, was with King Henry the Sixth, in two or three Degrees of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster ; so that I thought certainly, my Mother being eldest Daughter to Duke Edmund, that I was next Heir to King Henry the Sixth, of the A.D. 1483 House of Lancaster. This Title pleased well such as I made of my Council, and much more it elevated my ambitious Intent : But while I was in Amaze, whether I were best suddenly to set this Title open amongst the common People, or else keep it secret a while, to see what chanced ; as I rode between Worcester and Bridgenorth, I met with the Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond, now Wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the Daughter and sole Heir to John Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather's elder Brother (which was as clean out of my Mind, as if I had never seen her) so that she, and her Son the Earl of Richmond, have both of them Titles before mine, and then I clearly saw how I was deceived ; whereupon I determined, utterly to relinquish all such fantastical Imaginations concerning the obtaining the Crown my self ; and found there could be no better Way to settle it in a true Establishment, than that the Earl of Richmond, very Heir of the House of Lancaster, should take to Wife the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward, the very Heir of the House of York ; so that the two Roses may be united in one ; and now, saith the Duke, I have told you my very Mind. When the Duke had said this, the Bishop was not a little glad, for this was the Mark he had himself aimed at ; and thereupon, after some Complements of extolling his Device, he said ; Since by your Grace's incomparable Wisdom, this noble Conjunction is now moved ; it is in the next Place necessary to consider, what Friends we shall first make privy of this Intention. By my Troth, quoth the Duke, we will begin with the Countess of Richmond, the Earl's Mother ; who knoweth where he is, either in Captivity, or at large in Britain. And thus was the Foundation laid of a League, by these two great Men, by which the Death of the two young Princes was fully revenged ; and it was not talked of only, but presently put in Execution ; for now is Reynold Bray employed by the Bishop, to his Mistress the Duchess of Richmond ; Doctor Lewis, the Duchess's Physician, was employed by her to the Queen Elizabeth ; Hugh Conway, and Thomas Rame, were employed to the Earl of Richmond, to acquaint them, but in most secret Manner, with the intended Plot, and to procure their Promises to the propounded Marriage, which was no hard Matter to make them all willing to their own Wishes. This done, Instruments are employed to draw in Parties to the Confederacy ; Bray, by his Credit, drew in Sir Giles Dawbeny, Sir John Cheyney, Richard Guildford, Thomas Rame, and others ; Ursewick likewise drew in Hugh Conway, Thomas Colepeper, Thomas Roper, with some others ; Doctor Lewis drew in Edward Courtney, and his Brother Peter Bishop of Exeter. It is memorable, that Thomas Conway being sent most part by Sea, and Thomas Rame most part by Land ; yet came to the Earl of Richmond in Britain, within the Space of little more than an Hour ; upon whose Information of the Plot, the Earl acquaints the Duke of Britain with it, who, though by Hutton, King Richard's Ambassador, he had by many great Offers been solicited to detain him in Prison, yet he both readily promised,

A.D. 1483 mised, and really performed, both his Advice and Aid to the Earl's Proceedings. In this mean Time Bishop Morton, not without asking the Duke's Leave, though without obtaining it, secretly, in Disguise, gets him into the Isle of Ely; and there having done the Earl good Offices by procuring of Friends, he thence passeth into Britain to him, from whence he returned no more, till afterward the Earl being King, sent for him home, and made him Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Duke of Buckingham sent for by K. Richard, refuseth to come.

But though all these Things were carried closely, and Oath taken by all for Secrecy, yet came it to King Richard's Knowledge; who notwithstanding dissembled it, sends for the Duke of Buckingham to come to him; and he putting off his coming with pretended Excuses, is at last peremptorily sent for to come upon his Allegiance, when he returned this resolute Answer; That he owed no Allegiance to such a perjured inhumane Butcher of his own Flesh and Blood; and so from that Time Preparation for Arms is made on both Sides. The Duke had gotten a good Power of Welsh-men, and the Marquess of Dorset having gotten out of Sanctuary, was labouring in Yorkshire to raise Forces; the like did the two Courtneys in Devonshire and Cornwal, and Guildford and Rame in Kent. King Richard setting forward with his Forces, the Duke of Buckingham doth the like, intending at Gloucester to have passed the Severn, and so to have joined with the two Courtneys; but such Abundance of Rain at that Time fell, that the Severn was broken out, and impossible to be passed over; which the Welsh-men seeing, and taking it for an ill Sign, they secretly slipt away; so as the Duke left well-near alone, without either Page, or so much as

The Duke of Buckingham betakes himself to the House of one Humfrey Bannister, near to Shrewsbury; who having been raised by him, and his Father before him, he thought himself safe under his Roof: But Bannister, upon Proclamation made by King Richard, that whosoever could apprehend the Duke, should have a thousand Pound for his Labour, like an ungrateful and perfidious Wretch, discovered him to John Mitton, High Sheriff of Shropshire, who took him in a pilled black Cloak, as he was walking in an Orchard behind the House, and carried him to Shrewsbury, where King Richard then lay, and there, without Arraignment, or legal Proceeding, he was in the Market-place beheaded. Whether Bannister received the proclaimed Reward from the Hand of the King, is uncertain; but certain it is, that he received the Reward of a Villain from the Hand of Divine Justice, for himself was afterward hanged for Man-slaughter, his eldest Daughter was deflowered by one of his Carters, as some say, stricken with a foul Leprosy; his eldest Son in a desperate Lunacy murdered himself, and was found to have done so, by the Coroner's Inquest; and his younger Son in a small Puddle was strangled and drowned.

And is beheaded.

The Judgment of God upon Bannister.

Upon this Disaster of the Duke of Buckingham, his Complices shifted for themselves, some taking Sanctuary, some keeping themselves in unknown Places, but many conveyed themselves into Britain to the Earl of Richmond; of whom the Marquess Dorset, John Lord Wells, A.D. 1483 the Bishop of Exeter, and his Brother Sir John Bouchier, Sir Edward Woodville, Brother to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir John Cheyney, and his two Brethren, Sir William Brackley, Sir William Brandon, and his Brother Thomas, Sir Richard Edgecome, Hollewel, and Poynings, Captains, were the chief. Whilst these Things are in doing, King Richard receives Intelligence from Hutton, his Ambassador Lierger in Britain, that the Duke not only refuseth to restrain the Earl of Richmond, but intendeth also to give him Assistance; whereupon the King took present Order for preparing his Navy to stop the Earl's landing in any Port of England. He apprehended also in divers Parts of the Realm, certain Gentlemen of the Earl of Richmond's Confederation; but coming himself to the City of Exeter, and to the Castle there, and understanding that it was called Rugemont, he suddenly fell into a Dump, as one astonished, said, Well, I see my Days be not long: He spake this of a Prophecy told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he should not live long after; which fell out to be true, not in respect of this Castle, but in respect of Henry Earl of Richmond.

Upon the twelfth Day of October, in the Year 1484, the Earl of Richmond, with forty Ships, and five thousand waged Britains, took to Sea; but that Evening, by Tempest of Weather, his whole Fleet was dispersed; so as only the Ship wherein the Earl himself was, with one little Bark, was driven upon the Coast of Cornwal; where discovering upon the Shore great Store of armed Soldiers to resist his Landing, he hoisted Sail, and returning toward France, arrived in Normandy; from whence sending Messengers to Charles the Eighth, King of France, he was by him not only kindly invited to come to his Court, but was aided also with good Sums of Money to bear his Charges. After this, the Earl returning into Britain, received there the News of the Duke of Buckingham's Death, and the dispersing of the Confederates Forces; with which, though he was at first much troubled, yet was he as much comforted afterward, when he saw the Marquess Dorset, and those other Lords and Captains come unto him: Soon after whose coming, upon Christmas Day, before the High Altar in the great Church of Rheims, the Earl of Richmond gave Oath, to marry the Lady Elizabeth, as soon as he should be quietly settled in the Government of England; and thereupon all the Lords and Knights there present did him Homage; and in the same Place each to other religiously vowed, taking the Sacrament upon it, never to cease prosecuting War against King Richard, till either his Deposition or Destruction.

He takes Oath to marry the Lady Elizabeth, King Edward's eldest Daughter.

King Richard being informed of these Things, makes diligent Enquiry after all such as might be suspected to be Favourers of Richmond's Association; of whom Sir George Brown, and Sir Roger Clifford, with four other Gentlemen, are apprehended and executed at London: Sir Thomas Sentleger, who married Anne, the Duke of Exeter's Widow, this King's own Sister, and Thomas Rame, Esq; were executed at Exeter. Thomas Marquess Dorset, and all such as were with

A.D. 1484 with the Earl of Richmond, were at a Parliament then holden attainted of Treason, and all their Goods and Lands seized on to the King's Use: Besides these, a poor Gentleman called Collingborn, for making a small Rhime of three of his wicked Counsellors; the Lord Lovel, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby (which Rhime was thus framed) was put to Death, and his Body divided into four Quarters.

At this Time a Truce is concluded betwixt England and Scotland, for three Years; and for settling a firmer Amity between the two Kingdoms, a Marriage is treated of between the Duke of Rothsay, eldest Son to the King of Scots, and the Lady Anne de la Pool, Daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne, Sister to King Richard: Which Sister he so much favoured, that after the Death of his own Son, who died some Time before, he caused John, Earl of Lincoln, her Son and his Nephew, to be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown of England.

King Richard seeks by great Gifts to have the Earl of Richmond delivered to him.

Which Plot the Earl escapes by Morton's Information, and in what Manner.

Peter Landois hanged.

The Earl having passed this Danger in Britain, and being arrived in France, addresseth himself to the French King, imploring his Aid; and hath it promised and performed: And in this Time John Vere Earl of Oxford, who had long Time been kept Prisoner in the Castle of Hammes, so far prevailed with James Blunt Captain of the Fortrefs, and Sir John Fortescue, Porter of the Town of Calais, that not only they suffered him to be at Liberty, but accompanied him also to the Earl of Richmond, to whom Captain Blunt gave Assurance that the Fortrefs remained wholly at his Devotion. At this Time also there resorted to the Earl, divers young Gentlemen that were Students in the University of Paris, proffering him their Service; amongst whom was Richard Fox, at that Time famous for his Learning; with whom afterward the Earl advised in all his Affairs, made him one of his most Privy-Council, and at last Bishop of Winchester.

Richard Fox made first known to the Earl of Richmond.

But now King Richard having been disappointed of his Design in Britain, hath another Way in his Head to disappoint the Earl of Richmond of his Marriage with the Daughter of Queen Elizabeth: And to this End, he sent to the Queen, being still in Sanctuary, divers Messengers, who should first excuse and purge him of all Things formerly attempted and done against her; and then should largely promise Promotions innumerable, not only to herself, but also to her Son, Lord Thomas, Marquess Dorset: By Force of which Promises the Messengers so prevailed with her, that not only she began to relent, but at last was content to submit herself wholly to the King's Pleasure. And thereupon putting in Oblivion the Murther of her innocent Children, the Butchering of her own Brother and Son, the Infamy of her Royal Husband, the Aspersions of Adultery cast upon herself, the Imputation of Bastardy laid to her Daughters; forgetting also her Oath made to the Earl of Richmond's Mother, seduced by flattering Words, she first delivered into King Richard's Hands her five Daughters, and after sent Letters to the Marquess her Son, being then at Paris with the Earl of Richmond; willing him by any Means to leave the Earl, and with all Speed to repair into England; where for him were provided great Honours and Promotions: Assuring him further, that all Offences on both Parts were forgotten and forgiven; and both he and she incorporated in the King's Favour. If we consider of this Credulity in the Queen, we may conceive she was moved with the two great Motives of Fear and Hope: She feared, no doubt, that if she denied the King's Request, he would presently take some sharp Course both against her and her Daughters; and she hoped that if she yielded to his Request, he would undoubtedly perform his Promise, seeing it was as easy for him to keep it as break it.

The Queen is brought to give her Consent.

But now King Richard's Purpose being to marry one of his Brother K. Edward's Daughters, there was one Impediment which directly hindered it, That he had a Wife living, and how to be rid of her, that he might not bring new Aspersions upon himself, he could not well tell: Yet this he resolved, that be rid of her 1485. King Richard rids himself of his present Wife, and by what Devices.

A.D. 1485 her he would by some Way or other : But before he would use Extremity, he would first try milder Ways, and first he abstained both from her Bed and Company, and complained to divers of her Barrenness ; which coming to her Ear, he hoped might cause her to die with Grief: And when this Device failed, he then caused a Rumour to be spread among the People, that she was suddenly dead, hoping the very Conceit thereof would kill her : When this Device also failed (for the Queen, hearing of it, and mistrusting the Worst, with a most sorrowful Countenance came unto him, demanding what she had done, that he should judge her worthy to die? Who answered with fair Words, bidding her be of good Cheer, for to his Knowledge she should have no other Cause) he then made sure Work, for within few Days after, whether by Poison, or by what other Means, it is not certainly known, she departed this Life ; and with all Solemnity, not without some formal Tears of King Richard, was interred in St. Peter's Church at Westminster.

He makes Love to the Lady Elizabeth.

King Richard now by his Wife's Death having made himself Way to marry another, useth all the alluring Means he can devise, to win the Love of the Lady Elizabeth his Niece ; but meaning at last to purchase his Desire by Rape, if he could not otherwise ; and had perhaps done it, but that the Storms threatned from beyond the Seas, growing every Day more strong than other, forced him to prorogue the Execution of his Desires, and look to the Prevention of his present Danger. The Lord Stanley is commanded presently to levy Forces for the King's Aid, as he will justify his Integrity to him ; but yet is not permitted to go down into the Country, until he had left George Lord Strange, his eldest Son, as a Pledge of his Loyalty behind him. And now King Richard being informed, though the Information was craftily suborned by his Enemies, that the Earl of Richmond was out of Hope of any great Assistance from France, discharged the Ships which he had appointed to guard the Seas, and likewise all the Soldiers ; only Order is given for diligent watching of the Beacons.

Which makes him hasten his coming over.

To whom many Lords and others come.

At this Time, one Morgan Kidwelly, a Student at the Inns of Court, with great Hazard of his Life passed over to the Earl, informing him, that King Richard by all Means laboured to match himself with the Lady Elizabeth ; which so wrought with the Earl, that he saw there was no Lingring : And the more, being by him further informed, that Rice ap Thomas and John Savage, two powerful Men in their Countries, were ready with great Forces to assist him : Whereupon, not having above two thousand Mercenaries, and but indifferent Shipping to convey him over, about the Middle of August he put to Sea, and by the Advice of the said Kidwelly, steered his Course for Wales, and on the seventeenth Day after his Departure from Harfleur, arrived at Milford-Haven ; and there landing his Forces without Trouble or Impeachment, from thence marched peaceably to Hereford, where by the Inhabitants he was joyfully received. Here he receives News by Captain Arnold Butler, that the Earl of Pembroke with all his Retinue was upon the Way to join with him ; also thither came to him Richard Griffith and John Morgan, with a Band of brave Welsh-men, and the same Day Sir Gilbert Talbot with all the Earl of Shrewsbury's Tenants, being about two thousand well appointed Men, came to him : With these he marched toward Shrewsbury ; at which Time Word is brought him, that Sir Robert Herbert and Rice ap Thomas were ready with a great Power to stop his Passage, which somewhat troubled him, that his Friends so suddenly should revolt : But it was a Trick of Rice ap Thomas, to make his Bargain the surer : For soon after, Rice ap Thomas meets him, and offers him his Service, so as the Earl will pledge his Faith to perform his Promise formerly made ; which was, that having once obtained the Crown, he would make Rice sole Governour of Wales ; which was now assented to, and afterward performed. At this Time the Lord Stanley with five thousand Men had taken up his Lodging at the Town of Leicester ; but hearing of the Earl's March that Way, he left Leicester, and went to Adderton, not daring to shew himself openly for the Earl, for Fear the King should put his Son, the Lord Strange, to Death, whom he had left an Hostage with him.

All this Time King Richard lay at Nottingham, and was as it were fatally taken with a Spirit of Security, hearing that the Earl had but small Assistance either from France or in England ; and therefore flighting him, as little able to do any greater Matter : But when he heard that Part of his own Forces was revolted to him, then he began to look about him, and sends present Direction to the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with Sir Thomas Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower, with all Speed to bring their Forces to him at Lutterworth ; from whence upon their Arrival, hearing that the Earl was encamped at Litchfield, he marched thitherward ; at which Time, Sir Walter Hungerford and some others, withdrew themselves from King Richard's Part ; and Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Stanford, and Sir Simon Digby, with their several Forces, joined with the Earl.

King Richard took the Advantage of a large Plain near Bosworth, where he encamped : And observing by his Adversaries Manner of Approach, that they meant to give him Battle, he the next Morning put his Forces in Order : The Vanguard was led by the Duke of Norfolk, which consisted of one thousand two hundred Bow-men, flanked with two hundred Cuyrassiers, under the Conduct of the Earl of Surrey : The Battel King Richard led himself, which consisted of a thousand Bill-men, empaled, with two thousand Pikes : The Rereward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled Weapons, with two Wings of Horsemen, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast into square Maniples, expecting the Lord Stanley's coming with two thousand, most of them Horse-men : But the Lord Stanley carried himself so warily, that he might neither give Cause of Suspicion to the King, nor yet Cause of Disadvantage to the Earl : That when early in the Morning the Earl sent unto him, desiring his Near to Bosworth their Armies meet : And how King Richard's Army was marshalled.

A.D. 1485 his present Repair, he answered, that he must look for no Aid from him, till the Battels should be joined; and therefore advised him, with all possible Speed to give the Onset. This Answer somewhat staggered the Earl, because his Number did but little exceed one Half of the King's: Yet to make the best Shew he could, by the Advice of his Council of War, he made his Vanguard open and thin; of which John Earl of Oxford had the Leading: The Earl himself led the Battel, Sir Gilbert Talbot commanding the right Wing, and Sir John Savage the left; whose Soldiers being all alike clad in white Coats and Hoods of Frize, by the Reflection of the Sun upon them, made them appear in the View of their Enemies, double the Number. The Rereward was governed by the Earl of Pembroke, which consisted most of Horse and some Pikes, and black Bills. King Richard, to encourage his Soldiers, made a solemn Speech to them: But, alas, what Hope could he have to put them in Heart, whose Hearts he had lost? or to raise Alacrity in others, who had none in himself? For now the Remembrance of his fore-passed Villainies, and specially, a fearful Dream he had the Night before (wherein it seemed to him, he saw divers Images like Devils, which pulled and haled him, not suffering him to take any Rest or Quiet) so damped his Spirits, that although he set a good Face upon the Matter, yet he could not choose but have a presaging Fear, that the Date of his Days was not far from expiring. The Earl of Richmond on the other Side, having a clear Conscience in himself, and speaking to Men that followed him for Love, had the easier Means to give them Encouragement; which he did with so chearful a Countenance, as though already he had gotten the Victory. After their military Exhortations ended, K. Richard commanded to give the Onset. Between both Armies there was a great Marsh; which the Earl left on his right Hand, that it might be a Defence for his Soldiers on that Side; and besides, by so doing he had the Sun at his Back, and in the Faces of his Enemy. When King Richard saw the Earl's Company was passed this Marsh, he commanded with all Speed to set upon them. Then were the Arrows let fly on both Sides, and those spent, they came to Hand-strokes; at which Encounter comes in the Lord Stanley, and joins with the Earl. The Earl of Oxford in the mean Time, fearing lest his Company should be compassed in with the Multitude of his Enemies, gave Charge in every Rank, that no Man should go above ten Foot from the Standard; whereupon they knit themselves together, and ceased a while from Fighting; which the Enemy seeing, and mistrusting some Fraud, they also paused and left striking. But then the Earl of Oxford having brought all his Band together, set on the Enemy afresh; which the Enemy perceiving, they placed their Men slender and thin before, but thick and broad behind; and resolutely again began the Fight. While these two Vanguards were thus contending, King Richard was informed, that the Earl of Richmond, with a small Number, was not far off; whereupon he presently makes towards him; and being of an invincible Courage, whereof he was now to give the last Proof, he made so furious an Assault, that first with his own Hands he slew Sir William Brandon, who bore the Earl's Standard; next he unhorsed and overthrew Sir John Cheyney, a strong and stout Man at Arms, and then assaulted the Earl of Richmond himself, who (though no Man would have thought it, yet) for all the King's Fury held him off at his Launce's Point, till Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand fresh Men; and then oppressed with Multitude, King Richard is there slain. It is said, that when the Battel was at the Point to be lost, a swift Horse was brought unto him, with which he might have saved himself by Flight, but out of his undaunted Courage he refused it, saying, he would that Day make an End of all Battels, or else lose his Life. In this Battel Henry Earl of Northumberland, who led King Richard's Rereward, never struck Stroke; as likewise many other, who followed King Richard more for Fear than Love: And so King Richard, who had deceived many in his Time, was at this Time deceived by many; which was not unforeseen by some, who caused a Rhyme to be set upon the Duke of Norfolk's Gate the Night before the Battel, which was this:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dicken thy Master is bought and sold.

Yet notwithstanding this Warning, the noble Duke continued firm to King Richard; and more considering what he was towards him than what towards others, followed him at the last, and in his Quarrel lost his Life. This John Howard was the Son of Sir Robert Howard, Knight, and Margaret, eldest Daughter of Thomas Mowbrey, Duke of Norfolk, in whose Right he was created Duke of Norfolk by K. Richard the Third, in the Year 1483, having been made a Baron before by King Edward the Fourth. The whole Number slain in this Battel on King Richard's Part, was not above a thousand Persons; whereof, of the Nobility, besides the Duke of Norfolk, only Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brakenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby, one of the chief Counsellors of King Richard, with divers others, was two Days after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst those that ran away, were Francis, Viscount Lovel, Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his Brother, who took Sanctuary in Saint John's at Gloucester. Of Captives and Prisoners there were great Numbers. Henry, Earl of Northumberland, who though on King Richard's Side, intermeddled not in the Battel, was incontinently taken into Favour, and made of the Council: But Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey, though he submitted himself, yet, as having been specially familiar with King Richard, was committed to the Tower, where he remained a long Time, but at last was delivered and highly promoted. On the Earl of Richmond's Part were slain scarce an hundred Persons (some say but ten) of whom the principal was Sir William Brandon, the Earl's Standard-bearer. This Battel was fought at Rodmor, near Bosworth in Leicestershire, the two and twentieth King Richard encounters the Earl of Richmond Hand to Hand.

John Howard, Duke of Norfolk, firm to King Richard to the last.

A.D. 1485 Day of August, in the Year 1485, having continued little above two Hours. Presently after the Battel, the Earl Knighted in the Field, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Poynts, Sir Humfrey Stanley, Sir John Turbervile, Sir Hugh Pershal, Sir R. Edgecomb, Sir John Pykenil, and Sir Edmund Carew; and then kneeling down, he rendered to Almighty God his hearty Thanks for the Victory he had obtained, and commanded all the Hurt and Maimed Persons to be cured; whereat the People rejoicing, clapped their Hands, and cried, King Henry! King Henry! Which Good-will and Gladness of the People, when the Lord Stanley saw, he took the Crown of King Richard, which was found amongst the Spoils in the Field, and set it on the Earl's Head, as though he had been elected King by the Voice of the People. It may not be forgotten, that when King Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent to the Lord Stanley to come presently to his Presence; which if he refused to do, he swore by Christ's Passion, that he would strike off his Son's Head before he dined; whereto the Lord Stanley answered, That if he did so, he had more Sons alive, and he might do his Pleasure; but to come to him, he was not then determined. Which Answer, when King Richard heard, he commanded the Lord Strange immediately to be Beheaded; but being at the very Time when both Armies were in Sight of each other, his Lords persuaded him, it was now Time to fight, and not to put to Execution; and so the Lord Strange escaped.

The Lord Stanley takes the Crown from King Richard's Head, and puts it on the Earl of Richmond.

Of his Taxations.

WE must not look for Taxations in Kind in this King's Reign; for he drew from his Subjects not Money so much as Blood; and the Money he drew was most by Blood, which drew on Confiscations; whereof let never any Prince make a Precedent; for where Taxations properly do but tondere, these did deglubere. Yet in his second Year, he called a Parliament, wherein, besides the great Confiscations of those that were then attainted, he imposed upon the People a great Tax, which what it was, is not recorded.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HAVING gotten the Crown by pestilent Courses, he sought to establish it by wholesome Laws; for in no King's Reign were better Laws made, than in the Reign of this Man. Amongst others of his Laws, it was enacted, That from thenceforth the Commonalty of the Realm should in no wise be charged by any Imposition called a Benevolence, nor any such like Charge; and that such Actions called a Benevolence, before this Time taken, should be taken for no Example to make any such like Charge hereafter; but shall be damned and annulled for ever. Many other good Laws were by him made; that we may say he took the Ways of being a good King, if he had come to be a King by Ways that had been good.

No Benevolence to be required.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN his Time the Troubles of the Temporality A.D. 1485 kept the Clergy at quiet; and though there were Complaining in the Streets, there was none in the Church. Only Shore's Wife might complain, why she should do Penance for offending lightly against only the Seventh Commandment, and King Richard do none for offending heavily against all the Ten, but that perhaps he had gotten some good Fellow to be his Confessor.

Works of Piety done by him.

AS bad as this King was, yet some good Works he did; he founded a College at Middleham beyond York; and a Collegiate-Chantry in London, near unto the Tower, called our Lady of Barking: He endowed the Queen's College in Cambridge, with five hundred Marks of yearly Revenue, and disforested the great Field of Wichwood, which King Edward his Brother had enclosed for Deer.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his second Year, at the Time when the Duke of Buckingham meant to pass with his Army over Severn, there was so great an Inundation of Water, that Men were drowned in their Beds, Houses were overturned, Children were carried about the Fields swimming in Cradles, Beasts were drowned on Hills; which Rage of Water continued ten Days, and was a long Time in the Countries thereabout, called the Great Water, or the Duke of Buckingham's Water. A great Inundation, called the Duke of Buckingham's Water.

Of his Wife and Issue.

HE married Anne, the second Daughter of Richard Nevil, the Great Earl of Warwick, being the Widow of Edward Prince of Wales, the Son of K. Henry the Sixth: She lived his Wife to the last Year of his Reign; and then, to make Way for another, was brought to her End, and laid at rest in the Abby of Westminster: By her he had only one Son, born at Middleham, near Richmond in the County of York; at four Years old, created Earl of Salisbury by his Uncle King Edward the Fourth; at ten Years old created Prince of Wales by his Father King Richard, but died soon after.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

THERE never was in any Man a greater Uniformity of Body and Mind, than was in him; both of them equally deformed. Of Body he was but low, Crooked-back'd, Hook-shouldered, Splay-footed, and Goggle-eyed; his Face little and round, his Complexion swarthy, his left Arm from his Birth dry and withered; born a Monster in Nature, with all his Teeth, with Hair on his Head, and Nails on his Fingers and Toes: And just such were the Qualities of his Mind. One Quality he had in ordinary, which was, to look fawningly when he plotted, sternly when he executed. Those Vices, which in other Men are Passions, in him were Habits; and his

A.D. 1485 and his Cruelty was not upon Occasion, but natural. If at any Time he shewed any Virtue, it was but Pretence; the Truth of his Mind was only Lying and Falshood. He was full of Courage, and yet not valiant; Valour consisting not only in doing, but as well in suffering, which he could not abide. He was politick, and yet not wise; Policy looking but to the Middle, Wisdom to the End; which he did, and did not. And it was not so much Ambition that made him desire the Crown, as Cruelty; that it might be in his Power to kill at his Pleasure: And to say the Truth, he was scarce of the Number of Men who consist of Flesh and Blood, being nothing but Blood. One Miracle we may say he did; which was, that he made the Truth of History to exceed the Fiction of Poetry, being a greater Harpy than those that were feigned. He would fain have been accounted a good King, but for his Life he could not be a good Man; and it is an impossible Thing to be one without the other. He left no Issue behind him: And it had been Pity he should, at least in his own Image; one such Monster was enough for many Ages.

Of his Death and Burial.

K. Richard bafely ufed
being dead.

BEing slain in the Battel at Bosworth, as before is related, his Body was left naked and de spoiled to the very Skin, not so much as a Clout left about him to cover his Privy-parts: And taken up, was trussed behind a Pursuivant at Arms, one Blanch Senglier, or White-Boar; his Head and Arms hanging on one Side of the Horse, and his Legs on the other; and all besprinkled with Mire and Dirt; he was brought to the Grey-Friers Church within the Town of

Leicester, and there for some Time lay a miserable Spectacle; and afterward, with small Funeral Pomp, was there interred. But after this, K. Henry VII. caused a Tomb to be made and set up over the Place where he was buried, with a Picture of Alabaster, representing his Person, which, at the Suppression of that Monastery, was utterly defaced: Since when, his Grave overgrown with Nettles and Weeds, is not to be found; only the Stone Chest, wherein his Corpse lay, was made a Drinking-Trough for Horses at a common Inn in Leicester, and retained the only Memory of this Monarch's Greatness. But his Body, as is reported, was carried out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed under the End of Bow-bridge, which giveth Passage over a Branch of Stowre, upon the West-side of the Town. Upon this Bridge (the like Report runneth) stood a Stone of some Height; against which King Richard, as he passed toward Bosworth, by Chance struck his Spur: And against the same Stone, as he was brought back, hanging by the Horse-side, his Head was dashed and broken, as a wise Woman, forsooth, had foretold; who, before his going to Battel, being asked of his Success, said, That where his Spur struck, his Head should be broken. But these are but Reports. He had lived seven and thirty Years, reigned two, and two Months.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

OF Men of Note for Wickedness and Villainy, enough hath been mentioned in the Body of the Story: And for Men of Valour and Learning, they will fitter be placed in a better King's Reign.

Mayors and Sheriffs of London in this King's Reign.

In his first Year,

SIR Robert Billeston was Mayor.
Thomas Newland, William Martin, Sheriffs.

In his second Year,

Sir Thomas Hill was Mayor.
Richard Chester; and he dying, Raphe Austrie, Thomas Britaine, Sheriffs.

Richard*, is by publick Acclamations saluted King of England, on the 22d Day of August, in the Year 1485, and this was his first Title. And now, to take away a Root of Danger, before his Departure from Leicester, he sent Sir Robert Willoughby to the Castle of Sheriffshaton in the County of York, for Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence, being then of the Age of fifteen Years, whom K. Richard had there kept a Prisoner all his Time; who was thence conveyed to London, and shut up in the Tower to be kept in safe Custody. In the same Castle also K. Richard had left residing the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to K. Edward IV. And her now K. Henry appoints honourably attended to be brought up to London, and to be delivered to the Queen her Mother. This done, he took his Journey towards London; where, at his approaching near the City, Thomas Hill the Mayor, Thomas Britain, and Richard Chester, Sheriffs, with other principal Citizens, met him at Shoreditch, and in great State brought him to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, where he offered three Standards: In the one was the Image of St. George; in the other was a red, fiery Dragon, beaten upon white and green Sarlener; in the third was painted a Dun-Cow, upon yellow Tartern. After Prayers said, he departed to the Bishop's Palace, and there sojourned a Season: And in the Time of his Stay here, he advised with his Council, and appointed a Day for solemnizing his Marriage with the Lady Elizabeth: Before which Time notwithstanding he went by Water to Westminster, and was there with great Solemnity Anointed and Crowned King of England, by the whole Consent as well of the Commons, as of the Nobility, by the Name of Henry VII. on the 30th Day of October, in the Year 1485; and this was his second Title. And even this was revealed to Cadwallader, last King of the Britains, seven hundred ninety and seven Years past;

That his Offspring should Reign and bear Dominion in this Realm again.

On the 17th Day of November following, he called his High Court of Parliament; where, at the first Sitting, two Scruples appeared; one concerning the Burgeses, for that many had been returned Burgeses and Knights of Shires, who by a Parliament in King Richard's Time stood attainted still; and it was thought incongruous for Men to make Laws, who were themselves outlawed: For Remedy whereof an Act was presently passed for their restoring, and then they were admitted to sit in the House. The other concerning the King himself, who had been attainted by K. Richard: But for this it was resolved by all the Judges in the Chequer-Chamber, That the Possession of the Crown takes away all Defects; yet for Honour's sake, all Records of his Attainder were taken off the File: And so these Scruples thus removed, the Parliament began, wherein were attainted first, Richard late Duke of Gloucester, calling himself Richard III. Then his Assistants at the Battel of Bosworth; John late Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Earl of Surrey, Francis Viscount Lovel, Walter Devereux, late Lord Ferrers, John Lord Zouch, Robert Harington, Richard Charleton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berley of Wely, Robert Middleton, James Harington, Robert Brakenbury, Thomas Pilkington, Walter Hopton, William Catesby, Roger Wake, William Sapcote, Humfrey Stafford, William Clark of Wenlock, Jeffry St. Germain, Richard Watkins, Herald at Arms, Richard Sevel, Thomas Putter, John Welsh, John Kendal, late Secretary to the late King Richard, John Buck, Andrew Rat, and William Brampton of Burford. But notwithstanding this Attainder, divers of the Persons aforesaid were afterwards not only by K. Henry pardoned, but restored also to their Lands and Livings. As likewise he caused Proclamation to be made, That whosoever would submit themselves, and take Oath to be true Subjects, should have their Pardon. Whereupon many came out of Sanctuaries and other Places, who submitting themselves, were received to Mercy.

Besides, in this Parliament an Act was made, for settling the Crown upon the Person of King Henry and the Heirs of his Body successively for ever: And then with all Speed he sent and redeemed the Marquis Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left Hostages in France for Money; and called Home Morton Bishop of Ely, and Richard Fox, making Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, and Bishop of Exeter. Besides these, he made also of his Privy Council, Jasper Duke of Bedford, John Earl of Oxford, Thomas Stanley, E. of Derby, John Bishop of Ely, Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain of his Household; Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brook, Lord Steward of his Household; Giles Lord Daubeny; John Lord Dynham, after made Lord Treasurer of England; Sir Reynold Bray, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Richard Guildford, Sir Richard Tunstall, Sir Richard Edgecomb, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Edmund Poynings, Sir John Risley, with some other.

Morton is made Archbishop of Canterbury, Fox is made Lord Privy-Seal.

1486. King Henry marries the Lady Elizabeth.

The King's Guard first ordained.

A violent Sickness in London, and the Remedy.

These Things thus done, as well in performance of his Oath, as to make the Crown fit the surer on his Head, on the eighteenth Day of January he proceeded to the solemnizing his Marriage with the Lady Elizabeth; which gave him a third Title: And indeed this Conjunction made a Wreath of three so indissoluble, that no Age since hath ever questioned it; and it is fix'd upon a Tree planted so happily by the Waterside, and hath at this Day so many flourishing Branches, that there is good Hope it will continue as long as the World endures.

And now whether King Henry doubted any sudden Attempt upon his Person, or whether he did it to follow the Example of France; in the very Beginning of his Reign he ordained a Band of tall personable Men to be attending upon him, which was called the King's Guard; which no King before, and all Kings since have always used: But though he provided a Guard for Defence of his own Body, yet for the Bodies of his People he could provide none; for at this Time a Sickness (of the Symptom called the Sweating-sickness) seized so violently upon them, that within a short Time many thousands perished; particularly in London, two Mayors successively, and six Aldermen within eight Days died: And for this Sickness no Physick afforded any Cure; till at last this Remedy was found: If a Man were taken with the Sweat in the Day-time, that then he should presently lie down in his Cloaths, and so lie still the whole four and twenty Hours; if he were taken in the Night, then he should not rise out of his Bed for the Space of four and twenty Hours; not provoking Sweat, nor yet eating or drinking at all, at least but very moderately. In this Sickness there was one good Circumstance, that though it were violent, yet it lasted not long: For beginning about the one and twentieth of September, it cleared up before the End of October following.

And now all Things being set in good Order A.D. 1486 in the South Parts, there ariseth a little Storm in the North, but was soon dispersed. For King Henry making a Journey into the North Parts, to shew himself there where he had not yet been, and where the Respect to King Richard might have left some Opposites; at his Coming to Lincoln, was certified that the Lord Lovel and Humfrey Stafford were gone out of The Lord Lovel raiseth an Army against the King, but upon Proclamation of Pardon is dispersed. Sanctuary in Colchester; but whither, no Man knew. The King therefore not much regarding it, went forward to York; and being come thither, it was then plainly told him, That the Lord Lovel with a strong Power was at Hand, and would presently invade the City. This made the King in a great Strait; for neither had he any Army ready, nor if he had Men, had he any Weapons or Munition for them. Yet in this Strait, he commanded the Duke of Bedford, with three thousand Men to set out against him; but so ill armed, that their Armour for the most part were but of tanned Leather: Who being come near the Camp of the Rebels, caused Proclamation to be made, That whosoever would submit themselves as Loyal Subjects, should have their Pardons, and be received into Grace. Which Proclamation so prevailed, that it made the Lord Lovel secretly in the Night to flee away; and then the Army, left without a Head, submitted themselves to the King's Mercy. The Lord Lovel fled into Lancashire, and there for a Time lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton, a Man powerful in those Parts. Humfrey Stafford took Sanctuary in a Village called Culham, two Miles from Abingdon: But the Sanctuary being judged, by the Justices of the King's Bench, to be no lawful Defence for Traitors, he was taken from thence by Force, and conveyed to the Tower, afterward to Tyburn, and there hanged. His Brother Thomas was pardoned, because it was thought he was drawn in by his Brother Humfrey.

A Sanctuary no Defence for Traitors.

In this Year John Persival the Mayor of London's Carver, waiting at his Table, was chosen one of the Sheriffs of London, only by Sir Henry Collet, then Mayor, drinking to him in a Cup of Wine, as the Custom is to drink to him whom he list to name Sheriff, and forthwith the said Persival sat down at the Mayor's Table, and covered his Head, and was afterward Mayor himself.

The Mayor's Carver chosen Sheriff of London, and by what Occasion.

At this Time a mean Instrument attempted a great Work; by which we may see how far Imaginations may out-go Reason. One Richard Simonds a Priest, a Man of base Birth, though some Learning, had a Scholar of baser Birth, the Son of a Shoemaker (some say a Baker) named Lambert Symnel; but of a pregnant Wit, and comely Personage: Him he gives out to be Edward Earl of Warwick, lately, as was said, escaped out of Prison, both of them being of like Years and Stature: With this Scholar of his, he sails into Ireland, and so sets forth the Matter, that not only the Lord Thomas Fitzgerrard, Earl of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland, but many other of the Nobility gave Credit to his Words; and as those that affected the House of York were ready to take his Part, and even already saluted the young Symnel King: Withal they sent into Flanders to the Lady Margaret,

A.D. 1486 Sifter to the late King Edward, and Widow of Charles Duke of Burgoigne, requiring Aid and Assistance from her. This Lady being of the House of York, bore an inward Grudge against King Henry, being of the House of Lancaster; and therefore, though she well understood it was but a coloured Matter, yet was willing to take Advantage of it: And thereupon promised her Assistance. King Henry being advertised of these Things, advised with his Council, by whom it was agreed, that two Things presently should be done. First, to grant a Pardon to any that would submit themselves, for any Offence whatsoever, though it were for High-Treason. The next, that the Earl of Warwick should be openly shewed abroad in the City, and other publick Places; whereby, the Report spread abroad of his being in Ireland, might appear plainly to be false. Withal, the Queen

By the Plot of the Earl of Lincoln and the Lady Margaret, Symnel is conveyed into Ireland, and there Crowned King of England.

Elizabeth, Widow of King Edward the Fourth, and Mother to the present Queen, was adjudged to forfeit all her Lands and Possessions, and to live confined in the Abby of Bermondsey in Southwark; where in great Penitiveness within a few Years she died. But for what Cause this Severity was used against this Queen, is not altogether certain: To say, as was commonly said, that it was for rendring her self and her Daughters into the Hands of King Richard, were manifest Injustice, to punish her for doing a Thing out of Fear, which else she should have been compelled to do by Force: And to say, as some also have said, that it was for giving Aid under-hand to Perkin, were a manifest Unlikelihood, that she should aid a Counterfeit against her own Son in Law. We must therefore content our selves with knowing the bare colourable Pretext, and leave the true Reason as a Secret of State. But this shewing abroad of the true Earl of Warwick, though it satisfied some, yet not all; for some gave out that it was but a Trick of the King, and not the true Warwick. At least the Earl of Lincoln, Son to John de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Sifter to King Edward the Fourth, would not omit to take the Advantage, though he knew that Symnel was a Counterfeit. And thereupon, as soon as the Parliament was dissolved, he fled secretly into Flanders, to his Aunt the Lady Margaret, Duchesse of Burgoigne; between whom it was concluded, that he and the Lord Lovel should go into Ireland, and there attend upon the Counterfeit Warwick, and honour him as a King, and with the Power of the Irish-men bring him into England: But it was concluded withal, that if their Actions succeeded, then the Counterfeit Warwick should be deposed, and the True be delivered out of Prison, and Anointed King. And to this Purpose the Earl of Lincoln, by the Help of the Lady Margaret, had gotten together two thousand Almains, with one Martin Swart, a valiant and expert Captain, to be their Leader. With this Power the Earl sailed into Ireland, and at the City of Dublin, caused young Lambert, the Counterfeit Warwick, in most solemn Manner, first to be proclaimed, and after to be Crowned King of England; and then with a great Number of beggarly and unarmed Irish-men, under the Conduct of the Lord Thomas

Gerardine Earl of Kildare, they sailed into England, and landed at a Place called the Pile of Fowdray, not far from Lancaster; hoping there, by the Means of Sir Thomas Broughton, a powerful Man in that Country, to have their Army both furnished and encreased. King Henry hearing that the Earl of Lincoln was landed at Lancaster, assembled a great Army, conducted by the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford; and with these he marched to Nottingham, and there by a little Wood called Bowres, he pitched his Field; whether there came unto him the Lord George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Strange, Sir John Cheyney, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen, in which meantime the Earl of Lincoln being entred into Yorkshire, passed quietly on his Journey, without doing Spoil or Hurt unto any; trusting thereby to have won the People to come to his Aid; but when he perceived few or none to resort unto him, he then determined to venture a Battel with the Army he had already; and thereupon took his Way from York to Newark upon Trent. King Henry understanding which Way he took, came the Night before the Battel to Newark; and going three Miles further, near to a Village called Stoke, there waited the Approach of the Earl of Lincoln; so the next Day they joined Battel; where, after a long Fight of at least three Hours; though the Almains, and specially their Captain Martin Swart, behaved themselves most valiantly; yet their Irish, being in a Manner but naked Men, were at last overthrown, four thousand slain, and the rest put to Flight, but not one of their Captains; for the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Lovel, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and the Lord Gerardine, were all found dead in the very Place where they had stood fighting; that though they lost the Battel, yet they won the Reputation of hardy and stout Soldiers. Only of the Lord Lovel, some report, that attempting to save himself by Flight, in passing over the River of Trent, he was drowned. On the King's Part, though some were slain, yet not any Man of Note. This Battel was fought on a Saturday (observed as always fortunate to King Henry) being the sixteenth of June, in the second Year of King Henry's Reign. The young Lambert and his Master Simond the Priest, were both taken, and both had their Lives saved: Lambert, because but a Child, Simond, because a Priest; yet Simond was kept in Prison, Lambert was taken into the King's Kitchen, to turn the Spit in the Turn of his Fortune, and at last made one of the King's Faulknors.

In the Beginning of his third Year, King Henry having been in Yorkshire, to settle the Minds of that People, about the Midst of August came to Newcastle upon Tyne, and from thence sent Ambassadors into Scotland, Richard Fox, lately before made Bishop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgecomb Comptroller of his House, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James King of Scots: A Peace by Reason of the Peoples Backwardness, could not be obtained; but a Truce was concluded for the Term of seven Years; with a Promise from the King, that it should be renewed before the first seven Years should be expired.

A Truce for seven Years between K. Henry and the King of Scots.

A.D. 1488

At this Time Ambassadors came from the King of France to King Henry, who declared, that their Master King Charles was now at War with Francis Duke of Britain, for that he succoured the Duke of Orleans, and other Rebels, against the Realm of France; and therefore requested, that for the old Familiarity that had been between them, he would either assist him, or not assist the Duke, but stand neuter. King Henry answered, That having received Courtesies from them both, he would do his uttermost Endeavour to make them Friends: And to that End, as soon as the French Ambassadors were departed, he sent Christopher Urswike his Chaplain over into France, who should first go to the French King, and after to the Duke of Britain, to mediate a Peace between them.

Q. Elizabeth is Crowned.

In the Time of Urswike's Ambassage, King Henry caused his Wife the Lady Elizabeth to be Crowned Queen on St. Katharine's Day, in November, with all Solemnity; and at the same Time delivered the Lord Thomas, Marquess Dorset, out of the Tower, and received him again into his former Favour.

A Peace between France and England.

Urswike travelled between the two Princes to procure a Peace; but they, though making a Shew to incline to Peace, yet prepared for War, and Offers on neither Side would be accepted. In which Time Edward Lord Woodville, Uncle to the Queen, made Suit to the King, for Leave to go over with a Power of Men, in Aid to the Duke of Britain; which Suit, though the King denied, yet the Lord Woodville would venture it, and with a Power of four hundred able Men, got secretly over, and joined with the Britains against the French. This the French King took ill at King Henry's Hand; but being informed that it was against the King's Will, he seemed satisfied, and a Peace was concluded between France and England, to endure for twelve Months. But in Conclusion, King Henry finding that the French King dealt not really with him, but only held him on with Pretences, he called his High Court of Parliament, requiring their Advice, what was fit to be done; where it was concluded, that the Duke of Britain should be aided; and to that End great Sums of Money were by Parliament granted. This Determination of the Parliament King Henry signifies to the French King, hoping it would have wrought him to some Terms of Peace. But the King of France little regarding it, proceeded on in his violent Courses against the Britains, so at last, on the 28th Day of July, the Britains gave Battel to the French near to a Town called St. Aubyn, having apparelled seventeen hundred of the Britains in Coats with red Crosses, after the English Fashion, to make the French-men believe they were all English, although indeed they had no more English than the four hundred of the Lord Woodville's. But notwithstanding this Device, the Victory fell to the French; so that almost all the English-men were slain, with the Lord Woodville himself, besides six thousand Britains. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange, who were on the Britain's Part, were taken Prisoners. The French lost twelve hundred Men, and amongst other, that valiant Italian Captain, James Galeazzo.

The King of France overthrows the Duke of Britain's Army, where the Lord Woodville is slain.

This News being brought into England, A.D. 1488 caused K. Henry to make Haste to send forth his Army; and thereupon the Lord Brook, with Sir John Cheyney, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lacon, and Sir Edmund Cornwall, are sent over with all Speed into Britain, having with them eight thousand Men, to aid the Duke of Britain against the French. But while this War was thus set forward, the Duke of Britain died, leaving, in Effect, one only Daughter, the Lady Anne (for the other, being the younger, died soon after) and then the chief Rulers of Britain falling at Dissention amongst themselves, little regarded the Defence of the Country: Whereupon the English returned home within five Months after their setting forth; and the French King getting the upper Hand of the Britains, and marrying the Lady Anne, sole Daughter to the Duke of Britain, incorporated that Duchy to the Crown of France.

K. Henry sends an Army to aid the Duke of Britain.

The French King marries the Heir of the Duke of Britain.

In the last Parliament a Subsidy was granted for the furnishing out an Army into Britain; and it was agreed, that every Man should be taxed after the Rate of his Substance, to pay the tenth Penny of his Goods: Which Tax the most Part of Yorkshire and the Bishoprick of Durham refused to pay; whereof the Collectors complained to Henry Earl of Northumberland, President of the North-parts: The Earl signifies it to the King, and the King commands him to levy the same by Distress or otherwise (without sparing of any) as he should think most meet. The rude Multitude hearing of this Command from the King, with great Violence set upon the Earl, by the exciting of a simple Fellow named John a Chamber; and alledging all the Fault to be in the Earl, as chief Author of the Tax, they cruelly murdered both him and divers of his Household-Servants. And to make good their seditious Fact, they assembled a great Number, and made one Sir John Egremont their Captain; declaring, That in Defence of their Liberties they would bid the King Battel. In this Bravery they stood, as long as none opposed them; but when Thomas Earl of Surrey appeared with an Army, though they skirmished a while, yet they were soon discomfited, and their Ring-leader John a Chamber was taken, and at York on a Gibbet, set upon a square Pair of Gallows, like an Arch-Traitor, was hanged, and many of his Complices on a lower Gallows; the innocent People for the most part pardoned. But Sir John Egremont fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret Duchess of Burgundy, the common and sure Refuge for all Rebels against K. Henry. After this, the King appointed Sir Richard Tunstall to gather the Subsidy, and would not spare the Payment of a Penny. This Year, notwithstanding this Tax, the King borrowed of every Alderman of London two hundred Pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eighty two Pounds, seventeen Shillings and four Pence, which was paid again at the Time with great Thankfulness; which he did at a Time he needed not, to the End, perhaps, he might do it another Time, when he needed.

The Earl of Northumberland is slain in collecting the Subsidy.

John a Chamber Ring-leader of the Insurrection is hanged.

At this Time James III. King of Scotland, having by some Errors of Government incurred the Hatred of his Nobility and People, laboured with

A.D. 1489 with King Henry, as also with the Pope, and the King of France, to make an Accord between him and his People; who had compelled Prince James his Son to be the Titular Head of those Arms which they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their Mediations by Ambassadors, but could receive no other but this outrageous Answer, That there was no talking of Peace, unless he would resign his Crown. Which Answer the Kings protested against, declaring by their Ambassadors, that they thought it a common Injury to themselves, and that the Example was not sufferable for Subjects to lift their Hands against their Sovereign. Hereupon it came to a Battel at Bannocksborn by Strivelin; where King James, rashly beginning the Fight before his whole Forces were come, was (notwithstanding the contrary Commandment of the Prince his Son) slain in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the Battel ended.

James King of Scots in a Battel at Bannocksborn is slain.

About this Time a Difference fell out, which grew to a War, between the Emperor Frederick, and some Towns of his in Flanders, especially Ghent and Bruges. In this War the Lord Ravenstein, a principal Person about Maximilian, not only forsook the Emperor and his Son Maximilian his Lord (corrupted, as was thought, from France) but made himself Head of the popular Party, seizing upon the Towns of Ypres and Sluys; and not this only, but forthwith sent to the Lord de Cordes, Governor for the French King in Picardy, to aid him against some Towns in Flanders: To which the Lord de Cordes, willing of any Occasion to set Foot in Flanders, was easily drawn. But King Henry not liking to have the French so near his English Pale, sent over the Lord Morley with a thousand Men, who should join with the Lord Daubeny, then Deputy of Calais, to resist them. Amongst other Acts by them performed, this was chief, That the Lord Daubeny, with the Lord Morley, Sir James Tyrrel, Captain of Guisnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and Sir Humfrey Talbot, Marshal of Calais, and others, to the Number of two thousand, issued secretly one Night out of Calais, and came to Nieuport, and from thence to Dixmude, where the Lord Daubeny commanded all Men to send back their Horses; which the Lord Morley only refusing to do, was the Cause that he only of all the Captains was slain with a Gun; for the rest, after their Arrows discharged, fell prostrate to the Ground; by which Means the Enemies Ordinance over-shot them, killing only the Lord Morley that was on Horse-back. Here they slew of the Enemy to the Number of eight thousand; of the English Part was slain the Lord Morley, and not above a hundred more. This Victory so enriched the English, that they who went forth in Cloth, came home in Silk; and they who went out on Foot, returned back on Horse-back. Upon this Defeat, the Lord de Cordes lying at Ypres with twenty thousand, and thinking to be revenged, besieged the Town of Nieuport, and so strongly assaulted it, that one Day his Men entred, and set up his Banner upon a Tower of the Town, when suddenly a Bark arriving with only fourscore fresh English Archers, so terrified them, thinking their Number to be far greater, that the French were glad to leave their Banner behind them, and give over the Assault; and the Night following the Lord de Cordes (who so much longed for Calais, that he would commonly say, he would be content to lie seven Years in Hell, so that Calais were in the Possession of the French) broke up his Siege, and returned to Hesdin with as much Shame, as the English to Calais with Honour.

A little before this Time, Francis Duke of Britain dying, left only one Daughter, the Lady Anne, affianced to Maximilian King of the Romans, and in so solemn a Manner, that she taking upon her to be the Bride, and being laid in her Bed, was contented to permit Maximilian's Deputy, in Presence of many noble Witnesses, as well Men as Women, to put his Leg, stripped naked to the Knee, between the Spousal-Sheets, accounting that Ceremony to amount to the Consummation. The King of France likewise had been contracted to the Lady Margaret, Daughter to the foresaid Maximilian, and had received her to that End: Yet all this, notwithstanding, out of a violent Desire to join the Duchy of Britain to the Crown of France, he disannulled and made void both the Contracts. But to the End he might do it without Opposition of the King of England, he sent Ambassadors, the Lord Francis of Lutsemburgh, Charles Marignan, and Robert Gaguin, to King Henry, partly to conclude a Peace, but chiefly to procure King Henry's good Will to make void the foresaid Contracts: To which, though King Henry was not willing to give Consent, yet he consented willingly to have a Treaty for Peace; and to that End, sent over Thomas Earl of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenstone, Prior of Christ-Church in Canterbury, to the French King about it. But during this Treaty, and before Conditions of Peace could be agreed on, the French King had gotten into his Possession the Lady Anne of Britain, and solemnly married her. Which under-hand Dealing so incensed King Henry, that he presently called his High Court of Parliament, and there declared the just Cause he had of War with France, desiring their Benevolence to the Charge thereof; which was as readily granted as desired, and great Sums of Money were soon collected.

In the Year 1491, being the sixth Year of the King's Reign, on the 6th of April, the Nobility of the Realm assembled in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, where also was the Mayor and Aldermen, and principal Citizens in their Liveries; to whom Dr. Morton Lord Chancellor made an Oration, declaring from his own Letters, that the King of Spain had won the great and rich City and Country of Granada from the Moors, which had been in their Possession above seven hundred Years; and having, in Places of their Superstition, built Churches to the Honour of Christ, was thereupon entitled the Catholick King: For Joy whereof Te Deum was sung with great Solemnity.

In the Month of May was holden a solemn Jutting at the King's Palace of Sheen, now called Richmond, which continued the Space of a Month.

Granada won by the King of Spain from the Moors.

K. Henry propounded this Parliament a War with France, to which End he hath a Benevolence granted.

Month, sometimes within the Palace, and sometimes without, upon the Green before the Gate; in which Jufts, Sir James Parker running against a Gentleman named Hugh Vaughan, by reason of a faulty Helmet, was stricken into the Mouth at the first Course; so that his Tongue was bored to the hinder Part of his Head, in such Sort that he died presently upon the Place.

And now Maximilian having received back his Daughter from the King of France, was so displeased, that he presently sent an Ambassador, one James Contibald, to King Henry, requiring him to take his Part in a War against the French King; towards which he promised to provide ten thousand Men with Pay for two Years: King Henry consented to it; and having provided himself of a puissant Army, on the sixth Day of October, sailed to Calais; but sending his Almoner Christopher Urswike, and Sir John Resley to Maximilian, requiring his promised Forces, they found him altogether unprovided of either Men or Money; which brought King Henry into a great Streight what he should do. To proceed in the War with his own Forces alone, would be full of Hazard; to return home without doing any thing, would bring an Imputation upon him among his Subjects, as though he had used the Pretence of War but as a Trick to get Money: At last he resolved to do something; and thereupon went and besieged Bologne, having in his Army, of chief Lords, Jasper Duke of Bedford, his Lieutenant General, Thomas Marques Dorset, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Suffolk, Shrewsbury, Derby, Kent, Devonshire, and Ormond; sundry Barons, as D'Aubigny, Abergavenny, De la Ware, Zouch, Hastings, Cobham, and others. During his Siege of Bologne (in which there were but a few slain, and none of Note, but Sir John Savage, who riding to take View at what Place the Town might best be assaulted, was set upon by certain Frenchmen, and by them slain) King Henry was secretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes, Governour of Heynault, on the King of France's Behalf, to accept of certain Conditions of Peace. Who thereupon sent Richard Fox, Bishop of Exeter, and Giles Lord D'Aubigny to conclude them; which, amongst other Articles, were, That King Henry, without quitting his Claim to France, should, for a Peace to continue during the two Kings Lives, receive in Present of Charles King of France, for his Charges in that War, seven hundred forty and five thousand Ducats, which in English Money amounts to one hundred eighty six thousand two hundred and fifty Pounds; and five and twenty thousand Crowns Yearly, towards the Expences he had been at before in aiding the Britains; which (by the English called Tribute) was duly paid, during all the King's Reign, and also to King Henry, his Son, afterward, longer than it could continue upon any Computation of Charges. There was also assigned by the French King, unto all K. Henry's principal Counsellors, great Pensions, besides rich Gifts for the present. Which, whether the King did permit, to save his own Purse from Rewards, or to communicate the Envy of a Business that was displeasing to his People, was diversly interpreted: For certainly, the King had no great Fancy to own this Peace; and therefore a little before it was concluded, he had A.D. 1491 Under-hand procured some of his best Captains and Men of War, to advise him to a Peace under their Hands in an earnest Manner, in the Nature of a Supplication; that he might have it to shew for justifying himself, and to give some Allay to the Discontentments of many, who had sold and engaged their Estates upon the Hopes of the War. After the Peace thus concluded, he went to Calais, where he stayed some Time, and the seventeenth of December following, came to Westminster, where he kept his Christmas.

Soon after his Return, he elected into the Order of the Garter, Alphonfus Duke of Calabria, Son and Heir to Ferdinand King of Naples; to whom Christopher Urswike, the King's Almoner, was sent to Naples to carry it; which as soon as Alphonfus had received, he apparelled himself presently in the Habit, before a great Assembly, indeed to shew what Favour he was in with the King of England.

There had been Disturbance in the Realm before by a counterfeit Son of the Duke of Clarence; but that Device had two main Imperfections; one, that the true Son of the Duke was forth-coming, and to be shewed openly for convincing the false; the other, that though the counterfeit had been the true, yet he could have laid no Claim to the Crown, as long as any Daughters of King Edward the Fourth were living: Now therefore a Device is found, by which those Imperfections were both of them amended; for now a Counterfeit was set on Foot, who pretended to be Richard the younger, Son of King Edward the Fourth; so that neither any other could be produced to convince him of being false, nor any Daughters of King Edward could hinder his Right for claiming the Crown. This Device was first forged by Margaret Duchess of Burgundy; a Woman that could never be quiet in her Mind, as long as King Henry was quiet in his Kingdom; and by this Device she hoped, if not to put him clean out of his Seat, yet foully at least to disturb him in it; and this was the Purpose of the Plot: But by what Instrument it was acted, by what Abettors fomented, and what Issue the Device had, are worthy all to be related. The Duchess having formerly given out, that Richard, the younger Son of King Edward, was not murdered, but in Compassion spared, and sent secretly away to seek his Fortune; and having, after long Search, gotten at last a fit Boy to personate a Prince, keeps him secretly a good Time with her, in which Time she so thoroughly instructed him in all Circumstances, and he afterward put them so gracefully in Practice, that even those who had seen and known the young Prince while he lived, could hardly perceive but that this was he. It is true, though he were not King Edward's Son, yet he was his God-son, and might perhaps have in him some base Blood of the House of York. This Perkin Warbeck (for so was the Youth's Name, called Perkin, as a Diminutive of Peter) when he so perfectly had learned his Lesson, that he was fit to come upon the Stage, she sent him into Portugal, that coming

King Henry is drawn into France to assist the Emperor, upon Promise, which the Emperor keeps not.

King Henry hath a great Sum of Money of the King of France, to agree to a Peace.

A.D. 1493 from a strange Country, it might be thought, he had been driven to wander from one Country to another for Safe-guard of his Life; at least, that she of all other might not be suspected. From Portugal she caused him to pass into Ireland, where the House of York was specially respected, in respect of the great Love which Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the Fourth, had won amongst them; by Reason whereof this Perkin, as esteemed his Grand-child, was well entertained by them, and held in great Estimation. He had not been long in Ireland when the French King sent for him; for being at that Time at Variance with King Henry, he thought he might make good Use of Perkin, as a Pretender against King Henry for the Crown. Perkin being come to Paris, was entertained in a Princely Fashion; and for his more Honour, had a Guard assigned him, over which the Lord Congreschal was Captain. He had not been long at Paris, when there resorted to him Sir George Nevil, Bastard, Sir John Taylour, Richard Robinson, and about a hundred other English. Amongst the rest, one Stephen Fryon, that had been King Henry's Secretary for the French Tongue; but discontented, fled, and became a chief Instrument in Perkin's Proceedings. But this Float of Perkin's lasted not long; for as soon as Peace was concluded between the Two Kings, the King of France dismissed Perkin, and would keep him no longer. Then passed he secretly to his first Foundress, the Lady Margaret; who at his first coming, made a Shew of suspecting him to be a Counterfeit; but causing him in great Assemblies to be brought before her, as though she had never seen him before; and finding him to answer directly to all Questions she put unto him, she openly professed, That she was now satisfied, and thought him verily to be her true Nephew; and thereupon assigned a Guard of thirty Persons, cloathed in Murry and Blue, and called him the White Rose of England. Upon Report hereof, many in England were enclined to take his Part; and Sir Robert Clifford, and Robert Barclay were sent into Flanders, to acquaint the Duchess with the People's Respect to Perkin; and indeed Sir Robert Clifford, upon Sight and Conference with him, wrote Letters into England, wherein he affirmed, that he knew him to be the true Son of King Edward, by his Face, and other Lineaments of his Body. King Henry hearing of these Things, sent certain Espials into Flanders, that should feign themselves to have fled to Perkin, and by that Means the better search out who were of the Conspiracy with him. Whose Names being returned unto the King, he caused them to be apprehended and brought to his Presence; the Chief of whom were John Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Mountford, and Sir Thomas Thwayts, Knights, William Dawbeny, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Cressenor, and Thomas Astwood: Also certain Priests, William Richford, D.D. Thomas Boyn, D. William Sutton, William Worfeley, Dean of St. Paul's, Robert Layborn, and Richard Lisley, of whom some hearing of it, fled to Sanctuary; others were taken and condemned, as Sir Simon Mountford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeny, who were all three beheaded. The Lord

Perkin is entertained by the King of France.

Perkin's Assistants taken and put to Death.

Fitzwater being pardoned, was conveyed to A.D. 1493 Calais, and there laid in Hold; where seeking to make Escape by corrupting his Keeper, he lost his Head. Shortly after, Sir Robert Clifford, returning out of Flanders (not as some think, sent a Spy from the Beginning, but rather now at last, either discerning the Fraud, or won by Rewards) submitted himself to the King's Mercy; discovering unto him, as far as he knew, all that were either open or secret Abettors of the Conspiracy; amongst whom he accused Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain: His Accusation was this, That in Conference between them, Sir William had said, That if he certainly knew that the young Man named Perkin were the Son of King Edward the Fourth, he would never fight nor bear Arms against him. These Words being considered of by the Judges, seemed to express a ticklish Hold of Loyalty; for who could tell how soon he might be perswaded that he knew it? Besides, that the Uttering such an Expression was in it self upon the Matter, to be disloyal to King Henry; and withal it struck upon a String which had always sounded harsh in King Henry's Ears, as preferring the Title of York before that of Lancaster. Sir William being hereupon arraigned, whether trusting to the Greatness of his Favours, or the Smallness of his Fault, denied little of that wherewith he was charged, and upon Confession was adjudged to die; and accordingly on the sixteenth Day of February was brought to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded; after whose Death, Giles, Lord Dawbeny, was made Lord Chamberlain. This was that Sir William Stanley who came in to rescue the Earl of Richmond when he was in Danger of his Life; who set the Crown upon his Head, and was the Cause of his being saluted King: And could it enter into his Breast to put him to Death, that had saved his Life, and done him so many great Services besides? But it may be said, It was not the Earl of Richmond that did it, but the King of England; for certainly, in many Cases, a King is not at Liberty to shew Mercy, so much as a private Man may. Though there be that affirm, the Cause of his Death was not Words only, but real Acts, as giving Aid to Perkin underhand by Money. And it seems there was some Conflict in the Mind of King Henry, what he should do in this Case; for he stayed six Weeks after his Accusation, before he brought him to his Arraignment. However it was, the Summer following the King went in Progress to Latham, to the Earl of Derby, who had married his Mother, and was Brother to Sir William Stanley; perhaps to congratulate his own Safety; perhaps to condole with him his Brother's Death; but certainly to keep the Earl from conceiving any sinister Opinion of him; for to think that Sir William's suing to be Earl of Chester (an Honour appointed to the King's Son) or his great Wealth (for he left his Castle at Holt in ready Money forty thousand Marks, besides Plate and Jewels) were Causes that procured or set forward his Death, are Considerations very unworthy of so just a Prince, against a Servant of so great Deserving.

But, in this mean while, Perkin having gotten a Power of idle loose Fellows, took to Sea, Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain, accused of partaking with Perkin.

Is convicted and beheaded.

A.D. 1495 Sea, intending to land in Kent; where, though he were repelled, yet some of his Soldiers would needs venture to go on Land, of whom a hundred and sixty Persons were taken Prisoners, whereof Five were Captains; Morford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintyn, and Gemyne; the hundred and sixty Persons were brought to London, railed in Ropes, like Horses drawing in a Cart, who upon the Arraignment confessing their Offence, were executed, some at London, and some in Towns adjoining to the Sea Coast. Perkin finding no Entertainment in Kent, sailed into Ireland, and having staid there a while, and finding them also, being a naked People, to be no competent Assistants for him, from thence he sailed into Scotland, where he so moved the King of Scots with his fair Words and coloured Pretext (made no doubt before by the Dukes of Burgoyne) that he received him in great State, and caused him to be called the Duke of York; and to persuade the World that he thought him so indeed, he gave him in Marriage the Lady Katharine Gordon, Daughter to Alexander Earl of Huntley, his own near Kinswoman; and soon after, in Perkin's Quarrel entered with a puissant Army into England, making Proclamation, That whosoever would come in and aid the true Duke of York, should be spared; but none coming in, he then used all kind of Cruelty, and the whole County of Northumberland was in a manner wasted: Whereat Perkin, at his Return, expressed much Grief, saying, It grieved him to the Heart, to see such Havock made of his People: To whom the King answered, Alas! alas! you take care for them, who for any thing that appears are none of yours; for not one of the Country came in to his Succour. King Henry, incensed with this bold Attempt of the King of Scots, called his High Court of Parliament, acquainting them with the Necessity he had of a present War to revenge the Indignity offered him by the Scots, and thereupon requiring their Aid by Money, had a Subsidy of six score thousand Pounds readily granted him, and then in all Haste a puissant Army is provided, and under the Conduct of the Lord Dawbeny sent into Scotland; but before he arrived there, he was suddenly called back by reason of a Commotion begun in Cornwall, for Payment of the Subsidy lately granted, which though it were not great, yet they grudged to pay it. The Ring-leaders of this Commotion were Thomas Flammock, a Gentleman learned in the Laws, and Michael Joseph, a Smith; who laying the Blame of this Exaction upon John Merton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Reynold Bray, as being Chief of the King's Council, exhorted the People to take up Arms; and having assembled an Army, they went to Taunton, where they slew the Provost Peyrn, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidy, and from thence came to Wells, intending to go to London, where the King then lay, who having revoked the Lord Dawbeny, appointed Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey (after the Death of the Lord Dinham made Lord Treasurer of England) to have an Eye to the Scots, and if they made Invasion, to resist them. In the mean Time James Twitchet, Lord Audley, confederated himself with the Rebels of Cornwall, and took upon him to be their A.D. 1495 Leader, who from Wells went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, hoping there to have had great Aid, but found none; for the Earl of Kent, the Lord Aburgain, John Brook, Lord Cobham, Sir Edmund Poynings, Sir Richard Guildford, Sir Thomas Bourchier, John Peachy, and William Scot, were ready in Arms to resist them; whereupon the Rebels brought their Army to Black-beath, four Miles distant from London, and there in a Plain, on the Top of a Hill, encamped themselves, whereof when the King had Knowledge, he presently sent John Earl of Oxford, Henry Bourchier, Earl of Essex, Edmund de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and Sir Humfrey Stanley, to environ the Hill on all Sides, that so all Hope of Flight might be taken from them; and then set forward himself, and encamped in St. George's Fields; where for Encouragement he made divers Bannerets. The next Day he sent the Lord Dawbeny to set upon the Rebels early in the Morning, who first got the Bridge at Deptford-Strand, though strongly defended by the Rebels Archers, whose Arrows were reported to be a full Cloth-yard in Length; but, notwithstanding, the Lord Dawbeny coming in with his Company, and the Earl's assailing them on every Side, they were soon overcome; in which Conflict were slain of the Rebels above two thousand, taken Prisoners a very great Number, many of whom the King pardoned, but of the chief Authors none, for the Lord Audley was drawn from Newgate to Tower-hill, in a Coat of his own Arms, painted upon Paper, reversed and all torn; and there on the four and twentieth Day of June was beheaded; Thomas Flammock, and Michael Joseph were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and their Heads and Quarters, pitched upon Stakes, set up in London, and other Places. Of the King's Army were slain not above three hundred. It is memorable, with what Comfort Joseph the Blacksmith cheered up himself at his going to Execution, saying, That yet he hoped by this, that his Name and Memory should be everlasting; so dear even to vulgar Spirits is Perpetuity of Name, though joined with Infamy; what is it then to noble Spirits, when it is joined with Glory!

In the mean Time, the King of Scots taking Advantage of these Troubles in England, invaded the Frontiers, foraged the Bishoprick of Durham, and at last besieged the Castle of Norham, whereof Richard Fox, then Bishop of Durham, was Owner; who thereupon sent presently to the Earl of Surrey, acquainting him with this Invasion: Whereupon the Earl, taking with him Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, Thomas, Lord Barns, Ralph Lord Nevil, George Lord Strange, many other Lords and Knights, and an Army of little less than twenty thousand Men; besides a Navy, whereof the Lord Brook was Admiral, set forward against the Scots, and not only forced the Scots to raise the Siege of Norham-Castle, but followed them also into Scotland; where he overthrew and defaced the Castle at Caudstream, the Tower of Heten-Hall, the Tower of Haddington, the Tower of Fulden, and at last by Composition took the strong Castle of Hayton, and rased it to the Ground.

A.D. 1496 On the Earl's being at Hayton, the King of Scots sent to him Marchmont, and another Herald, requiring him at his Election, either to fight with him with their whole Armies, or else they two to fight with him in single Combat; upon Condition, that if the Victory fell to the Scotish King, the Earl should deliver for his Ransom the Town of Berwick: Whereunto the Earl made Answer, That the Town of Berwick was the King his Master's, and therefore not for him to dispose of; but for his Offer of single Combat, he willingly accepted it, and thought himself highly honoured by such a Match: But King James of Scotland had no Meaning to perform either one or other, but privily in the Night fled back into Scotland, and then the Earl returned to Berwick. In the mean Time, one Peter Hyalas, a Man of great Learning and Policy, was sent Ambassador to the King of Scots, from the King of Spain, to mediate a Peace between the Two Kings of England and Scotland; who finding the King of Scots conformable to his Motion, found after, the King of England (who was never averse to Peace upon honourable Conditions) no less enclining to it; and so a Truce was concluded for certain Years; upon Condition, that Perkin Warbeck should be sent out of the Scotish Dominions.

A Truce between King Henry and the King of Scots.

About this Time, the Lord Champhyre, and others, sent from Philip Archduke of Austria, and Duke of Burgundy, came to K. Henry for a Conclusion of Amity, and to procure the English Merchants Resort again to his Country; for K. Henry some Time before, upon Displeasure with the Flemings, but specially with the Lady Margaret, for abetting Perkin Warbeck, not only had banished all Flemish Wares and Merchandises out of his Dominions, but had also restrained all English Merchants from having any Traffick in any of their Territories, causing the Mart for all English Commodities to be kept at Calais: But now, upon this Invitation, and having found it had been a great Hindrance to his own Merchant-Adventurers, and thereupon some Insurrections had risen, he willingly condescended to their Request, and so the English resorted again to the Arch-duke's Dominions, and were received into Antwerp with general Procession; so glad was that Town of the English Mens Returns.

In the eleventh Year of this King's Reign, died Cicely Duchess of York, Mother to King Edward the Fourth, at her Castle of Berkhamstead, being of extream Age; who had lived to see three Princes of her Body Crowned, and four Murthered. She was buried at Foderinghay, by her Husband.

Shortly after the Truce concluded between England and Scotland, Perkin Warbeck was commanded to depart out of the Scotish Dominions; who thereupon, with his Wife and Family, sailed into Ireland; where understanding that the Cornish Men were ready to renew the War again, he thought best not to let pass so fair an Occasion; and thereupon, having with him four small Ships, and not above sixscore Men, he sailed into Cornwal, and there landed in the Month of September, and came to a Town called Bodmin; where with fair Words, and large Promises, he so prevailed with the People, that he had gotten to him above three thousand Persons to take his Part; and then made Proclamations in the Name of King Richard the Fourth, as Son to King Edward the Fourth; and, by the Advice of his three Counsellors, John Heron, a bankrupt Mercer, Richard Skelton, a Taylor, and John Astley, a Scrivener, determined to attempt first the winning of Exeter; which with great Violence he assaulted, and the Townsmen with as great Valiantness defended; whereof when the King heard, he sent the Lord Dawbeny to their Rescue; but before he came, the Lord Edward Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, and the valiant Lord William, his Son, accompanied with Sir Edmund Carew, Sir Thomas Trenchard, Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Halewel, Sir John Croker, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgecomb, William St. Maure, with others, came to their Aid: Upon whose coming, Perkin left the Siege, and retired to Taunton, where he mustered his Men, as though he meant to prepare for Battel; but finding his Number to be much diminished (for of six thousand which he had at Exeter, many were fled from him, when they saw no great ones to take his Part) he began to distrust his Cause; and hearing withal, that the King with a great Power was at Hand, about Midnight, with threecore Horsemen in his Company, he posted away from Taunton, and took Sanctuary in a Town called Beaulieu near to Southampton. When K. Henry heard that Perkin was fled, he sent after him to the Sea-side, to stop his Passage, and apprehend him: But the Messengers that were sent, when they came to St. Michael's Mount, though they found not Perkin, yet there they found his Wife the Lady Katharine Gordon, whom they presently brought to the King; a beautiful young Lady; to whom, in Honour of her Birth, and Commiseration of her Beauty, the King allowed a competent Maintenance, which she enjoyed during the King's Life, and many Years after. King Henry, being come to Exeter, stayed there a few Days, about the Examination of the Rebellion, and Execution of the chief Offenders; of whom there being a great Multitude, and all of them craving Pardon, the King caused them all to be assembled in the Church-yard of St. Peter, where they all appeared bare-headed in their Shirts, and Halts about their Necks; whom the King viewing out of a Window made for the Purpose, after he had paused a while, made a Speech unto them, exhorting them to Obedience; and then in Hope they would afterward be dutiful Subjects, he pardoneth them all; whereat they made a great Shout, crying all, God save King Henry! Though some of them afterward, like ungrateful Wretches, fell into new Rebellions.

Followed by the King's Forces, he takes Sanctuary at Beaulieu.

King Henry pardons Perkin's Followers.

All this while Perkin was in Sanctuary; and the King, thinking himself in Danger as long as he was in Safety, set a Guard about the Place, to keep him from escaping; whereby Perkin was so restrained, that at last he submitted himself to the King's Mercy, and was thereupon sent to the Tower, to be there in safe Custody. This done, King Henry appointed Thomas Lord Darcy, Sir Amyas Paulet, and Robert Sherburn, Dean of St. Paul's, to be Commissioners for 1499. It was now the fourteenth Year of the King's Reign, when one Sebastian Gabato, a Genouese's Son, born at Bristol, persuaded the King to Man and Victual a Ship at Bristol, to search for an Island, which, he said, he knew to be replenished with rich Commodities; who setting forth with three other small Ships of London Merchants, returned home two Years after, when he had made a large Discovery Westward; as likewise six Years before, one Christopher Columbus a Spaniard, made the first Discovery of America.

perkin makes Escape out of the Tower.

Submits himself again, and is again sent to the Tower.

Perkin attempting again to escape, is hanged at Tyburn.

Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, for plotting with Perkin, is beheaded.

Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, for plotting with Perkin, is beheaded.

Beast from another, and therefore could never know how to practise his Escape of himself, but by Perkin's Subtilty; for which Cause the King favoured him so far, that he was not buried in the Tower, but at Bissam by his Ancestors. And thus ended the Designs of Perkin Warbeck, which had troubled both the Kingdom and the King the Space of seven or eight Years, a great Part of the King's Reign.

But in the Time of Perkin's being in the Tower, another like Practice was set on Foot; for an Augustine Frier, called Patrick, in the County of Suffolk, having a Scholar named Ralph Wilford, a Cordwainer's Son, he caused him to take upon him to be the Earl of Warwick, lately by great Chance gotten out of the Tower; and they going together into Kent, when the Frier perceived some light Credit to be given to him, he then stuck not to declare it openly in the Pulpit, desiring all Men to assist him. But this Practice was soon discovered, and both the Master and the Scholar were apprehended and attainted, the Scholar Wilford was hanged on Shrove-Tuesday at St. Thomas Waterings, and the Frier was condemned to perpetual Prison; for at that Time so much Reverence was attributed to Holy Orders, that a Priest, though he had committed Treason against the King, yet had his Life spared: And this Practice was some Cause to exasperate the King against the Earl of Warwick, who, though innocent in himself, yet was nocent in Pretenders; and besides, King Ferdinand of Spain, with whom at this Time there was a Treaty for Marriage of his Daughter to Prince Arthur, had written to the King in plain Terms, that he saw no Assurance of his Son's Succession, as long as the Earl of Warwick lived: And thus all Things unfortunately concurred to bring this innocent Prince to his End.

Another Practice to set up one Ralph Wilford to be the Earl of Warwick.

But the Practice discovered, and Wilford hanged.

In the 15th Year of his Reign, partly to avoid the Danger of the Plague then reigning in England, but chiefly to confer with the Duke of Burgoyne about many important Busineses; the King and Queen sailed over to Calais, where, at an Interview between him and the Duke at St. Peter's Church without Calais, the Duke offered to hold the King's Stirrup at his Alighting, which the King by no Means would permit, but descending from Horse-back, they embraced with great Affection; and after Communication between them, the King and Queen in the End of June returned into England.

King Henry fails to Calais, to confer with the Duke of Burgoyne.

In his 17th Year two great Marriages were solemnized; the Lady Katharine of Spain was sent by her Father King Ferdinand with a puissant Armada of Ships into England, where she arrived at Plymouth the 2d Day of October, and on the 14th of November after was espoused openly to Prince Arthur, both being clad in white, he of the Age of fifteen Years, she of eighteen; at Night they were laid together in one Bed, where they lay as Man and Wife all that Night: When Morning appeared, the Prince (as his Servants about him reported) called for Drink, which before-time he had not used to do; whereof one of his Chamberlains asking him the Cause, he answered merrily, saying, I have been this Night in the midst of Spain, which is a hot Country, and

A.D. 1502 that makes me so dry: Though some write, that a grave Matron was laid in Bed between them, to hinder actual Consummation. The Lady's Portion was two hundred thousand Ducats, her Jointure the third Part of the Principality of Wales, Cornwal, and Chester. At this Marriage was great Solemnity and Royal Justings; during which Time there came into London an Earl, a Bishop, and divers other noble Personages sent from the King of Scots for a Conclusion of Marriage, before treated of, between the Lady Margaret, the King's eldest Daughter, and him; where the Earl, by Proxy, in the Name of King James his Master, affianced and contracted the said Lady; which Contract was published at St. Paul's Cross, on the Day of the Conversion of St. Paul; for Joy whereof Te Deum was sung, and great Fires were made through the City of London: And if such Joy was shewn when the Match was made, what Joy should be shewn now at the Issue of the Match, when by the Union of those Persons is made an Union of these Kingdoms, and England and Scotland are but one Great Britain? The Lady's Portion was ten thousand Pounds, her Jointure two thousand Pounds a Year, after King James's Death, and in present one thousand. When this Match was propounded at the Council-Table, some Lords opposed it, objecting, that by this Means the Crown of England might happen to come to the Scotish Nation. To which King Henry answered, What if it should? It would not be an Accession of England to Scotland, but of Scotland to England. And this Answer of the King passed for an Oracle; and so the Match proceeded, and in August following was consummate at Edenburgh, and she conducted thither in great State by the Earl of Northumberland.

Prince Arthur, after his Marriage, was sent again into Wales to keep that Country in good Order; to whom were appointed for Counsellors, Sir Richard Pool, his Kinsman and chief Chamberlain, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir Richard Crofts, Sir David Phillips, Sir William Udal, Sir Thomas Englefield, Sir Peter Newton, John Walleston, Henry Marton, and Dr. William Smith, President of his Council; but within five Months after his Marriage, at his Castle at Ludlow, he deceased, and with great Solemnity was buried at the Cathedral Church at Worcester. His Brother Henry, Duke of York, was stayed from the Title of Prince of Wales the Space of half a Year, till to Women it might appear, whether the Lady Katharine, the Relict of Prince Arthur, was with Child or no. The Towardlines in Learning of this Prince Arthur is very memorable, who dying before the Age of sixteen Years, was said to have read over all, or most of the Latin Authors, besides many other.

And now Prince Arthur being dead, and the Lady Katharine of Spain left a young Widow, King Henry, loth to part with her Dowry, but chiefly being desirous to continue the Alliance with Spain, prevailed with his other Son Prince Henry, though with some Reluctation, such as could be in those Years (for he was scarce twelve Years of Age) to be contracted with the Princess Katharine his Brother's Widow; for which Marriage a Dispensation, by Advice of the most learned Men at that Time in Christendom, was by Pope Julius the Second, granted, and on the A.D. 1502 25th Day of June, in the Bishop of Salisbury's House in Fleet-street, the Marriage was solemnized.

A little before this Time Edmund de la Pool, Edmund de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Son to John Duke of Suffolk, and Lady Elizabeth, Sister to King Edward IV. had in his Fury killed a mean Person, and was thereupon indicted of Murther; for which, although he had the King's Pardon, yet because he was brought to the King's-Bench-Bar, and there arraigned, he took it for so great a Blemish to his Honour, that in great Rage he fled into Flanders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret; where, having stayed a while, when his Passion was over, he returned again. But after the Marriage between Prince Arthur and the Lady Katharine, whether it were that in that Solemnity he had run himself in Debt, or whether he were drawn to do so by the Lady Margaret, he passed over the second Time, with his Brother Richard, into Flanders. This put the King into some Doubt of his Intention; whereupon he had Recourse to his usual Course in such Cases, and sent Sir Robert Curson, Captain of Hammes Castle, to feign himself one of that Conspiracy, thereby to learn the Depth of their Intentions: And to take away all Suspicion of his Employment, the first Sunday of November he caused the said Earl and Sir Robert Curson, with five others, to be accursed openly at St. Paul's Cross, as Enemies to him and his Realm. In Conclusion, Sir Robert Curson acquainted the King with divers of that Faction; amongst whom, William Lord Courtney, and William de la Pool, Brother to the foresaid Earl of Suffolk, who were taken but upon Suspicion, yet held long in Prison: But Sir James Tyrrel (the same that had murdered the two young Princes in the Tower) and Sir John Windham, who were proved to be Traitors, were accordingly attainted, and on the 6th Day of May at the Tower-hill beheaded. Whereof, when the Earl heard, despairing now of any good Success, he wandered about all Germany and France, where, finding no Succour, he submitted himself at last to Philip Duke of Austria, by whom afterward he was delivered to King Henry by this Occasion: Ferdinand King of Arragon, by his Wife Isabella Queen of Castile, had only two Daughters, the eldest whereof, named Joan, was married to this Philip Duke of Austria; the younger, named Katharine, to Arthur Prince of England: And now Queen Isabella being lately dead, by whose Death the Kingdom of Castile descended in Right of his Wife to this Duke Philip; they were sailed out of Germany into Spain, to take Possession of the Kingdom; but by Tempests and contrary Winds were driven upon the Coast of England, and landed at Weymouth in Dorsetshire; where, desiring to refresh themselves a little on Shore, they were invited by Sir Thomas Trenchard (a principal Knight in that Country) to his House, who presently sent Word to the King of their Arrival. King Henry, glad to have his Court honoured by so great a Prince, and perhaps upon Hope of a Courtesy from him, which afterward he obtained, sent presently the Earl of Arundel to wait upon him, till himself might follow; and

A.D. 1506 and the Earl went to him in great Magnificence, with a gallant Troop of three hundred Horse, and for more State came to him by Torch-light. Upon whose Message, though King Philip had many Reasons of Haste on his Journey; yet not to give King Henry Distaste, and withal, to give his Queen the Comfort of seeing the Lady Katharine, her Sister; he went with Speed to the Queen at Windsor, while his Queen followed by easy Journeys. After great Magnificence of Entertainment, King Henry taking a fit Opportunity, and drawing the King of Castile into a Room, where they two only were private, and laying his Hand civilly upon his Arm, said unto him, Sir, you have been saved upon my Coast; I hope you will not suffer me to wreck upon yours. The King of Castile asking him what he meant by that Speech? I mean it, saith the King, by that hare-brain'd Fellow, the Earl of Suffolk, who being my Subject, is protected in your Country, and begins to play the Fool when all others are weary of it. The King of Castile answered, I had thought, Sir, your Felicity had been above those Thoughts; but if it trouble you, I will banish him. King Henry replied, that his Desire was to have him delivered to him: With this the King of Castile, a little confused, said, That can I not do with my Honour. Well then, said the King, the Matter is at an End. At last the King of Castile, who held K. Henry in great Estimation, composing his Countenance, said, Sir, you shall have him; but upon your Honour, you shall not take his Life. I promise it upon my Honour, said King Henry: And he kept his Promise, for he was not put to Death during all his Reign; but yet he took such Order, that in the Reign of his Son, King Henry the Eighth, he had his Head cut off. During the King of Castile's being here, a Treaty was concluded, and bears Date at Windsor; which the Flemmings term Intercursus malus, for that the free Fishing of the Dutch upon the Coasts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Undecimo, was not by his Treaty confirmed, as all other Articles were. And now when King Henry had received the King of Castile into the Fraternity of the Garter, and had his Son, Prince Henry, admitted to the Order of the Golden-Fleece; and that the Earl of Suffolk was brought over and committed to the Tower, the King of Castile departed home.

Two Calls of Serjeants at Law.

In this King's Time were two Calls of Serjeants at Law; one in his eleventh Year, in which were called nine Serjeants, Mordant, Higham, Kingesmil, Conisbey, Butler, Taxely, Frowick, Oxenbridge, and Constable; who kept their Feast at the Bishop of Ely's Palace in Holbourn, where the King, the Queen, and all the chief Lords dined. The other Call in his twentieth Year, in which were called seven Serjeants, Robert Bradnel, William Grevil, Thomas Marow, George Edgore, Lewis Pollard, Guy Palmes, and William Fairfax, who kept their Feast at the Archbishop's House in Lambeth.

King Henry having gotten as much Honour as the Estimation of neighbouring Princes could give him, began now to be intentive on getting of Wealth, wherein he quickly found Instruments fit for his Purpose; but especially two,

Empson and Dudley, both Lawyers, and both of them Barons of the Exchequer: Dudley of a goodly Family, but Empson the Son of a Sieve-maker. These two Persons being put in Authority, turned Law and Justice into Rapine. For first, their Manner was, to cause divers Subjects to be indicted of Crimes, and then presently to commit them; and not produce them to their Answer, but suffer them to languish long in Prison, and by sundry artificial Devices and Terror, extort from them great Fines; which they termed Compositions and Mitigations. Neither did they, towards the End, observe so much as the half Face of Justice, in proceeding by Indictments; but sent forth their Precepts to attach Men, and convent them before themselves, and some others at their private Houses, and there used to shuffle up a summary Proceeding by Examination, without Trial of Jury; assuming to themselves, to deal both in Pleas of the Crown, and Controversies Civil. Then did they also use to enthrall and charge the Subjects Lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding false Offices; refusing, upon divers Pretexts and Delays, to admit Men to traverse those false Offices, as by Law they might. Nay, the King's Wards, after they had accomplished their full Age, could not be suffered to have Livery of their Lands, without paying excessive Fines, far exceeding all reasonable Rates. When Men were out-lawed in personal Actions, they would not permit them to purchase their Charters of Pardon, except they paid great and intolerable Sums; standing upon the strict Point of Law, which upon Outlawries gives Forfeiture of Goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and Colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the Half of Mens Lands and Rents during the Space of full two Years, for a Pain in Case of Outlawry. They would also ruffle with Jurors, and enforce them to find as they would direct; and if they did not, then convent, imprison, and fine them. These and many other Courses they had of preying upon the People; but their principal Working was upon Penal Statutes; wherein they considered not whether the Law was obsolete, or in Use; and had ever a Rabble of Promoters and leading Jurors at their Command, so as they could have any thing found, either for Fact or Valuation. There remaineth to this Day a Report, that K. Henry was on a Time entertained very sumptuously by the Earl of Oxford, at his Castle of Henningham: And at the King's going away, the Earl's Servants stood in their Livery-coats with Cognizances, ranged on both Sides, to make the King a Lane. Whereupon the King called the Earl to him, and said, My Lord, I have heard much of your Hospitality, but I see it is greater than is spoken; these handsome Gentlemen and Yeomen whom I see on both Sides of me, are sure your menial Servants! At which the Earl smiled, and said, It may please your Grace, That were not for mine Ease; they are most of them my Retainers, and are come to do me Service at such a Time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. Whereat the King started a little, and said, By my Faith, my Lord, I thank you for my good Chear; but I may not endure to have my Laws broken in my Sight; my Attorney Chiefly upon Penal Statutes.

The Earl of Oxford entertains King Henry to his Cost.

A.D. 1506 torney must speak with you about it. And it is Part of the Report, that it cost the Earl for a Composition, fifteen thousand Marks. And to shew further the King's extream Diligence, I remember (saith Sir Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, in his History) to have seen, long since, a Book of Accompt, of Empson's, that had the King's Hand almost to every Leaf, by way of signing; and was in some Places postilled in the Margent with the King's own Hand likewise, where was this Remembrance:

Item, Received of such a one five Marks for the Pardon to be procured; and if the Pardon do not pass, the Money to be repaid, except the Party be some other Way satisfied. And over-against this Memorandum (of the King's own Hand) Otherwise satisfied. This, saith he, I do the rather mention, because it shews in the King a Nearness, but yet with a kind of Justness.

In his three and twentieth Year there was a sharp Prosecution against Sir William Capel, now the second time, for Misgovernment in his Mayoralty: The great Matter was, that in some Payments he had taken Notice of false Moneys, and did not his Diligence to examine who were the Offenders; for which, and some other Things laid to his Charge, he was condemned to pay two thousand Pounds; whereof, being a Man of Stomach, he refused to pay a Farthing; and thereupon was sent to the Tower, where he remained until the King's Death. Knefworth likewise, that had been lately Mayor of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for Abuses in their Offices questioned and imprisoned, and not delivered but upon Payment of one thousand four hundred Pounds. Sir Lawrence Ailmer, who had likewise been Mayor of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of one thousand Pounds; and Sir Lawrence, for refusing to pay it, was committed to Prison, where he stayed till Empson himself was committed in his Place. By these Courses he accumulated so great Store of Treasure, that he left at his Death most of it in secret Places, under his own Key, and keeping, at Richmond, as is reported, the Sum of near eighteen hundred thousand Pounds Sterling. But though by this Course he got great Store of Treasure, yet by it he lost the best Treasure (the Peoples Hearts) but that he something qualified it by his last Testament, commanding that Restitution should be made of all such Moneys as had unjustly been levied by his Officers.

King Henry at his Death leaves eighteen hundred thousand Pounds.

It seems King Henry, after the Death of his Queen the Lady Elizabeth, had an Inclination to marry again; and hearing of the great Beauty and Virtue of the young Queen of Naples, the Widow of Ferdinando the younger, he sent three confident Persons, Francis Marfin, James Braybrook, and John Stile, to make two Enquiries; one of her Person and Conditions, the other of her Estate: Who returning their Answer, that they found her Beauty and Virtues to be great, but her Estate to be only a certain Pension, or Exhibition, and not the Kingdom of Naples, as he expected; he then gave over any further meddling in that Matter. After this, another Treaty of Marriage was propounded to the King between him and the Lady Margaret, Duchess Dowager of Savoy, only Daughter to King Henry had concluded to marry the Lady Margaret, Duchess Dowager of Savoy; but protracted by reason of his Infirmary.

Maximilian, and Sister to the King of Castile, a A.D. 1508 Lady wife and of great Fame; in which Business was employed, for his first Piece, the King's then Chaplain, and after the great Prelate, Thomas Wolsey. It was in the End concluded, with ample Conditions for the King, but with the Promise de futuro only. Which Marriage was protracted from Time to Time, in respect of the Infirmary of the King; which held him by Fits till he died.

He left Executors, Richard Fox, Bishop of King Henry's Winchester, Richard Fitz-James, Bishop of London, Thomas Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Rochester, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Treasurer of England, Edward Earl of Worcester, and Lord Chamberlain, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and the Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas. A little before his Death he had concluded a Marriage (in which Negotiation Fox, Bishop of Winchester, was employed) between his younger Daughter, the Lady Mary, of the Age of ten Years, and Charles King of Castile, not much elder; but though concluded, yet not solemnized; and she was afterward married to Lewis the French King.

Of his Taxations.

IN his third Year there was by Parliament granted toward the maintaining an Army in Britain, That every Man should pay the tenth Penny of his Goods; which Tax, though at first withstood in Yorkshire and Durham, yet was afterward levied to the uttermost. In his seventh Year, towards his Wars in France, a Benevolence was by Parliament granted, by which great Sums of Money were collected of the richer Sort only. In his eleventh Year, a Subsidy of six Score thousand Pounds was granted him by Parliament, towards his Wars with Scotland, which caused afterward the Insurrection in Cornwall. In his nineteenth Year a Subsidy was granted him by Parliament. In his one and twentieth Year he raised great Sums of Money from Offenders against Penal Statutes: The greatest, but the unjustest Way for raising of Money that ever any King of England used; and not content with this, he required, and had at the same Time a Benevolence both from the Clergy and Laity. To the Clergy was employed Richard Fox, then Bishop of Winchester; who assembling the Clergy before him, exhorted them to be liberal in their Contribution; but the Clergy being of two Sorts, rich and poor, made each of them several Excuses: The Rich, and such as had great Livings, said, they were at great Charges in keeping Hospitality, and maintaining their Families; and therefore desired to be spared. The poor Sort alledged, that their Means were small, and scarce able to find them Necessaries, and therefore desired to be forborn. But the Bishop answered them both with a pretty Dilemma, saying to the Rich, It is true, you live at great Charges in Hospitality, in Apparel, and other Demonstrations of your Wealth; and seeing you have Store to spend in that Order, there is no Reason but for your Prince's Service you should do it much more, and therefore you must pay. To the poorer Sort he said, Though your Livings

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

Yeomen of the Guard when first ordained.

Fines to be final, ordained by this King.

THIS King was the first that ordained a Company of tall, strong Men (naming them Yeomen of the Guard) to be attending about the Person of the King, to whom he appointed a Livery by which to be known, and a Captain by whom to be chosen. In his Time the Authority of the Star-Chamber, which subsisted before by the Common-Laws of the Realm, was confirmed in certain Cases by Act of Parliament. In his Time were made these excellent general Laws: One, that from thenceforth Fines should be final, and conclude all Strangers Rights. Another for Admission of poor Suitors, in forma pauperis, without paying Fee to Counsellor, Attorney, or Clerk. Another, that no Person that did assist by Arms, or otherwise, the King for the Time being, should afterward be impeached therefore, or attainted either by Course of the Law, or by Act of Parliament; and that if any such Act of Attainder did happen to be made, it should be void, and of none Effect. Another for the Benevolence, to make the Sums which any had agreed to pay, and were not brought in, to be leviable by Course of Law. Another, that Murtherers should be burnt on the Brawn of the left Hand, with the Letter M, and Thieves with the Letter T; so that if they offended the second Time, they should have no Mercy, but be put to Death; and this to reach also to Clerks Convict. In his fifth Year it was ordained by Parliament, That the Mayors of London should have Conservation of the River of Thames, from the Bridge of Stanes to the Waters of Yeudale and Medway. In his seventeenth, Sir John Shaa, Mayor of London, caused his Brethren the Aldermen to ride from the Guild-hall to the Water-side, when he went to Westminster to be presented in the Exchequer: He also caused the Kitchens and other Offices to be builded at the Guild-hall, where since that Time the Mayor's Feast hath been kept, which before had been in the Grocers or Taylors Hall. In his eighteenth Year, King Henry being himself a Brother of the Taylors Company, as divers Kings before had been, namely, Richard III. Edward IV. Henry VI. Henry V. Henry IV. and Richard II. also of Dukes eleven, Earls twenty eight, Lords forty eight; he now gave the Name and Title of Merchant-Taylors, as a Name of Worship to endure for ever.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

The Privilege of Sanctuaries abated.

IN the tenth Year of his Reign, Joan Bough-ton Widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certain Opinions of John Wickliffe. In his seventh Year King Henry, finding great Inconvenience by the Privilege of Sanctuaries, wrote to Pope Alexander, desiring him by his Authority to adjudge all English-men being fled to Sanctuary for the Offence of Treason, to be Enemies of the Christian Faith, and to prohibit the Privilege of Sanctuary to all such as once had enjoyed it before. Which Request the A.D. 1508 Pope granted, to the great Contentment of the King, and Quiet of the Realm. In his sixteenth Year, being the Year 1500, a Jubilee in Rome was celebrated, whereof Alexander, the then Pope, by his Messenger Gaspar Pons a Spaniard, gave Notice to the King, offering withal, that those who could not come to Rome should notwithstanding, at a certain Price, have Pardons, and as full a Benefit of the Jubilee, as if they came: And to the End the King should not hinder his Purpose, both offered Part of his Gains to the King, and also promised to bestow it upon a War against the Turk; by which Course he gathered great Sums, for which he had other Use than to spend it so idly. In the 22d Year of this King, Pope Alexander VI. died of Poison, by this Accident: He went to Supper in a Vineyard near the Vatican, where his Son Valentinois meaning to poison Adrian, Cardinal of Cornetta, sent thither certain Flagons of Wine infected with Poison, and delivered them to a Servant of his, who knew nothing of the Matter, commanding him, that none should touch them, but by his Appointment. It happened, the Pope coming in something before Supper, and being very dry through the immoderate Heat of the Season, called for Drink, his own Provision being not yet come: The Servant that had the poisoned Wine in keeping, thinking it to be committed to him as a special Wine, brought of it to the Pope; and while he was drinking, his Son Valentinois came in and drank also of the same, whereby they were both poisoned; but the Pope only overcome of the Poison died: His Son, by the Strength of Youth, bore it out, though with long languishing.

Pope Alexander VI. poisoned, by what Chance.

Works of Piety and other Structures by him and others.

THIS King magnificently enlarged Greenwich, which Humfrey Duke of Gloucester had formerly builded, calling it Placentia. In his sixteenth Year he new builded his Manor of Sheen, and named it Richmond. He also new builded Baynards-Castle in London. In his two and twentieth Year he finished the goodly Hospital of the Savoy, near Charing-crofs, to which he gave Lands for the relieving of two hundred poor People. This was first called Savoy-place, built by Peter Earl of Savoy, Father to Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury, about the nine and twentieth Year of Henry III. who made the said Peter Earl of Richmond. The House belonged since to the Duke of Lancaster, and at this Time was converted to an Hospital, retaining still the first Name of the Savoy. In this King's Time, John Morton being Bishop of Ely, bestowed great Cost upon his House at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, now the House of the Right Honourable the Earl of Salisbury; and at Wisbich-Castle in Cambridgeshire, a House belonging to that See: All the Brick Building was of his Charge. Being afterward Bishop of Canterbury, he bestowed great Sums in repairing and augmenting his Houses at Maidstone, Alington-Park, Charing, Ford, Lambeth, and specially at Knoll in Kent, where he died. King Henry also builded three Houses of Franciscan Friars,

And drawing near his End, he did these Works of Charity: He granted a general Pardon to all Men for any Offence committed against any of his Laws, Thieves and Murtherers only excepted: He paid also all Fees of all Prisoners in all Goals in and about London, abiding there for that Cause only. He paid also the Debts of all such Persons as lay in the Compters or Ludgate for forty Shillings or under, and some also for ten Pounds. In his eighteenth Year the Chappel of our Lady, above the East-side of the high Altar at Westminster Church, with a Tavern called the White-Rose near adjoining, was taken down; in which Place a most beautiful Chappel was then presently begun to be builded by King Henry; the Charges whereof amounted to the Sum of fourteen thousand Pounds (as Stow witnesseth.) In his second Year the great Conduit in Cheapside, at the Charges of Thomas Ilam, Alderman of London, was new made; and the Crofs also in Cheapside was new builded; towards the Charges whereof Thomas Fisher, Mercer, gave five hundred Marks. In his seventh Year the Conduit in Grace-street was begun to be builded by the Executors of Sir Thomas Hill, Grocer, late Mayor of London. Also this Year Hugh Clapton, Mayor of London, builded the great Bridge of Stratford upon Avon; as likewise a fair Chappel toward the South-end of that Town; and near to the same a pretty House of Brick and Timber, where he lay and ended his Life. He glazed also the Chancel of the Parish-Church in that Town, and made a Way of four Miles long, three Miles from Ailesbury towards London, and one Mile beyond Ailesbury. In his tenth Year John Tate, Mayor of London, builded the Church of St. Anthony, with a Free-School, and certain Alms-houses for poor Men. In his Time his Mother, the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, builded two Colleges in Cambridge, one called Christ's College, the other St. John's, and endowed them with large Possessions for the Maintenance of Learning. Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, founded Corpus Christi College in Oxford; and William Smith, Bishop of Lincoln, Brazen-nose College: He also builded at Litchfield an Hospital, for a Master, two Priests, and ten poor Men; as likewise a Free-School, with a School-master, and an Usher. Anne Aveling gave an hundred Marks towards the building of the Church in Cirencester. In his Time also John Alcock, Bishop of Ely, builded Jesus College in Cambridge: And in his two and twentieth Year Thomas Knefworth, Mayor of London, builded the Conduit at Bishopsgate at his own Charge; and gave to the Fishmongers certain Tenements, for which they are bound to allow to four Scholars, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, to each of them four Pounds a Year; also to poor People and Prisoners in Ludgate something Yearly. In his twentieth Year Sir William Capel, Mayor of London, caused all Houndsditch to be paved over, which till that Time had lain very noyously to all Travellers that Way. In his fourteenth Year all the Gardens without Moor-gate (which had continued Time out of Mind) were destroyed; and of them was made a plain Field for Archers to shoot in. In this King's Time also, Thomas Savage, Archbishop of Tork, repaired the Castle of Carwood, and the Manor of Scorby, and founded the Chappel at Macclesfield in Cheshire, where he was born. Also in his Time Sir Stephen Jenings, Mayor of London, founded a Free Grammar-School at Wolverhampton in Staffordshire, where he was born; and gave Lands sufficient for a Master and an Usher, leaving the Over-sight to the Merchant-Tailors in London. In this King's Time also, John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, founded St. Paul's School, in the Church-yard there.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his first Year happened the Sicknefs called the Sweating-sicknefs; which though it continued not long, yet took away many thousands. And in his two and twentieth Year the like Sweating-sicknefs happened again; but, by reason of Remedies found in the former, took away fewer.

In his second Year Wheat was sold for three Shillings the Quarter, Bay-Salt at the like Price. In his seventh Year Wheat was sold at London for twenty Pence the Bushel, which was counted a great Dearth. In his tenth Year Wheat was sold at London for six Pence the Bushel, Bay-Salt for three Pence half-penny, Nantwich Salt for six Pence, White Herrings nine Shillings the Barrel, Red Herrings three Shillings the Cade, Red Sprats six Pence the Cade, and Gascoigne Wines for six Pounds the Tun. In his fifteenth Year Gascoigne Wine was sold at London for forty Shillings the Tun, a Quarter of Wheat four Shillings, and Bay-Salt four Pence the Bushel.

The 22d of August, 1485, the very Day that King Henry got the Victory of King Richard, a great Fire was in Bread-street in London, in which was burnt the Parson of St. Mildred's, and one other Man in the Parsonage there.

In his tenth Year, indigging a new Foundation in the Church of St. Mary-Hill in London, the Body of Alice Hackney, which had been buried in the Church a hundred seventy five Years before, was found whole of Skin, and the Joints of her Arms pliable; which Corpse was kept above Ground four Days, without Annoyance, and then again buried.

In his twelfth Year, on St. Bartholomew Day, at the Town of St. Neots in Bedfordshire, there fell Hail-stones that were measured eighteen Inches about.

In his thirteenth Year, on the 21st Day of December, suddenly in the Night brake out a Fire in the King's Lodgings, being then at his Manor of Sheen; by Violence whereof a great Part of the old Building was burnt, with Hangings, Beds, Apparel, Plate, and many Jewels. In his fifteenth Year the Town of Braham in Norfolk was burnt: Also this Year a great Plague happened, whereof many People died in many Places, but especially in London, where there died in that Year thirty thousand.

A.D. 1508 In his twentieth Year, Allum, which for many Years had been sold for six Shillings a Hundred, rose to five Nobles a Hundred, and after to four Marks.

In his two and twentieth Year the City of Norwich was well near consumed with Fire. Also in the same Year, in July, a Gallery new builded at Richmond, wherein the King and the Prince his Son had walked not an Hour before, fell suddenly down, yet no Man hurt.

The great Tempest which drove King Philip into England, blew down the Golden Eagle from the Spire of St. Paul's; and in the Fall, it fell upon a Sign of the Black Eagle, which was in St. Paul's Church-yard, in the Place where the School-house now standeth, and battered it, and broke it down. This the People interpreted to be an ominous Prognostick upon the Imperial House, as indeed it proved; for this King Philip being the Emperor's Son, arriving in Spain, sickned soon after; and being but thirty Years of Age, deceased; upon whose Decease, his Wife, Queen Joan (out of her tender Love to him) fell distracted of her Wits.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, being of the Age of nineteen Years; whom two Years after his Marriage he caused to be Crowned. She lived his Wife eighteen Years, and died in Child-bed in the Tower of London, the eleventh of February, the very Day on which she was born; and is buried at Westminster, in the magnificent Chappel and rich Monument of Copper and Gilt, which her Husband had erected. He had Issue by her, three Sons and four Daughters: His eldest Son Arthur was born at Winchester, the twentieth Day of September, in the second Year of his Reign, and died at Ludlow, at fifteen Years old and a half; and of this short Life some Cause may be attributed to his Nativity, being born in the eighth Month after Conception: He was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Mary's in Worcester, where in the South-Side of the Quire he lies entombed in Touch or Jet, without any Remembrance of him by Picture. His second Son Henry was born at Greenwich in Kent, on the two and twentieth Day of June, in the seventh Year of his Father's Reign; and succeeded him in the Kingdom. His third Son Edmund was born in the tenth Year of his Father's Reign, and died at five Years of Age, at Bishops Hatfield, and lies buried at St. Peter's in Westminster. His eldest Daughter Margaret was born the nine and twentieth Day of November, in the fifth Year of her Father's Reign; and at fourteen Years of Age was married to James the Fourth King of Scotland; unto whom she bare three Sons, James the Fifth, Arthur and Alexander, and one Daughter; which three last died all of them young; and after the Death of her Husband, King James (slain at Flodden-field in Fight against the English) she was re-married to Archibald Dowglas, Earl of Angus, in the Year 1514, to whom she bare Margaret, espoused to Matthew Earl of Lenox, Father of the Lord Henry, who died at the Age of nine

King Henry's second Daughter, the Lady Elizabeth, was born in the Year 1492; at three Years of Age died, and was buried at Westminster. His third Daughter, the Lady Mary, had been promised to Charles King of Castile; but was married to Lewis the Twelfth, King of France; who dying three Months after, she was then married to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. His fourth Daughter, the Lady Katharine, was born in the Year 1503, in the eighteenth Year of her Father's Reign, and died an Infant.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of Body lean and spare, yet of great Strength; of Stature somewhat higher than the common Sort; his Eyes grey, his Hair thin; of a fair Complexion, and pleasing Countenance. Concerning his Conditions: He had in him the Virtue of a Prince, and of a private Man; affable, yet reserved. We might say he was politick, if not rather that he was wise; for though he used Tricks of Cunning sometimes, yet solid Circumspection more. He loved not War, but in case of Necessity; always Peace, but with Conditions of Honour. Never any Prince was less addicted to bodily Pleasures of any Kind than he. Three Pleasures he had, but in three Cases; one for Safety, another for Honour, and the third for Wealth; in all which he attained his End. His great Respect of the Church was seen by his great Employment of Church-men; for through the Hands of Bishop Morton, Bishop Fox, and his Chaplain Ursuicke, the greatest Part of all his Negotiations passed. He was frugal from his Youth, not covetous, till antient and sickly; and therefore what Defect he had in that Kind, must be attributed to Age and Weakness. The City of London was his Paradise; for what good Fortune soever befel him, he thought he enjoyed it not, till he acquainted them with it. His Parliament was his Oracle; for in all Matters of Importance he would ask their Advice; and he put his very Prerogative sometimes into their Hands. He was no great Lover of Women; yet all his great Fortune, both precedent and subsequent, came by Women: His own Title to the Crown was by a Woman; his Confirmation in the Crown was by a Woman; his Transmission of the Crown to his Posterity, was by a Woman: The first by the Lady Margaret, descended from John of Gaunt; the second by the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth; the third by the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of himself, King of England, and married to James the Fourth King of Scotland; by Means whereof, as he was the Prince that joined two Roses in one, so he was the Founder of joining the two Kingdoms in one. And lastly, it may be said of him

A.D. 1508 him, as was said by one, of Augustus Caesar — Hic Vir, hic est, tibi quem promitti sapius audis: For Cadwallader, last King of the Britains, seven hundred Years before had prophesied of him; and of later Time King Henry the sixth plainly foreshewed him.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the two and twentieth Year of his Reign he began to be troubled with the Gout; but a Defluxion also taking into his Breast, wasted his Lungs, so that thrice in a Year, and specially in the Spring, he had great Fits and Labours of the Ptfick, which brought him to his End, at his Palace of Richmond, on the two and twentieth Day of April, in the Year 1508, when he had lived two and fifty Years, reigned three and twenty and eight Months: Being dead, and all Things necessary for his Funeral prepared, his Corpse was brought out of his privy Chamber into the great Chamber, where it rested three Days, and every Day had there a Dirge and Mass sung by a Prelate Mitred; and from thence it was conveyed into the Hall, wherein it remained also three Days, and had a like Service there, and so three Days in the Chappel. Upon Wednesday the ninth of May, the Corpse was put into a Chariot, and over the Corpse was a Picture of the late King laid on Cushions of Gold; and the Picture was apparelled in the King's rich Robes, with a Crown on the Head, and a Ball and Scepter in the Hands: When the Chariot was thus ordered, the King's Chaplain and a great Number of Prelates set forward, praying: Then followed all the King's Servants in Black: Then followed the Chariot, and after the Chariot nine Mourners, and on every Side were carried Torches, to the Number of six hundred: And in this Order they came from Richmond to St. George's Field; where there met with it all the Priests and religious Men within the City and without; the Mayor and Aldermen, with many Commoners, all cloathed in Black, met with the Corpse at London-Bridge, and so the Chariot was brought throughout the City, to the Cathedral of St. Paul; where the Body was taken out, and carried into the Choir, and set under a goodly Hearse of Wax; where, after a solemn Mass, was preached a Sermon by the Bishop of Rocheſter. The next Day the Corpse in like Manner was removed to Westminster, Sir Edward Howard bearing the King's Banner. In Westminster was a curious Hearse full of Lights, which were lighted at the coming of the Corpse; and then was the Corpse taken out of the Chariot by six Lords, and set under the Hearse, which was double railed. When the Mourners were set, Garſter, King at Arms, cried, For the Soul of the noble

Prince Henry the Seventh, late King of this A.D. 1508 Realm. The next Day were three Masses solemnly sung by Bishops; and after the Masses was offered the King's Banner and Courſer, his Coat of Arms, his Sword, his Target, and his Helm; and at the End of the Mass, the Mourners offered up rich Palls of Cloth of Gold and Bodkin; and when the Choir sung Libera me, the Body was put into the Earth: Then the Lord Treasurer, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, the Treasurer and Comptroller of the King's Household, brake their Staves, and cast them into the Grave. Then Garſter cried with a loud Voice, Vive le Roy Henry le huitieme, Roy d'Angleterre & de France, Syre d'Irlande: And thus ended the Funeral.

LIFE and REIGN of

King HENRY VIII.

A.D. 1509

KING Henry the Seventh being deceased, his only Son Prince Henry, Heir by his Father of the House of Lancaster, and by his Mother of the House of York, by unquestionable Right succeeded in the Crown, at the Age of eighteen Years, on the two and twentieth of April, in the Year 1509; who having been trained up in the Study of good Letters all his Father's Time, he governed at first as a Man newly come from Contemplation to Action, as it were by the Book, in so regular and fair a Manner, that as of Nero's Government there was said to be Quinquennium Neronis; so of this King's there might as justly be said, Decennium Henrici; and perhaps Double so long a Time, comparable with so much Time of any King's Reign that had been before him. How he came to alter, and to alter to such a Degree of Change as he did, we shall then have a fit Place to shew when we come to the Time of his Alteration. King Henry having learned by Books, that the Weight of a Kingdom is too heavy to lie upon one Man's Shoulders, if it be not supported by able Counsellors, made it his first Care to make Choice of an able Council; to which he called William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of England; Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey, and Treasurer of England, George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Steward of his Household, Charles Somerset, Lord Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyatt, Doctor Thomas Ruthal, and Sir Edward Poynings. By Advice of these Counsellors, his first Act, after the Care of his Father's Funeral, was the Care to perform his Father's Will, in marrying the Lady Katharine of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which perhaps, but in respect of filial Piety, he had not the greatest Devotion; and for relinquishing whereof, he might, no doubt, more easily have obtained a Dispensation from the Pope, than his Father had done, for getting it to be allowed; but Obsequiousness to his Father's Desire, and Respect to his Council's Advice, so far prevailed with him, that he would not be Crowned till that were performed, that one Coronation might serve them both; and so on the third Day of June following, he married the said Lady at the Bishop of Salisbury's House in Fleet-street; where, of many great Solemnities, I will remember but this One; that though the Bride were a Widow, yet to shew she was a Virgin-widow, A.D. 1509 she was attired all in White, and had the Hair of her Head hanging down behind at the full Length; and then (having made in the Tower tour and twenty Knights of the Bath) two Days after, being Midsummer-day, he was Crowned at Westminster, together with his Queen, by the Hands of William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Circumstances of State in such Cases usual; and then all the Nobility, Spiritual and Temporal, did him Homage; and the People being asked whether they would receive him for their King? They all with one Voice cried, Yea! Yea!

This done, his next Act was another Part of performing his Father's Will, which was to proclaim Pardon for all Offences (Treason, Murder, and Felony only excepted) and to have Restitution made of all Goods unjustly taken from any; and because the Instruments of such Injustice are always most odious; and nothing gives the People so much Contentment, as to see their Persecutors punished: He therefore caused Empson and Dudley, the Two chief Actors of the late unjust Proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of their inferior Agents, called Promoters, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wight, Simpson and Stockton, to be set on the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their Heads, and then to ride through the City with their Faces to the Horse-tails; with the Shame whereof, in seven Days after, they all died in Newgate. Shortly after, a Parliament was called, whereof Sir Thomas Ingleby was chosen Speaker; and therein Empson and Dudley were attainted of High-Treason, and after arraigned. Edmund Dudley in the Guild-hall, on the seventeenth of July, and Sir Richard Empson at Northampton in October following; and on the seventeenth of August the Year following, they were both of them beheaded on the Tower-hill, and their Bodies and Heads buried, the one at White-Friers, the other at the Black.

Both of them

On Midsummer-Eve, at Night, King Henry came privily into Cheap-side, cloathed in one of the Coats of his Guard, to behold the same: And this first Year King Henry spent in Justs and Masks, which were almost perpetual, performed with great Magnificence always, and sometimes with great Acts of Valour, on the King's Part especially.

In February the same Year, Ambassadors came from the King's Father in Law, the King of

A.D. 1510 of Arragon, requiring Aid against the Moors, in which Service the Lord Thomas Darcey, a Knight of the Garter, making Suit to be employed, he was sent thither, and with him the Lord Anthony Gray, Brother to the Marquess Dorset, Henry Guildford, Wolstan Browne, and William Sidney, Esquires, of the King's House, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Roger Hastings, Sir Ralph Elderton, and others; who, on the Monday in the Rogation-week, departed out of Plymouth-Haven with four Ships Royal; and on the first of June arrived at the Port of Cadiz in South-Spain; of whose coming the King of Arragon hearing, sent to bid them Welcome; but advertising them withal, that he had now, by Reason of new Troubles with France, taken Truce with the Moors, and therefore they might return again to their own Country; to whom yet he allowed Wages for all his Soldiers. Whereupon the Lord Darcey and all his Men went aboard their Ships; but Henry Guildford, Wolstan Browne, and William Sidney, desirous to see the Court of Spain, went thither, and were honourably entertained. Henry Guildford, and Wolstan Browne were made Knights by the King; who gave to Sir Henry Guildford a Canton of Granado; and to Sir Wolstan Browne, an Eagle of Sicily on a Chief, to the Augmentation of their Arms: William Sidney so excused himself, that he was not made Knight. After this they returned to their Ships, and their Ships into England.

Sir Henry Guildford, and Sir Wolstan Browne, Honours done them in Spain.

Sir Edward Poynings sent to aid the Duchesse of Savoy.

During the Time that the Lord Darcey was in Spain, the Lady Margaret, Duchesse of Savoy, Daughter unto Maximilian the Emperor, and Governesse of Flanders, and other the Low-Countries, pertaining to Charles the young Prince of Castile, sent to King Henry for fifteen hundred Archers, to aid her against the Duke of Gelders, which the King granted; and thereupon Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the King's House, is appointed to go, accompanied with his Son in Law the Lord Clinton, Sir Matthew Browne, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Witherill, and others, to the Number of fifteen hundred, took Shipping at Sandwich, and passing over to the said Lady-Regent, did her there great Service; for which John Norton, John Fogge, John Scot, and Thomas Linde were Knighted; and then with many Thanks and Rewards returned, not having lost in all the Journey, by War or Sicknes, above an hundred Men.

Sir Edward Howard, Admiral, representeth Andrew Barton, a Scottish Pirate.

In the third Year of King Henry's Reign, one Andrew Barton, a Scottish Pirate, was grown so bold, that he robbed English-men no less than other Nations, till the King sent his Admiral, Sir Edward Howard, to repress him; who in a Fight so wounded the said Barton, that he died; and then taking two of his Ships, brought the Men Prisoners to London; and though their Offence deserved no less than Death, yet the King was so merciful as to pardon them all, provided they departed the Realm within twenty Days. The King of Scots hearing of the Death of Barton, and taking of his Ships, sent to King Henry, requiring Reitution; but King Henry answered his Herald, That he rather looked for Thanks for sparing their Lives, who so justly had deserved Death.

In the third Year also of K. Henry's Reign, A.D. 1512 the French King made sharp War against Pope Julius the Second: Whereupon King Henry wrote to the French King, requiring him to desist from his War against the Pope, being his Friend and Confederate. But when the King of France little regarded his Request, he then sent him Word to deliver his Inheritance of the Duchy of Normandy and Guyen, and the Countries of Anjou and Mayne; as also his Crown of France, or else he would recover it by the Sword. But when the King of France was not moved with this Threatning neither, King Henry then joining in League with the Emperor Maximilian, with Ferdinand King of Spain, and with divers other Princes, resolved by Advice of his Council to make War on the King of France; and to that End made Preparation both by Sea and Land.

King Henry makes Preparation for War with France.

This Year the King kept his Christmas at Greenwich, in a most magnificent Manner. On New-Year's-Day was presented one of his jovial Devices, which, only for a Pattern what his Shews at other Times were, I think fit to set down at large. In the Hall was made a Castle, garnished with Artillery and Weapons, in a most Warlike Fashion; and on the Front of the Castle was written, La Fortresse Dangereuse: Within the Castle were six Ladies cloathed in Russel-Satin, laid all over with Leaves of Gold; on their Heads Coifs and Caps of Gold. After this Castle had been carried about the Hall, and the Queen had beheld it, in came the King with five others, apparelled in Coats, one Half of Russel-Satin, with Spangles of fine Gold; the other Half of rich Cloth of Gold; on their Heads Caps of Russel-Satin, embroidered with Works of fine Gold. These six assaulted the Castle, whom the Ladies seeing so lusty and couragious, they were contented to solace with them; and upon further Communication, to yield the Castle; and so they came down and danced a long Space: After that, the Ladies led the Knights into the Castle, and then the Castle suddenly vanished out of their Sights. On the Twelfth-day, at Night, the King with eleven more were disguised, after the Manner of Italy, called a Mask; a Thing not seen before in England. They were apparelled in Garments long and broad, wrought all with Gold, with Visors and Caps of Gold. And after the Banquet done, these Maskers came in, with six Gentlemen disguised in Silk, bearing Staff-Torches, and desired the Ladies to dance; and after they had danced and communed together, took their Leave and departed.

One of King Henry's jovial Devices.

The five and twentieth of January began the Parliament, of which was Speaker Sir Robert Sheffield, Knight, where the Archbishop of Canterbury shewed the Wrong which the King of France did to the King of England, in withholding his Inheritance from him; and thereupon the Parliament concluded, that War should be made on the French King and his Dominions.

The War with France concluded by Parliament.

At this Time King Ferdinand of Spain, having War with the French King, wrote to his Son in Law King Henry, that if he would send over an Army into Biscay, and invade France on that Side, he would aid them with Ordnance, Horses, and

A.D. 1512 and all other Things necessary: Whereupon Thomas Gray, Marquess Dorset, was appointed to go, and with him the Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, the Lord Brook, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Ferrers, the Lords John, Anthony, and Leonard Gray, all Brothers to the Marquess; Sir Griffith ap Rice, Sir Maurice Barkley, Sir William Sands, the Baron of Burford, and Sir Richard Cornwall his Brother; William Hufsey, John Melton, William Kingstone, Esquires, and Sir Henry Willoughby, with divers others, to the Number of ten thousand; who taking Ship at Southampton, on the sixteenth of May, the third of June they landed on the Coast of Biscay; whither, within three Days after their Arrival, came from the King a Marquess and an Earl to welcome them; but of such Necessaries as were promised, there came none; so as the English being in some Want of Victuals, the King of Navarre offered to supply them, which they accepted; and promised thereupon not to molest his Territories. After the Army had lain thirty Days, looking for Aid and Provision from the King of Spain, at last a Bishop came from the King, desiring them to have Patience a while, and very shortly he would give them full Contentment. In the mean Time the English-men, forced to feed upon much Garlick, and to drink of hot Wines, fell into such Sicknes, that many of them died, at least eighteen hundred Persons; which the Lord Marquess seeing, he sent to the King to know his Pleasure; who sent him Answer, that very shortly the Duke of Alva should come with a great Power, and join with him; and indeed the Duke of Alva came forward with a great Army, as if he meant to join with him, as was promised; but being come within a Day's Journey, he suddenly turned towards the Realm of Navarre; and entering the same, chased out the King, and conquered the Kingdom to the King of Spain's Use. This Spanish Policy pleased not the English, who finding nothing but Words from the King of Spain, and being weary of lying so long idle, they fell upon some small Towns in the Borders of Guyen; but, for want of Horses, as well for Service as Draught, were unable to perform any great Matter. At which Time, being now October, the Lord Marquess fell sick, and the Lord Howard supplied his Place of General: To whom the King of Spain once again sent, excusing his present coming, and requiring him, seeing the Time of Year was now past, that he would be pleased to break up his Army, and disperse his Companies into Towns thereabouts, till the next Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his Promises. Hereupon the Lord Howard and his Company went to Rendre, the Lord Willoughby to Gorfchange, and Sir William Sands, with many other Captains, to Fontarabia. K. Henry in the mean Time hearing what the King of Spain's Intention was, sent his Herald Windsor with Letters to the Army, willing them to tarry there, for that very shortly he meant to send them a new Supply of Forces, under the Conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain; but this Message so incensed the Soldiers, that in a great Fury they had slain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded presently to return Home; who thereupon was forced to hire Ships, and in the Beginning of December A.D. 1512 they landed in England, being taught, by this Experience, what Truith is to be given to Spanish Promises.

About the same Time that the Marquess went into Spain, Sir Edward Howard, Lord Admiral of England, with twenty great Ships, made forth towards Britain; where, setting his Men on Land, he burned and wasted divers Towns and Villages; and being threatened by the Lords of Britain to be encountred, to encourage his Gentlemen, he made divers of them Knights; as Sir Edward Brook, Brother to the Lord Cobham; Sir Griffith Down, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir John Burdet, Sir William Pirton, Sir Henry Sherburn, and Sir William Bull. The Britains were ten thousand, the English but five and twenty hundred; yet the Britains, not contented with this Advantage of Number, would needs use Policy besides: For, by the Advice of an old experienced Captain, their General commanded his Men, that as soon as the Battels were joined, they should retire a little, meaning thereby to draw the English into some Disadvantage: But the common Soldiers not knowing their General's Purpose, and supposing he had seen some present Danger, instead of retiring, took their Heels and fled; so giving the English by their British Policy, if not a Victory, at least a Safety to return to their Ships. After which the Britains sued for Truce, and could not obtain it; for the English Admiral pursued his Foraging the Country, till fearing there were many French Ships abroad at Sea, he came and lay before the Isle of Wight. King Henry in the mean Time followed his Pleasures, and in June kept a solemn Just at Greenwich, where he and Sir Charles Brandon took up all Comers; and the King shewed himself no less a King at Arms than in Estate.

After this, King Henry having prepared Men and Ships ready to go to Sea, under the Government of Sir Anthony Oughtred, Sir Edmund Ichingham, William Sidney, and divers other Gentlemen; appointed them to take the Sea, and to come before the Isle of Wight, there to join with the Admiral; which all together made a Fleet of five and twenty fair Ships; and to Portsmouth he went himself to see them; where he appointed Captains for one of his chiefest Ships called The Regent, Sir Thomas Knevet, Master of his Horse, and Sir John Carew of Devonshire; and to another principal Ship called The Sovereign, he appointed for Captains Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guildford; and then making them a Banquet, sent them going. The French King likewise had prepared a Navy of nine and thirty Ships in the Haven of Brest, whereof the Chief was a great Carrick, called the Cordelyer, pertaining to the Queen his Wife. These two Fleets met at the Bay of Britain, and there entred a terrible Fight; the Lord Admiral made with the great Ship of Deep, and chased her; Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guildford being in the Sovereign, made with the great Carrick of Brest, and laid Stem to Stem to her; but whether by Negligence of the Master, or by reason of the Smoak from the Ordnance, the Sovereign was cast at the Stern of the Carrick; whereat the French-men shouted shouted for Joy; which Sir Thomas Knevet seeing, suddenly he caused the Regent, in which he was, to make to the Carrick, and to grapple with her a long Board; and when they of the Carrick perceived they could not get asunder, they let slip an Anchor, and so with the Stream the Ships turned, and the Carrick was on the Weather-side, and the Regent on the Lee-side; at which Time a cruel Fight passed between these two Ships: But in Conclusion the English-men entred the Carrick; which when a Gunner saw, he desperately set on Fire the Gunpowder, as some say; though others affirmed, that Sir Anthony Oughtred followed the Regent at the Stern, bouged her on divers Places, and set her Powder on Fire; but howsoever it chanced, the Carrick and the Regent both were consumed by Fire. In the Carrick was Sir Piers Morgan, and with him nine hundred Men: In the Regent were Sir Thomas Knevet and Sir John Carew, and with him seven hundred Men, all drowned and burnt. King Henry, to repair the Loss of the Regent, caused a great Ship to be built, such a one as had never been seen in England, and named it Henry Grace de Dieu.

Though King Henry had hitherto followed his Pleasures, as well agreeing with his Youth and Constitution; yet he neglected not in the mean time severer Studies; for he frequented daily his Council-table, and no Matter of Importance was resolved on, till he had heard it first maturely discussed; as was now a War with France, which he would not enter into upon his own Head, nor yet upon Advice of his private Council, till he had it debated and concluded in Parliament: Whereupon he called his High Court of Parliament, wherein it was resolved, That himself in Person, with a Royal Army, should invade France, and towards the Charges thereof an extraordinary Subsidy was willingly granted.

On May Even this Year, Edmund de la Pool Earl of Suffolk was beheaded on the Tower-hill. This was that Earl of Suffolk whom King Philip, Duke of Austria, had delivered up into the Hands of King Henry VII. upon his Promise that he would not put him to Death; which indeed he performed; but his Son King Henry VIII. was not bound by that Promise, and by him he was; and shortly after, to bring another Lord in his Place, Sir Charles Brandon was created Viscount Lisle.

For all the great Preparation for France, King Henry forbore not his Course of Revelling, but kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with divers curious Devices, in a most magnificent Manner. In March following, the King's Navy Royal, to the Number of two and forty Ships, was set forth under the Conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompanied with Sir Walter Devereux, Lord Ferrers, Sir Woolstan Brown, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir Anthony Poinings, Sir John Wallope, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Stephen Bull, William Fitz-Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney, Esquires, and divers other Gentlemen, who sailing to Britain, came into Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in Sight of the French Navy, whereof one Prior John was Admiral; who keeping himself close in the Haven of Brest, the English Admiral intended to assail him in the Haven; but because A.D. 1514 his Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he caused certain Boats to be manned forth, thinking thereby to toll out the French; but when this neither would draw them to come abroad, he then called a Council, where it was determined, that first they should assail Prior John and his Gallies, lying in Whitland-Bay, and after set upon the rest of the French Fleet in the Haven of Brest: And it was further appointed, that the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others, should go on Land, with a convenient Number, to assault the Bulwarks which the French had there made; while the Admiral with Row-barges, and little Gallies, entred into the Bay, that so the French-men might at once be assailed both by Sea and Land. But though this were determined by a Council of War, yet the Lord Admiral had a Trick by himself; for by the Advice of a Spanish Knight, affirming that he might enter the Bay with little Danger, he called to him William Fitz-Williams, William Cook, John Colley, and Sir Woolstan Brown, as his most trusty Friends, making them privy to his Intent, which was to take on him the whole Enterprize with their Assistance only; and so confident he was of Success, that he wrote to the King to come thither in Person, to have the Honour of the Enterprize himself; but it seems the King had better Fates, at least went not; and thereupon, on Saint Mark's Day, the Admiral put himself in a small Row-barge, and appointed three other small Row-ships, and his own Ship-boat to attend him, therewith on a sudden rowed into the Bay, where Prior John had moored up his Gallies just to the Ground; which Gallies, with the Bulwarks on the Land, shot most cruelly; yet the Admiral went on, and coming to the Gallies, drove out the French-men: The Bay was shallow, and the other Ships, by reason the Tide was spent, could not enter; which the French-men perceiving, they entered the Gallies again with Morris-Pikes, and began a new Fight: Whereupon the Admiral attempting to return back into his Row-barge, which by Violence of the Tide was driven down the Stream, with a Pike was thrown over-board and drowned; the just Issue of his Head-strong Enterprize; the forenamed Alphonso was there also slain: Upon which sorrowful Accident, the Lord Ferrers with the rest returned into England. After whose Departure Prior John came forth with his Gallies, and coasting over the Borders of Suffex, burnt certain poor Cottages; but the King made suddenly a new Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, eldest Brother to him that was drowned, Son and Heir of the Earl of Surrey; who so scowered the Seas, that the French were no more to be seen on any Coast of England.

King Henry had hitherto performed Acts of Arms, though in Jest, yet with great Magnificence: He will not perform them with less, being now in Earnest, and specially to deal with so potent an Adversary: And therefore when it was concluded by Parliament, that he should make a War in France himself in Person, he sent before to prepare the Way for him, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury High Steward of his issued out of Calais, and on the two and twentieth Day of June sat down before the strong Town of Terouin, which City was strongly fortified; and in it was Governor the Lord Poul-treny, who had with him six hundred Horsemen, and five and twenty hundred Almaines, besides the Inhabitants. Here at the very first happened two Disasters to the English; one, that the Baron Carew was slain with a Shot from the Town; the other, that Sir Nicholas Vaux, and Sir Edward Belknappe coming from Guisnes with four and twenty Carts of Provision, were set upon by the Duke of Vendosme, Lieutenant of Picardy, and many of the English slain, and the Provision taken. In this State was the English Camp at Terouin, when King Henry the last Day of June, came himself to Calais, and on the one and twentieth of July took the Field, having in his Army of fighting Men not above nine thousand, but with Pioneers and others that attended the Carriages, eleven thousand and three hundred Men: His forward was led by Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle, his main Battel by himself, and Sir Henry Guildford carried his Standard; and in this Order he marched forward to the Siege of Terouin, entring upon the French Ground the five and twentieth of July. On the Morrow after, by Negligence of the Carters, that mistook the Way, a great Gun called the John Evangelist, was overthrown in a deep Pond of Water, and could not at that Time be recovered; but a few Days after, the Master Carpenter taking with him a hundred Labourers, went and weighed it up; but having carted it ready to bring away, was set upon by eight hundred French, and the most of his Company slain: The Gun was taken by the French, and carried to Boulogne. In the French Army were to the Number of eleven thousand Foot-men, and four thousand Horse; whereof were Captains, the Lord de la Palyce, the Lord de Priennes, the Duke de Longueville, the Earl of St. Paul, and the Lord of Floringes, the Lord of Clermont, and Richard de la Pool, an English-man, Son to John Duke of Suffolk. The Armies were come within two Miles of one another, and some light Skirmishes passed between them, specially one on a Day called The dry Wednesday, for the Day was wonderful hot, and the King with his Army stood in Order of Battel, from six o' Clock in the Morning till three in the Afternoon: After this, the King removed towards Terouin; and as the Army marched, another of the King's Bombards of Iron, called the Red Gun, was overthrown in a Lane, and there left; which the French understanding, went with a great Power to fetch it away, as they had done the other; but the Lord Berners, Captain of the English Pioneers, prevented them; and though set upon by the French to the Number of nine or ten thousand, yet by the Valour of the Earl of Essex, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the bold Adventures of Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharp, they recovered it, and brought it safe to the Camp. On the fourth of August King Henry came before the City of Terouin, where he strongly fortified himself with Ordnance, and other warlike Defences. In which mean time, the Captain of Boulogne, knowing that many of the Garrison of Calais were gone with the King, thought to take Advantage of their Absence, and do some great Exploit upon Calais; and thereupon, with a thousand Men, came to Newnham Bridge, and killing the Watchmen, took it; but afterward some of his Company going to fetch Booties, and coming so near the Walls of Calais, that they were descried; about six Score Coopers and other Artificers issued forth, and driving them back, recovered again Newnham Bridge, and took divers of them Prisoners; especially when the Gate of Calais, called Boulogne Gate, was opened, and that Colepeper the under Marshal, with two hundred Archers issued forth, and joined with them. The French Prisoners were brought to Calais, and there sold in open Market; amongst others, a Cooper of the Town of Calais, bought a Prisoner that dwelt in Boulogne, and had of the Prisoner for his Ransom, a hundred Crowns. When the Money was paid, the French-man prayed the Cooper to see him safe delivered, and to conduct him out of Danger; the Cooper was content, and went himself alone with the French-man, till he came beyond the Cawsley, and there would have departed; but the French-man perceiving that the Cooper was aged, and that no Rescue was nigh, by Force took the Cooper Prisoner, and carried him to Boulogne, making him pay two hundred Crowns before he was delivered.

Calais defended by Coopers and other Artificers.

A foolish Soldier well served.

Whilst King Henry lay thus at the Siege of Terouin, on the eleventh of August the Emperor Maximilian was come to Ayre; which King Henry understanding, went and met him between Ayre and the Camp, where with great Complements they saluted each other; but their Complements were broken off by the extream foul Weather which happened that Day: The Morrow after, the Emperor Maximilian came from Ayre to the King's Camp, wearing a Cross of St. George, as the King's Soldier; and receiving Wages of him for Service, an hundred Crowns a Day: An Honour never done to any King of England before; and yet was no Disparagement to the Emperor; for he was Royally received, and lodged in a Tent of Cloth of Gold; that as no Emperor before had ever been a Soldier to a King, so no Soldier before was ever lodged in such a Tent. At this Time the City of Terouin being in some Distress for want of Victuals, the French King appointed all his Horsemen, to the Number of eight thousand, land, to see Victuals by any Means convoyed into it; the Charge of which Convoy was committed to Monsieur De Priennes: But King Henry, by Advice of the Emperor Maximilian, had made Bridges to pass his Men over the River to the other Side of the Town, where was easiest Access; in such sort, that when the French Convoy came with their Victuals, and thought to have entered the Town, they found an English Army there ready to resist them; whereupon a fierce Battel was fought between them: But in Conclusion the French were put to Flight, and fled so fast, that from thence it was called the Battel of Spurs; for that they used more their Spurs in running away, than their Launces in fighting. In this Battel, the Duke of Longueville, the Lord of Cleremont, Captain Baynard, and others, to the Number of twelve score, were taken Prisoners, and all brought to the King's Presence; with six Standards that were likewise taken. After the Battel, the King made Sir John Pechye Banneret, and John Carre Knight, who had both of them done great Service in this Encounter. King Henry having obtained this Victory against the French Horlemen, and hindred the Town of Terouin from Relief of Victuals, and withal plying his Battery more fiercely than before; made the Townsmen soon fall to desire Composition, and upon Condition, that the Soldiers may depart with Horse and Armour, they yielded up the Town into the King's Hands. This was done on the eighteenth of August, and the Earl of Shrewsbury entered the Town the same Night, and set up the Banner of St. George in the highest Place of it, in Sign of Victory, and swore all the Townsmen to be true Subjects to the King of England. The four and twentieth of August, the King himself entred the Town, and dined in the Bishop's Palace, where it was resolved, that the Walls and Fortifications of Terouin should be rased, and the Town burnt, all but the Cathedral Church and the Palace: All the Ordnance was sent to Ayre, to be kept there to the King's Use.

After this it was concluded, that the King should lay Siege to the City of Tournay: Whereupon he set forward in three Battels; the Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperor the Battel; and the Lord Chamberlain the Rereward. In this Order the King's Army marched forwards towards Tournay; by the Way, he went and visited the young Prince of Castile, and the Lady Margaret, Governess of the Prince, in the Town of Lisle, where, with all Magnificence, or rather indeed Reverence, he was entertained; and after he had stayed there three Days he took his Leave, and being gone a Mile and somewhat more out of the Town, he asked where his Camp lay, and no Man there could tell the Way, and Guide they had none, the Night was so dark and misty: By Chance at last they met with a Victualler coming from the Camp, who was their Guide, and conducted them to it. By which we may see, to what Distress a great Prince might be brought by a little Oversight.

On the one and twentieth Day of September, the King removed his Camp towards Tournay, and being come within three Miles of the Town, he sent Garter King of Arms to summon the Town; but they, though they had but few Men of War amongst them, yet stood upon their Guard; whereupon the King begirt it on all Sides, and made such fierce Batteries upon it, that though it were written on the Gates of the Town, graven in Stone, Jamais tu n'as perdu ton Pucelage; thou has never lost thy Maidenhead; yet now they were glad to lose it: And in Conclusion they sent a Trumpet to require a Parley, and then sued for Mercy and yielded it up, and paid ten thousand Pounds Sterling besides, for Redemption of their Liberties: And then Master Thomas Wolsey, the King's Almoner, calling before him all the Citizens young and old, swore them to the King of England; the Number of whom was fourscore thousand. This done the King entred into Tournay, and calling into his Presence Edward Guildford, William Fitz-William, John Dansie, William Tyler, John Sharp, William Hussey, John Savage, Christopher Garnish, and some other valiant Gentlemen; he gave to them the Order of Knighthood. And then remembring the great Entertainment the Prince of Castile and the Lady Margaret had given him at Lisle, he would not be behind them in such Courtesie; and thereupon invited them solemnly to his City of Tournay, whom at their coming he brought into the Town in great Triumph: During their Abode in Tournay, amongst other Complements of Entertainment, there was had a Just, where the King and the Lord Lisle answered all Comers. After the Justs, was a sumptuous Banquet: After the Banquet, the Ladies danced, and then came in the King, and eleven other in a Mask, and richly apparelled with Bonnets of Gold: And when they had passed the Time at their Pleasures, the Garments of the Maskers were cast off amongst the Ladies, take them that could. This was King Henry's Disposition, that he could not forbear reviling in the Midst of his Arms, and Ladies must be entertained as well as Soldiers. And here Maximilian the Emperor finding the French Forces to be but weak, persuades King Henry to proceed on and pursue his Victories; but he being young, and of a quiet Disposition, and considering with himself that he had not entred the War for any Cause of his own, but to revenge the Injuries done to the Pope; and thinking by this already done the French sufficiently lessoned to acknowledge their Error, and the rather for that Winter was now drawing on; he resolved to put this End to the War: And so taking his Leave of the Emperor, and leaving Sir Edward Poynings Governor of Tournay, he returned to Calais, and from thence into England, then rode in Post to the Queen at Richmond.

Whilst King Henry was thus busied in his War with France, the King of Scots, though his Brother in Law, yet instigated by the French King, and taking Advantage of King Henry's Absence, assembled his People to invade England; but before his whole Power could come together, the Lord Humes his Chamberlain, with seven or eight thousand Men entred the Borders; but as he was returning with a great Booty of Cattel,

The King of Scots invades the English Borders, but is repelled.

A.D. 1514 Cattel, in a Field over-grown with Broom, called Mill-field, he was encountered by Sir Edward Bulmer, having with him not above a thousand Men; who lying in that Field in Ambush, broke out upon him, and put him to Flight with the Slaughter of five or six hundred of his Company, and four hundred taken Prisoners. The Lord Humes himself escaped by Flight, but his Banner was taken: And this by the Scots was called, The ill Rode. In the mean time the whole Power of Scotland was assembled, no fewer than one hundred thousand Men; though Buchanan, in Favour of his Country, saith, not the fifth Part of that Number: And with these King James approaching the Borders, and coming to Norham-Castle, laid Siege unto it; which, for want of Powder, was soon delivered up unto him. But by this Time the Earl of Surrey, Lieutenant of the North-parts, had assembled an Army of six and twenty thousand Men; to whom also soon after his Son the Lord Admiral, with one thousand expert Soldiers, came and joined: And now having many great Lords and Knights in his Army, he appointed to every one their Station; and then was informed, that King James being removed six Miles from Norham, lay embattelling upon a great Mountain called Floddon, where it was impossible to come near him but with great Disadvantage; for at the Foot of the Hill, on the Left-hand, was a great Marsh-ground full of Reeds and Water; on the Right-hand was a River called Till, so swift and deep, that it was not passable; on the Back-side were such craggy Rocks and thick Woods, that there was no assailing him on that Part; the Fore-part of his Camp he had fenced with his great Ordnance. Being in such a Hold, the Earl of Surrey found there was no Possibility of a Battel, unless he could draw him from the Hill: Whereupon he called a Council, by which it was determined to send Rouge-Crofs, Pursuivant at Arms, with a Trumpet to the King of Scots, to let him know that he was ready on Friday following to give him Battel, if he would abide it: Whereunto the King of Scots, by his Pursuivant Ilay, made Answer, that at the Day prefixed he should find him ready for Battel as he desired; that he would willingly have come to such a Match if he had been at Edenburgh: But though he made this Answer, yet he would not leave the strong Hold he was in, but kept himself still upon the Hill. At last Thomas Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, having viewed the Country round about, declared to his Father, that if he would fetch but a small Compass, and come with his Army on the Back of his Enemies, he should enforce the Scottish King to come down out of his Strength, or else stop him from receiving of Victuals or any other Thing out of Scotland. This Counsel of the Lord Howard, his Father followed; and King James perceiving what their Meaning was, thought it stood not with his Honour to be fore-stalled out of his own Realm; and thereupon immediately raised his Camp, and got to another Hill, but not so steep as the other; which the Earl of Surrey perceiving, he determined to mount it, and to fight with the Scots, before they should have Leisure to fortifie their Camp: And herewith making A.D. 1514 a short Speech for Encouragement of his Soldiers, he divided his Army into Battels: The Vanguard was led by the Lord Howard, to whom was joined as a Wing, Sir Edward Howard; the Middle-ward was led by the Earl himself; and the Rere-ward was led by Sir Edward Stanley; the Lord Dacres with a Number of Horsemen, were set apart by himself, to succour where Need should be; the Ordnance was placed in the Front, and in other Places, as was thought most convenient: And in this Order they march forwards towards the Scots. On the other Side King James reckoning upon the Benefit of the Hill, thought the English half mad, to venture a Battel upon such Disadvantage; and thereupon making a Speech to encourage his Soldiers, who were of themselves so forward, that they needed no encouraging, he divided the Battels in this Manner: The main Battel he led himself, to which he appointed two Wings; the Right led by the Earls of Huntley, Crawford, and Montrose; the Left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, together with the Lord Humes, L. Chamberlain: And so confident they were of Victory, that the King first, and after, all the Lords and meaner Men, put away their Horses, as thinking they should not need them; which Confidence was afterward their undoing: For when the Battel being joined, Sir Edward Howard, in getting up the Hill, was assaulted by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, that he was left almost alone, and in manifest Peril to be slain: In comes the Lord Dacres with his Horsemen, and trod under Foot the Scottish Battel of Spears on Foot, which he could not have done, if they had kept their Horses. And this Part of the Scottish Army being led by the Earls of Crawford and Montrose, they were both of them slain, and the whole Battel put to Flight. In another Part also Sir Edward Stanley did the like upon the Battel led by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, putting it to Flight with the Slaughter also of these two Earls. King James notwithstanding, maintained a Fight still with great Resolution, till Sir Adam Forman his Standard-bearer was beaten down; and then not fainting, though despairing of Success, he rushed into the thickest of his Enemies, amongst whom he was beaten down and slain; and to make his Death the more honourable, there died with him three Bishops (whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the King's base Son) two Abbots, twelve Earls, and seventeen Lords; of Knights and Gentlemen very many, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken Prisoners (as Paulus Jovius saith) amongst whom was Sir William Scot, Chancellor to the said King, and Sir George Forman his Serjeant Porter; the Lord Humes and the Lord Huntley got Horses and escaped. Neither was the Battel without Blood to the English; for there was slain at least a thousand, and (that which in a Defeat was strange) many also taken Prisoners; for many in pursuing the Scots went rashly so far, that they knew not which Way to return; and by Bands of Scots that had not fought that Day, were set upon and taken. When the Field was done, the Lord General called to him certain Lords

A.D. 1514 Lords and Gentlemen, and made them Knights; as Sir Edward Howard his Son, the Lord Scroop, Sir William Piercy, Sir Edward George, and others. This Battel was fought on Friday the ninth of September, in the Year 1513, called by some Brampston, by some Floddon Field. King James here slain was the same that had married the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of King Henry VII. and Sister to the present King Henry, and might have enjoyed many happy Days, if he had kept himself firm to his Alliance; but being carried away with the inveterate Spleen between the two Nations, and Propension to France, he ended his Life, though honourably, yet miserably, under many Wounds. It is a very memorable, but scarce credible Thing, which (from the Mouth of a very credible Person who saw it) George Buchanan relates concerning this King; That intending to make a War with England, a certain old Man, of venerable Aspect, and clad in a long blue Garment, came unto him, and leaning familiarly upon the Chair where the King sat, said, I am sent to thee, O King, to give thee Warning, that thou proceed not in the War thou art about; for if thou do, it will be thy Ruin: And having so said, he pressed through the Company, and vanished out of Sight; for by no Enquiry it could be known what became of him. But the King was too resolute to be frightened with Phantasms, and no Warning could divert his Destiny, which had not been Destiny if it could have been diverted. The Day after the Battel, his Body, though disfigured with Wounds, was known by the Lord D'acres and others to be his; and thereupon bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in Lead, was brought to the Monastery of Sheen in Surrey, and there interred; but at the Dissolution of that House was taken up and thrown into a waste Room amongst Timber and Stone; which John Stow saith he so saw; and farther relateth, that the Servants of Lancelot Young, Glasier to Queen Elizabeth, being at Sheen, in new glazing the Windows, either upon a foolish Pleasure, or Desire of the Lead, cut the Head from the rest; but smelling the sweet Perfumes of the Balms, gave it to their Master; who opening the Lead, found therein the Head of a Man, retaining Favour, though the Moisture were clean dried up, whose Hair both of Head and Beard was red; which afterward he caused to be buried at St. Michael's Church in Woodstreet, where he dwelled. But notwithstanding this Relation of Stow, John Lesley, Bishop of Ross, affirmeth, that it was held for certain, the Body thus found, was the Body of the Lord Bauchard slain in that Battel: Buchanan saith, of Alexander Elfinston, who in Countenance and Stature was like the King; and that King James was seen alive the same Night at Kelfo, whence he passed to Jerusalem, and there spent the rest of his Days in holy Contemplation: But howsoever it was, he was never seen any more in Scotland.

King Henry being now returned from Tourney into England, and finding the great Services done in his Absence against the Scots; on the Day of the Purification of our Lady, at Lambeth he created the Earl of Surrey Duke of Norfolk, with an Augmentation of the Arms of Scotland; Sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle, he A.D. 1514 created Duke of Suffolk; the Lord Howard, High Admiral, he made Earl of Surrey; Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Herbert, his chief Chamberlain, Earl of Worcester; and shortly after Sir Edward Stanley he made Lord Monteagle; and in March following, Master Thomas Wolsey his Almoner, was made Bishop of Lincoln. Here before we go further, it will be fit to say something of this Man, that he be not a Rub afterward in the Way of the Story: He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher, sent to Oxford by reason of his Pregnancy of Wit, so soon, that taking there the first Degree of Art, he was called the Boy Batchelor; proceeding in Learning, he was made Fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford, and afterward School-master of the School there, at which Time the Marquess Dorset committed three of his Sons to be instructed by him; and having a Benefice fallen in his Gift, sent for him one Christmas, and bestowed it upon him; whereof Wolsey going to take Possession, at his being there, for what Misdemeanor is not delivered, he was by Sir Amyas Paulet set by the Heels, which afterwards he remembered to Sir James his no small Trouble, for he made him attend his Pleasure five or six Years; all which Time he lay in the Middle-Temple, where he re-edified the Gate-house next the Street very sumptuously, setting the Cardinal's Arms upon it, to appease him. After this Disgrace he went over Sea, where he fell in Acquaintance with Sir John Naphant, Treasurer of Calais, and by him was preferred to be King Henry the Seventh's Chaplain: And now being by this Means in the King's Eye, he so diligently carried himself, that he soon got into the King's Heart. One Time it happened, the King had Occasion to send a Messenger to the Emperor Maximilian, about a Business that required Haste; for which Employment no Man was thought more fit than Wolsey; whereupon, when the King called him, gave him his Errand, and bade him make all Speed he could, Wolsey departed from the King at Richmond about Noon, and by the next Morning was got to Dover, and from thence by Noon that Day was come to Calais, and by Night was with the Emperor; to whom declaring his Message, and having a present Dispatch, he rode that Night back to Calais, and the Night following came to the Court at Richmond. The next Morning he presented himself before the King, who blamed him for not being yet gone, the Matter requiring Haste; to whom Wolsey answered, that he had been with the Emperor, and had dispatched the Business, and for Proof shewed the Emperor's Lines: The King wondered much at his Speed, but then asked him if he met not with his Pursuivant, whom he sent after to advertise him of a special Matter he had forgotten: Whereto Wolsey answered, May it please your Grace, I met him Yesterday upon the Way, but that Business I had dispatched before, taking the Boldness so to do without Commission, as knowing it to be of special Consequence; for which Boldness I humbly entreat your Grace's Pardon. The King not only pardoned him, but bestowed presently upon him the Deanery of Lincoln, and

A.D. 1514 soon after made him his Almoner. In this State K. Henry the Eighth found him, with whom also he grew into such Favour, that he made him of his Council; and having won Tournay, made him Bishop of that City; and returning into England, the Bishoprick of Lincoln falling void by the Death of Doctor Smith, made him Bishop of that Diocese. And thus far the Story hath now brought him; but soon after he was raised higher; for Doctor Bambridge Archbishop of York dying, he was translated from Lincoln to that See: And that he might not be inferior to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he procured of the Pope to be made Cardinal, and Legate à Latere; and after by the King was made Lord Chancellor of England: And being come to his Height of Dignity, he so carried himself in Expences of Household, in Number of Retinue, and in all Circumstances of State, that no Subject before or since hath in any Degree come near him: And, if we may say it, he was the first Debaucher of King Henry; for to the End he might have the managing of all Matters himself, he perswaded the King that he should not need trouble himself with frequenting the Council-Table as he did, but take his Pleasure, and leave those Things to his Council, whereof himself would always give him true Information. This was plausible Counsel, and no Marvel if it were embraced of a young King, coming from the Mouth of so great a Prelate.

The Fields about Islington, Hoxton, and Shoreditch, laid open.

In this fifth Year of the King, the Citizens of London finding themselves grieved with the Inclosures of the common Fields about Islington, Hoxton, and Shoreditch, and other Places adjoining, went one Morning, and threw down all the Hedges, and filled up all the Ditches; whereat, though the King's Council were at first offended, yet the Mayor and City shewed them such Reasons, that they rested satisfied, and the Fields were never since hedged.

The Pope gives King Henry the Title of Christianissimo.

On the nineteenth of May this Year, Pope Julius the Second sent to King Henry a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being angry with the King of France, transferred, by Authority of the Lateran Council, the Title of Christianissimo from him upon King Henry, which with great Solemnity was published the Sunday following, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; but this Solemnity must not pass without Revelling, Masques, and Jufts; wherein the King and the Duke of Suffolk were Defendants against all Comers; who having the Duke of Longueville and the Lord of Clermont to be Spectators, spread the Fame of their Chivalry into foreign Nations.

And now the great Love that had been long between King Henry and the Flemmings, began to abate upon this Occasion: King Henry the Seventh had concluded a Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain; but by reason of her young Years, and for want of Assurance of Jointure, the Match was deferred during his Time, but now King Henry the Eighth seeing his Sister of convenient Years, began to call upon it, and signify so much to the Council of Flanders; but they, whether having other Ends, or out of Spanish Delays, put him off with Excuses, and at last sent him Word plainly, they could do nothing in it that

Year. The King of France had soon Intelligence how much King Henry distasted these Spanish Dealings, and meant to make some good Use of it, for the Ends he began to propose to himself; which were to get the Lady Mary for himself, and thereby procure Peace with England, being now old, and weary of the War. And for this Purpose he got the new Pope Leo the Tenth to be his Mediator, and both of them sent Ambassadors to King Henry; the Pope to perswade him to have Peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Lady Mary, upon whose Ambassages King Henry, partly to satisfy the Pope, and partly to advance his Sister, did not unwillingly hearken to the Motions: But while this was in working, Prior John (who knew nothing of these Intentions) began again to play his Pranks; and coming with his Gallies on the Coast of Sussex, burnt Bright-helmstead, and took away the Goods he found in the Village: Whereupon the Lord Admiral sent Sir John Wallope to Sea, with divers Ships, and eight hundred Men, who for one Village that Prior John burnt in England, burnt one and twenty Villages and Towns in France, to the great Honour of himself and his Country.

And now King Henry, by Advice of his Council, and specially of Wolsey, Bishop of Lincoln, concluded both the Peace with France, and the Marriage of his Sister the Lady Mary with the French King; but yet it stuck a while upon some Differences, King Henry demanding Boulogne, and the King of France Tournay: In Conclusion these Demands were waved, and the principal Conditions were, first, concerning the Lady's Jointure; that she should have two and thirty thousand Crowns of Yearly Revenues, if she survived the King; and then concerning this Peace, that the French King should pay Yearly to King Henry, for five Years, one hundred thousand Crowns, and the Peace to continue between them during their Lives, and a Year after, and bound reciprocally to assist each other with ten thousand Foot, if the War were by Land; with six thousand, if by Sea. All Things thus concluded, the Lady Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen; and on the second of October taking Shipping, was conducted by the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess Dorset, the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Surrey, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Monteagle, Sir Maurice Berkeley, Sir John Peckye, Sir William Sands, Sir Thomas Bulleyne, Sir John Carre, and many other Knights and Ladies; but being not past half way over the Sea, their Ships by Tempest were dispersed, and the Lady, with some Jeopardy, landed at Boulogne, where Sir Christopher Garnish was fain to stand in the Water, and take her in his Arms, and so set her on Shore; and there the Duke of Vendosme, with a Cardinal, and many other great States received her. From Boulogne the eighth of October she came to Abbeville, where the Dauphin received her: On the Morrow being Saint Dennis's Day, she came to Saint Dennis, where the Marriage between the King of France and her was solemnized (though some write it had been solemnized before at Abbeville.) The fifth of November she was Crowned Queen of France; at which Time the Dauphin held the Crown

A Peace is concluded with France; and the King of France marries the Lady Mary, King Henry's younger Sister.

The She is Crowned Queen of France.

A.D. 1515 Crown over her Head, as being too maffy for her to wear; and the Day following she was received into Paris in most magnificent Manner. In Honour of whose Marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin ordered a solemn Just to be proclaimed, which should be kept in Paris the 7th of November. Upon Report of this Proclamation in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, and his four Brothers, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Nevil, Sir Giles Capel, Thomas Cheyney, and others, obtained Leave of the King to be at the Challenge, where they all behaved themselves with great Valour, but specially the Duke of Suffolk, whose Glory the Dauphin so much envied, that he got a Dutchman, the tallest and strongest Man in all the Court of France, secretly as another Person to encounter him, with a Purpose to have the Duke foiled; but indeed it turned to his greater Honour; for he foiled the Dutchman in such sort, that when they came to the Barriers, the Duke by main Strength took him about the Neck, and so pommelled him about the Head, that he made the Blood issue out at his Nose: Many other Princes and Lords did bravely; and after three Days the Justs ended.

A Just proclaimed in Paris by the Dauphin.

Where Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, won great Honour.

King Henry was not long behind to solemnize it in England also; for at Greenwich the Christmas following, on New-Years Night, and Twelfth Night, he presented such strange and magnificent Devices as had seldom been seen; and the third of February following, he held a solemn Just, where he and the Marquess Dorset answered all Comers; at which Time the King brake three and twenty Spears, and threw to the Ground one that encountred him both Man and Horse.

The King of France, 82 Days after his Marriage, dies.

Anno Reg. 7. 1516.

The Duke of Suffolk sent to fetch over the Queen Dowager of France, marries her.

At this Time Preparation was making for King Henry in Person to go to Calais, there to meet with the French King and Queen, but Death hindered the Design; for before the next Spring, the first of January, the French King died at the City of Paris, fourscore and two Days after his Marriage; teaching others by his Example, what it is for an old Man to marry a young Lady. King Henry hearing of the French King's Death, sent the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Richard Wingfield, and Dr. West, to bring over the Queen Dowager, according to the Covenants of the Marriage. Whereupon the Queen was delivered to the Duke by Indenture, who, obtaining her Good-will to be her Husband (which was no hard Matter, that had been her first Love) wrote to the King her Brother for his Consent; whereat the King seemed to stick a while, but at last consented; so as he brought her into England unmarried, and then married at his Return; but the Duke for more Surety married her secretly in Paris, and after having received her Dower, Apparel, and Jewels, came with her to Calais, and there openly married her with great Solemnity. At their coming into England, King Henry, to shew his Contentment with the Marriage, in the Company of the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, and the Earl of Essex, all richly apparelled, held a new kind of Justs, and running Courses on Horseback in Manner volant, as fast as one could follow another, to the great Delight of the Beholders.

A new kind of Justs used by K. Henry.

This Year the King being at his Manor of A.D. 1516 Okings, Wolsey, Archbishop of York, came and shewed him Letters that he was elected Cardinal; for which Dignity he disabled himself, till the King willed him to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him Lord Cardinal; but his Hat and Bull were not yet come: After which Dr. Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor of England, finding Wolsey, being no Cardinal, to meddle more in his Office of Chancellorship than he could well suffer, resigned up the Seal, which the King presently gave to Wolsey. About this Time Cardinal Campejus was sent by Pope Leo to King Henry, to sollicit him to a War against the Turk, with whom Cardinal Wolsey was joined in Commission; who, hearing of the ragged Retinue of his Fellow-Cardinal, sent Store of red Cloth to Calais to make them fit Followers of so great a Lord: And when Campejus was landed at Dover, Cardinal Wolsey caused the Gentry of Kent to wait upon him to Blackbeath; where he was met and received by the Duke of Norfolk and many Prelates, and there, in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, shifted himself into his Cardinal Robes. Eight Mules he had laden with Necessaries; but Wolsey not thinking them enough for his Honour, sent him twelve more. But now see the Shame of Pride; for in Cheapside his Mules, by some Mischance, overthrew their Carriages and Coffers on the Ground, whose Lids flying open, shewed the World what Treasure it was they carried, old Breeches, Boots, and broken Shoes, broken Meat, Marrow-bones, and Crusts of Bread, exposing him to the Laughter of all the People; yet the Cardinal went jogging on afore with his Crosses, guilt Ax and Mace, unto St. Paul's Church; and by the Way had an Oration made him by Sir Thomas More, in the Name of the City, and then waited on with many Bishops, was conducted to Bath Place, where he was lodged: For his own Particular, he got well by the Journey, for the King gave him the Bishoprick of Salisbury: But the Errand he came about, which was to have Aid by Money for a War against the Turk, he could not obtain, for it was well known to be but a Device to get Money, without any Intention of what was pretended.

Wolsey is made a Cardinal and Lord Chancellor.

In his seventh Year King Henry kept his Christmas at his Manor of Eltham, where, on Twelfth-night, according to his Custom, was a stately Mask of Knights and Ladies, with solemn Dancing, and a most magnificent Banquet.

Anno Reg. 7.

It was now the eighth Year of King Henry's Reign, when the new League between him and the French King was proclaimed in the City of London: And this Year Margaret Queen of Scots, eldest Sister to King Henry, having before married Archibald Dowglas Earl of Angus, by reason of Diffension amongst the Lords of Scotland, was glad with her Husband to fly into England, and to seek Succour at her Brother's Hands, who assigned to her the Castle of Harbottle in Northumberland to reside in, where she was delivered of a Daughter named Margaret. From thence the King sent for her and her Husband to come to his Court, and thereupon Margaret Queen of Scots, King Henry's Sister, comes into England.

A.D. 1517 upon the third of May, Queen Margaret riding on a white Palfrey, which the Queen of England had sent her, behind Sir Thomas Parre, came through London to Baynard's Castle, and from thence went to Greenwich: But her Husband the Earl of Angus was secretly before departed into Scotland; which when King Henry heard, he only said it was done like a Scot. And now in Honour of his Sister's coming, King Henry the nine and twentieth of May appointed two solemn Days of Jufts, where the King, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Essex, and Nicholas Carew, Esq; took upon them to answer all Comers; amongst others, the King and Sir William Kingston ran together, which Sir William, though a strong and valorous Knight, yet the King overthrew him to the Ground: All the rest was performed with no less Valour than Magnificence. This Year died the King of Arragon, Father to the Queen of England; for whom was kept a solemn Obsequy in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; and Queen Margaret, after she had been a Year in England, returned into Scotland.

Twelve hundred Carpenters and Masons sent to build a Castle at Tournay. Cardinal Wolsey erects divers new Courts.

In this Year were sent twelve hundred Carpenters and Masons, with three hundred Labourers, to the City of Tournay, to build a Castle there, to keep the City in Awe. And now the Cardinal being weary of hearing so many Causes himself, as were daily brought before him, ordained by the King's Commission, after the Pattern of Moses, divers Under-courts to hear Complaints of Suitors; whereof one was kept in Whitehall, another before the King's Almoner, Dr. Stokesley, a third in the Lord Treasurer's Lodging near the Star-Chamber, and the fourth at the Rolls, in the Afternoon. These Courts for a Time were much frequented; but at last the People perceiving that much Delay was used in them, and that Sentence given by them bound no Man by Law, they thereupon grew weary of them, and resorted to the Common Law. By Occasion of this Government of the Cardinal, who, under Colour of Justice, did what he pleased, many great Men withdrew themselves from the Court; as first the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, who went and lived in their Dioceses; then the Duke of Norfolk, and at length the Duke of Suffolk, being run deep into the King's Debt, by reason of his many Employments into France, and his great House-keeping since his Marriage with the King's Sister, hoping the King would have forgiven it, and would, no doubt, have done it, but that the Cardinal opposed it, to the End the Duke should be the more at his Command.

In October this Year, Matthew, Bishop of Sion, commonly called the Cardinal of the Swissers, came into England from the Emperor Maximilian; by whose soliciting, and Cardinal Wolsey's Perswasion, the King lent the Emperor a great Sum of Money; for Wolsey being angry with the King of France for detaining the Revenues of his Bishoprick of Tournay, persuaded King Henry, that the best Way to abate the French King's Power, was to furnish the Emperor with Money, the better to maintain War against him; and what Wolsey said, was in those Days to King Henry an Oracle.

This Year the King kept his Christmas at his A.D. 1517 Manor of Greenwich, where, on Twelfth-night, according to his Custom, rare Devices with great Magnificence were presented; after which King Henry Time the King exercised himself much in Hawking, which was like to have proved no good Sport to him; for one Time following his Hawk, and leaping over a Ditch with a Pole, the Pole brake, so that if one Edmund Mody a Foot-man had not leaped into the Water, and lift up his Head, which was fast in the Clay, he had been drowned.

In this Year also there happened in the City of London an Insurrection against Strangers, specially Artificers, complaining that Strangers were permitted to resort hither with their Wares, and to exercise Handy-crafts, to the great Hindrance and Impoverishing the King's own Subjects; and not only so, but that they were born out in many great Insolencies and Wrongs they offered to the English; as one Time it happened, a Carpenter in London, called Williamson, had bought two Pigeons in Cheapside, and was about to pay for them, when a French-man took them out of his Hand, saying, They were no Meat for a Carpenter: Well, said Williamson, I have bought them, and I will have them: Nay, said the French-man, I will have them for my Lord Ambassador: Hereupon they grew to Words, and Complaint was made to the French Ambassador, who so aggravated the Matter to the Mayor, that the Carpenter was sent to Prison; and when Sir John Baker sued to the Ambassador for him, he answered, By the Body of God, the English Knave was worthy to lose his Life for denying any thing to a French-man; and other Answer he could have none. Many like and worse Insolencies were offered by Strangers, which one John Lincoln a Broker drew into a Bill, and prevailed with Dr. Beale, Preacher on Easter-Tuesday at the Spittle, to read it openly in the Pulpit, which so stirred up many, that Strangers could hardly pass the Streets, but were stricken, and sometimes beat down. At last, one Evening, many Apprentices and others assembling, rifled some Strangers Houses, and much Mischief was like to be done; but by the Care of the Mayor and Aldermen, and by the Industry of Robert Brook Recorder, and Sir Thomas More, that had been Under-Sheriff of London, they were gotten to be quiet, and many of the Disturbers were sent to Prison, whereof Lincoln and twelve others were hanged, four hundred more in their Shirts, bound in Ropes, and Halters about their Necks (and thereupon called The Black Waggon) were brought to Westminster, where the King himself sat that Day; and when the Cardinal had charged them with the Greatness of their Offence, they all cried, Mercy, Mercy: And then the King, by the Mouth of the Cardinal, pardoned them all; which Clemency purchased the King no small Love amongst the People.

In his ninth Year, in June, King Henry had many Ambassadors at his Court; for whose Anno Reg. 9. 1518. Entertainment he prepared a costly Just, himself and twelve more against the Duke of Suffolk and other twelve. The King had on his Head a Lady's Sleeve full of Diamonds, and perhaps

A.D. 1518 perhaps something else of the Lady's in his Heart, which made him perform his Courses with the Applause of all Beholders. This Year, by reason of a Sweating-sickness, Michaelmas Term was adjourned: And the Year following Trinity Term was held one Day at Oxford, and then adjourned again to Westminster.

About this Time Cardinal Wolsey obtained of Pope Leo Authority to dispense with all Offences against the Spiritual Laws; by Virtue whereof he set up a Court, and called it, The Court of the Legate, in the which he proved Testaments, and heard Causes, to the great Hindrance of all the Bishops of the Realm, and to the debauching of Priests and religious Persons, who, relying upon his Greatness, took such a Liberty of Licentiousness to themselves, that none were more disorderly than those that were in Orders; and supposing, perhaps, they might lawfully commit such Sins themselves, as they forgave to others. And indeed the Cardinal's Carriage exceeded all Bounds of Moderation; for when he said Mass, he made Dukes and Earls to serve him of Wine, with a Say taken, and to hold the Basin at the Lavatory: And when the Archbishop of Canterbury, writing a Letter to him, subscribed, Your Brother William of Canterbury, he took it in great Dudgeon to be termed his Brother.

Cardinal Wolsey makes Dukes and Earls to serve him of Wine, and to hold the Basin at the Lavatory.

An. Reg. 10. 1519.

A Treaty between the Kings of France and England to have Tournay delivered back, and upon what Conditions.

It was now the tenth Year of King Henry's Reign, when the King of France, longing much to have Tournay restored to him, by great Gifts, and greater Promises, won the Cardinal Wolsey to move the King in it; who, upon his Persuasions, was contented to be treated withal about it: To which the King of France sent the Lord Bonquet, High Admiral of France, and the Bishop of Paris, who, in their Attendance, having above fourscore Gentlemen, and, with their Servants and all, above twelve hundred, arrived in England, and on Monday the seven and twentieth of September, were met at Blackheath by the Earl of Surrey, High Admiral of England, attended likewise with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodged at Merchant-Taylors-Hall. The last of September the Ambassadors went to the King at Greenwich, where, after long Communication, an Agreement was at last concluded under Pretence of a Marriage to be had between the Dauphin of France and the Lady Mary, Daughter to the King of England; that in Name of her Marriage-Money, Tournay should be delivered to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Castle he had made in that City, six hundred thousand Crowns in twelve Years, but fifty thousand Crowns Yearly: And if the Marriage should chance not to take Effect, then that Tournay should be again restored to the King of England; for Performance of which Articles Hostages should be delivered; namely, Monsieur de Momorancie, Monsieur de Monpesac, Monsieur de Moy, and Monsieur Morret; and moreover, the French King should pay to the Cardinal of England a thousand Marks Yearly, in Recompence of his Revenues, received before of his Bishoprick of Tournay. All Things thus concluded, the Cardinal made for the Ambassador a solemn Banquet, and afterward presented them with a stately Mummary. The A.D. 1519 eighth of October the King feasted them at Greenwich, and at Night presented a stately Mask of Knights and Ladies, with rare Devices and great Magnificence: The next Day Sir Thomas Exmew, Mayor of London, feasted them at Goldsmiths-Hall, and then, delivering their four Hostages, they took their Leave. At whose Departure the King gave to the Admiral of France a Garnish of gilt Vessel, a Pair of covered Basons gilt, twelve great gilt Bowls, four Pair of great gilt Pots, a standing Cup of Gold, garnished with great Pearls; and to some other he gave Plate, to some other Chains of Gold, to some rich Apparel, to the great Commendation of his Liberality. Shortly after their Departure, the Earl of Worcester, Lord Chamberlain, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Nicholas Vaux, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Thomas Bullen, as Ambassadors from the King of England, accompanied with Knights, Gentlemen, and others, to the Number of above four hundred, passed over to Calais, and from thence went to Paris; where, after Royal Entertainment by the King, with divers Masks and stately Shews, they took their Leaves and rode to Tournay, to see the City delivered to the French-men, on the eighth of February, to the great Grief of the English Garrison. After the English Ambassadors were returned, King Henry, to cheer up the four French Hostages left here for Performance of Covenants, on the seventh of May, presented a solemn and stately Mask, wherein himself, the Duke of Suffolk, and the French Queen were Actors: And on the eighth of March following was a solemn Just holden, and with great Magnificence performed.

In the eleventh Year of King Henry's Reign died the Emperor Maximilian, for whom the King caused a solemn Obsequy to be kept in St. Paul's Church. After whose Death the French King and the King of Spain endeavoured, by sundry Plots, each of them to get the Empire; but in Conclusion, Charles King of Castile (afterwards called Charles V.) was elected Emperor; for Joy whereof a solemn Mass was sung at St. Paul's the seventh of July, at which were present the Cardinal Campejus, the Cardinal of York, the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk, and Suffolk, with the Ambassadors of Spain, France, Venice, and Scotland: And this Year the King kept St. George's Feast at Windsor with great Solemnity.

An. Reg. 11. 1520. The Emperor Maximilian dieth; Charles, King of Castile, is elected in his Place, called Charles V.

At this Time divers young Gentlemen that had been in France, after the Manner of that Country, carried themselves so familiarly with the King, that the Lords of his Council thought it a Disparagement to him; and thereupon, with his Leave first obtained, they banished them the Court; and in their Places brought in more stayed and graver Men, namely, Sir Richard Wingfield, Sir Richard Feringham, Sir Richard Weston, and Sir William Kingston.

Young Gentlemen, after the French Fashion, being over-familiar with the King, are banished the Court.

In the Summer of this Year, the Queen, lying at her Manor of Havering in Essex, desired the King to bring thither the four Hostages of France, to whom she made a Royal Banquet, and in September following, the King lying at his Manor of New-hall in Essex, otherwile called

Beaulieu,

A.D. 1520 Beaulieu, where he had newly built a stately Mansion, invited the Queen and the French Hostages thither; where, after a sumptuous Banquet, he presented them with an extraordinary Mask; for the Maskers were the Duke of Suffolk, and the Earl of Essex, the Marquess Dorset, the Lord Abergavenny, Sir Richard Wingfield, Sir Richard Weston, and Sir William Kingston; the youngest of whom was fifty Years old at least, that the Ladies might see what Force they had to make Age young again.

A Mask of all Lords.

An Interview agreed upon between the two Kings of France and England.

At this Time the French King was very desirous to see the King of England, with whom he had entered into such a League of Alliance, and to that End made Means to the Cardinal, that there might be an Interview between them at some convenient Place: To which the Cardinal, not so much to satisfy the French King, as to shew his own Greatness in France, easily condescended; and thereupon persuaded King Henry how necessary it was, that such an Interview should be: And then there were sent to Guynes, under the Rule of Sir Edward Belknappe, some say three thousand, but Godwin saith eleven hundred; whereof three hundred Masons, six hundred Carpenters, two hundred Painters, Glaziers, and other Artificers, who spent two Months in erecting the Building builded on the Plain before the Castle of Guynes, a most stately Palace of Timber, curiously garnished without and within: Whither both the Kings in June next following, agreeing to come, and to answer all Comers at the Tilt, Tournies, and Barriers; whereof Proclamation was made in the Court of England, by Orleans King of Arms of France, and in the Court of France by Clarenceux King of Arms in England: Whilst these Things were preparing on Candlemas-Even, as the King and Queen were come from Even-song, at their Manor of Greenwich; suddenly there blew a Trumpet, and then entred into the Queen's Chamber four Gentlemen, who brought with them a Waggon, in which sat a Lady richly apparelled; which Lady acquainted the King, that the four Gentlemen there present, were come for the Love of their Ladies, to answer all Comers at the Tilts, on a Day by the King to be appointed; which Day was thereupon appointed on Shrove-Tuesday next ensuing, where they all behaved themselves with great Valour, to the great Delight of the King and Queen.

The Emperor Charles comes into England.

By this Time King Henry was ready for his Journey into France, and so removing from his Manor of Greenwich, on Friday the five and twentieth of May, he with his Queen arrived at Canterbury, where he meant to keep his Whitsuntide. At which Time the Emperor Charles, returning out of Spain, arrived on the Coast of Kent, where, by the Vice-Admiral of England, Sir William Fitz-Williams, he was conducted to Land, and there met and received by the Lord Cardinal in great State. After which the King himself rode to Dover, to welcome him; and on Whitsunday early in the Morning, conducted him to Canterbury, where they spent all the Whitsuntide in great Joy and Solace. The chief Cause that moved the Emperor at this Time to come on Land, was to have dissuaded the King from any Interview with the French King; but when he saw him so forward in that Journey, he then only endeavoured to persuade him, that he should put no Truth in the French King's Words, and with great Gifts and Promises, prevailed with the Cardinal to join with him in this Persuasion. The last of May the Emperor took his Leave, and the same Day the King made sail from Dover and landed at Calais, together with the Queen and many Lords and Ladies. The fourth of June the King and Queen removed from Calais to his Princely Lodging beside the Town of Guynes, the most Royal Building that ever was seen: Likewise Francis the French King had his Lodging prepared close to the Town of Ard, in a strange, but most magnificent Fashion. Both Kings had given Power and Authority to the Cardinal to affirm and confirm, bind or unbind, whatsoever should be in Difference between them; no less an Honour to the Cardinal than a Confidence in the King. On Thursday the seventh of June, the Kings met in the Vale of Audran so magnificently attired, both themselves and all their Followers, that from thence it was called the Camp of Cloth of Gold. Here they spent that Day in loving Complements, and at Night departed, the one to Guynes, the other to Ard. On Saturday the ninth of June, were set up in a Place, within the English Pale, two Trees of Honour, with stately Rooms and Stages for the Queens, and thither the two Kings came, most Royally accompanied; where in most magnificent Manner they performed Acts of Valour, both on Foot and Horseback; and after them, all the great Lords both of France and England did the like. This Solemnity of Jufts and Masks was continued to the four and twentieth Day of June; at which Time the Kings and Queens took leave of each other: The French King and Queen removed to Ard, the King and Queen of England to Calais, where he remained till the tenth of July, and then riding toward Graveling, was by the Way met by the Emperor, and by him conducted thither, and there in most Royal Manner entertained; whereof when the French King heard, he began from that Day forward to have King Henry in a kind of Jealousy, as though to love him and the Emperor both were inconsistent, and could not stand together. On Wednesday the eleventh of July, the Emperor, and his Aunt, the Lady Margaret Duchess of Savoy, came with the King of England to the Town of Calais, and there continued with Feasting, Dancing, and Masking, till the fourteenth of July. In which Time, all the Articles of the League Tripartite, between the Emperor and the Kings of England and France were reviewed; to which the King of France had so fully condescended, that he had sent Monsieur de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of Credence; that on the Word of a Prince he would inviolably observe and keep them all: All which, notwithstanding, he dispensed with his Conscience afterward, in breaking them all. On Saturday, July 14, the Emperor took his Leave and went to Graveling; the King with his Queen returned into England.

It was now the twelfth Year of King Henry's Reign, when being returned from Calais, he kept his Christmas at Greenwich with great Magnificence;

The two Kings meet in so magnificent a Manner, that the Place was called the Camp of Cloth of Gold.

The King of France is jealous of King Henry's Kindness to the Emperor.

A.D. 1520 nificence; and on Twelfth-day, he and the Earl of Devonshire maintained a solemn Just against all Comers.

The Cardinal had long born a Spleen against the Duke of Buckingham, and now finds Means to work his Will.

The Cardinal had long bore a Grudge against the Duke of Buckingham, for speaking certain Words in his Disgrace, and now hath made his Way for Revenge. It is said, that the Duke once holding the Balon to the King, the Cardinal, when the King had done, presently dipped his Hands in the same Water; which the Duke disdaining, shed the Water in his Shoes; with which the Cardinal incensed, threatened him, that he would sit upon his Skirts. The Duke, to shew that the King might take Notice of the Cardinal's Malice, came the next Day to Court richly apparelled, but without Skirts to his Doublet. The King demanding, What he meant by that strange Fashion? He answered readily, that it was done by Way of Prevention; for now the Cardinal should not sit upon his Skirts. But this Jest did the Duke no good, for the Earl of Surrey, Lord Admiral, who had married the Duke's Daughter, the Cardinal had caused to be sent Deputy into Ireland, and the Earl of Northumberland, the Duke's special Friend, he had caused upon certain suggested Crimes to be imprisoned; so as the Duke having his Friends sequestred from him, he lay now open to Accusations, and Accusations shall not be wanting; for the Duke having, some Time before, put from him in Displeasure one Charles Knevet, that had been his Surveyor, and inward with him; him the Cardinal gets to him, to see what he could get out of him against the Duke. And whether it was out of Desire of Revenge, or out of Hope of Reward, or that the Matter was so indeed, this Knevet confessed to the Cardinal, that this Duke had once fully determined to make away the King; being brought into a Hope to be King himself, by a vain Prophecy, which one Nicholas Hopkins (a Monk of a House of the Charter Order, besides Bristol, called Henton) sometimes his Confessor, had opened to him; and as for the Cardinal, that he had often heard the Duke swear, he would punish him soundly for his manifold Mis-doings. And now had the Cardinal Matter enough for Accusation, which he aggravated to the King, that the King bade him do with him according to Law. Hereupon the Duke is apprehended, and brought to the Tower by Sir Henry Morney, Captain of the Guard, the fifteenth of April, and shortly after in Guild-hall, before Sir John Brugge, then Lord Mayor, was indicted of divers Points of High-Treason; the Substance whereof was, that in the second Year of the King's Reign, and at divers Times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the King's Death at London, and at Thornbury in Gloucestershire; and that in the sixth Year of the King's Reign, he went in Person to the Priory of Henton, and there had Conference with the foresaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him he should be King; and that he had often said to the Lord Abergavenny, who had married his Daughter, that if King Henry died without Issue, he would look to have the Crown himself. Upon these Points he was arraigned in Westminster-Hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting then as High-Steward of England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, the A.D. 1520 Earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford and Derby; the Lord of St. John, De la Ware, Fitz-Water, Willoughby, Brook, Cobham, Herbert, and Morley. The Duke pleaded for himself till he sweat again, but all booted not; for by these Peers he was found guilty and condemned, and so on Friday the seventeenth of May, was led by John Keyme, and John Skevington, Sheriffs of London, to the Scaffold on Tower-hill, and there beheaded. The Augustine-Friers took his Body and Head, and buried them. This Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, was the last Hereditary High-Constable of England (the greatest Place in the Kingdom) whose Power extended to restrain some Actions of the King. He was also Earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton: He married Eleanor, the Daughter of Henry Earl of Northumberland, and had Issue Henry, Lord Stafford (Father to Henry Lord Stafford late living) and three Daughters, Elizabeth, married to Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey; Katharine, married to Ralph Nevil, Earl of Westmorland, and Mary, married to George Nevil, Lord of Abergavenny.

The Duke of Buckingham is beheaded. His Honours and Issue.

In this mean while, a new War was begun between the Emperor and the King of France; for composing whereof, the Cardinal of York was sent attended with the Earls of Worcester, Lord Chamberlain, the Lord of St. Johns, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Herbert, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, the Primate of Armagh, Sir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Pechy, Sir John Hufsey, Sir Richard Wingfield, Sir Henry Guildford, and many other Knights, Gentlemen, and Doctors. On the twelfth of July he arrived at Calais, whither came to him the Chancellor of France, and the Count de Palice, attended with four hundred Horse, as Ambassadors from the French King; and from the Emperor the like, with Commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Ambassadors from the Pope, whom the Cardinal moved to have the Pope to be a Party also in their League; but they wanting Commission, Letters were presently sent to Rome about it, and in mean Time till Answer might be had, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to speak with the Emperor, with whom having stayed thirteen Days, after most Royal Entertainment, he returned back to Calais; and then fell presently to the Treaty of Peace with the French Commissioners, but was colder in the Matter than he was before, as having had his Edge taken off by some Dealings with the Emperor, so as nothing was concluded; but that these Fishermen of both the Princes might freely fish on the Seas without Disturbance, till the End of February following, whereof he sent Advertisement to both the Princes; to the Emperor by the Lord of Saint Johns, and Sir Thomas Bullen; to the French King by the Earl of Worcester, and the Bishop of Ely. During all which Time of the Cardinal's Stay in Calais, all Writs and Patents were there by him sealed, and no Sheriff could be chosen for lack of his Presence, having the great Seal there with him, and full Power in Things, as if the King had been there in Person. Before he returned, he made a new it.

The Cardinal is sent to make a Peace between the Emperor and the King of France, but deals not fair.

The Cardinal carries the Great Seal over with him, and the Inconveniences by new it.

A.D. 1520 new League with the Emperor, and intimated to the French King, that he doubted the King of England would not hereafter be so much his Friend, as heretofore he had been; whereat, though the King of France were much offended, yet he signified by his Letters (perhaps dissemblingly) that he would continue the King of England's Friend as much as ever; only he inveighed against the Cardinal, as a Man of no Truth, and withdrew many Pensions which he had before given to some English. Presently upon this, was Tournay besieged by the Lord Hugh de Moncada, a Spaniard; and though the French King sent great Forces to succour it, yet it was rendred up to the Emperor, the last of November, in the thirteenth Year of K. Henry's Reign.

This Year Pope Leo died the first of December, suspected to be poisoned by Barnaby Malespina, his Chamberlain, whose Office was always to give him Drink. After whose Death, Doctor Pace was sent to Rome, to make Friends in the Behalf of the Cardinal of York, who was brought into a Hope through the King's Favour to be elected Pope; but that Hope was soon quelled; for before Doctor Pace could get to Rome, Adrian VI. was chosen Pope. This Doctor Pace was a very learned and religious Man, yet through Crosses in his Employment fell mad, and died; in whose Place of Employment succeeded Doctor Stephen Gardiner.

The Cardinal seeks to be Pope, but too late.

Dr. Pace, the Cardinal's Agent, falls mad, and dieth.

An. Reg. 13. 1522.

King Henry, for writing a Book against Luther, hath the Title given him to be Defender of the Faith.

On the second of February, King Henry being then at Greenwich, received a Bull from the Pope, whereby he had the Title given him to be Defender of the Christian Faith, for him and his Successors for ever; which Title was ascribed to him for writing a Book against Luther, as it was given out; but thought to be written by Sir Thomas More, or by Fisher, Bishop of Rockester: Of which Book, saith Holinshed, I will only say thus much, that King Henry in his Book, is reported to rage against the Devil and Antichrist, to cast out his Foam against Luther, to rase out the Name of the Pope, and yet to allow his Law. Which Book Luther answered with as little Respect to the King, as the King had done to him.

In this mean Time, many Displeasures grew between the two Kings of England and France, specially two: One, that French-men seized upon English Ships as they passed: For Remedy whereof, one Christopher Cee, an expert Seaman, was sent with six Ships to safeguard the Merchants. Another, that the Duke of Albany was returned into Scotland, contrary to that which was covenanted by the League; which though the King of France denied to be done with his Privy, yet King Henry knew the Duke of Albany had Commission from the French King to return, which did the more exasperate him; and hereupon were Musters made in England, and a Note taken of what Substance all Men were.

This Year died the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy and Sir Edward Belknappe, all valiant Captains, suspected to have been poisoned at a Banquet made at Ard, when the two Kings met last.

At this Time Owen Douglas, Bishop of Dunkell, fled out of Scotland into England, because the Duke of Albany, being come thither, had A.D. 1522 taken upon him the whole Government of the King and Kingdom; whereupon Clarenceaux, the Herald, was sent into Scotland, to command the Duke of Albany to avoid that Realm; which he refusing, the Herald was commanded to defy him. Thereupon the French King seized all English-men's Goods in Bordeaux, and imprisoned their Persons; and retained not only the Money to be paid for the Restitution of Tournay, but also withheld the French Queen's Dower: Whereof, when King Henry understood, he called the French Ambassador residing in England, to give Account thereof; who though he gave the best Reasons he could to excuse it, yet was commanded to keep his House, and the French Hostages remaining here, for the Money to be paid for the Delivery of Tournay, were restrained of their Liberty, and committed to the Custody of the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Andrew Windsor, and Sir Thomas Nevil, each of them to keep one; and withal, all French-men in London were committed to Prison, and put to their Fines; and all Scotch-men much more. There were then also sent to Sea under the Conduct of Sir William Fitzwilliams, Vice-Admiral, eight and twenty great Ships, and seven more towards Scotland; who set Fire on many Scotish Ships in the Haven, and at length took many Prisoners and returned.

King Henry hearing that the Emperor would come to Calais, so to pass into England, as he went into Spain, appointed the Lord Marques Dorset to go to Calais, there to receive him, and the Cardinal to receive him at Dover.

The Cardinal taking his Journey thither on the tenth of May, rode through London, accompanied with two Earls, six and thirty Knights, and an hundred Gentlemen, eight Bishops, ten Abbots, thirty Chaplains, all in Velvet and Sattin; and Yeomen seven hundred. The five and twentieth of May, being Sunday, the Marques of Dorset, with the Bishop of Chichester, the Lord de la Ware, and divers others at the Water of Graveling, received the Emperor, and with all Honour brought him to Calais, where he was received with Procession, by the Lord Berners, Lieutenant of the Town. On Monday he took Shipping at Calais, and landed at Dover; where the Cardinal, with three hundred Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen received him, and in great State brought him to the Castle, where he was lodged. On Wednesday, being Ascension-Even, the King came to Dover, and there with great Joy and Gladness the Emperor and he met. On Friday in the Afternoon they departed from Dover, and came that Night to Canterbury, and from thence next Day to Greenwich; where the Queen received her Nephew with all the Joy that might be. Here, to honour the Emperor's Presence, Royal Jufts and Tournies were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonshire, and ten Aids, kept the Place against the Duke of Suffolk, the Marques Dorset, and other ten Aids, on their Part. On Friday the sixth of June, the Emperor and the King, with all their Companies, went to London; where the City

The Emperor comes into England, and with what State he is received.

A.D. 1522 City received them with Pageants, and other as rare Devices, as at a Coronation, and the Emperor was lodged at the Black-Friers, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whit-Sunday the King and the Emperor rode to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where the Cardinal sung Mass, and had his Traverse and his Cup-board. Before Mass, two Barons gave him Water, and after the Gospel, two Earls, and at the last Lavatory two Dukes, which Pride the Spaniards much disdained. After many Feastings in other Places, at last they rode to Windsor, where they stayed a whole Week; and there, on Corpus Christi Day, the Emperor wore the Mantle of the Garter, and sat in his own Stall. On the same Day both the Princes received the Sacrament, and took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them. On the Morrow after, they came to Winchester; before whose coming thither there was come to Hampton, the Earl of Surrey, Admiral of England, with all the King's Navy, and with him the Lord Fitz-water, the Baron Curson, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, Sir William Barentine, Sir Adrian Fortescue, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Anthony Poyns, Sir Henry Sherbourn, and the Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-williams, Sir Edmund Bray, Sir Giles Capel, Sir William Pirton, John Cornwallis, Sir John Wallop, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir William Sidney, Anthony Brown, Giles Hussy, Thomas More, John Russel, Edward Bray, Henry Owen, George Cobham, Thomas Oldball, Thomas Lovel, Robert Ichingham, Anthony Knewet, Sir John Tremaile, Sir William Shewington, Master of the Ordnance, and John Fabian, Serjeant at Arms, by whom chiefly a Design was moved, though now noised only, that it was but to scour the Seas for the safe conducting of the Emperor. For the Earl of Surrey, having waisted the Emperor over to the Coast of Biscay, upon his Return made to the Coast of Britain; and there landing seven thousand of his Men, marched to the Town of Morlaix, and by Assault took it: Having won this Town, the Earl called to him certain Gentlemen, and made them Knights, as Sir Francis Brian, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas More, Sir Giles Hussy, Sir John Russel, Sir John Rainsford, Sir George Cobham, Sir John Cornwallis, Sir Edward Ridgely, and some others; and after the Earl had lain a while on the Coast of Britain, he was commanded home by the King's Letters: Who thereupon brought back his whole Fleet to a Place called the Cow, under the Isle of Wight, and then went on Land, leaving divers of his Ships under the Governance of the Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-williams.

The Earl of Surrey, Admiral, surprised Morlaix in France.

In this mean Time divers Exploits were achieved between them of the Garrison in the Marches of Calais, and the French-men of Boulogne, where the French commonly had the worst: But being of no great Moment, may well be passed over without relating. Likewise at the same Time the Lord Ross, and the Lord D'acres of the North, appointed to keep the Borders against Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelfie, and fourscore Villages, and overthrew eighteen Towers of Stone, with all their Bulwarks.

King Henry intending now to go seriously on with his Wars in France, levied an Army, which, under the Conduct of the Earl of Surrey, he sent over to Calais; whither the Earl being come, he divided his Army into three Battels; the first was led by Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water, the Middle Ward by himself and his Brother the Lord Edmund Howard, the Reer Ward by Sir William Sands and Sir Richard Winkfield, both of them Knights of the Garter: And Sir Edmund Guildford was Captain of the Horsemen. In this Order the Earl entred the French Ground the second of September, and took his Journey towards Hedring. By the Way there came to him a great Power of Burgoignians, sent by the Lady Margaret, according to the Articles of the League. All the Towns, Villages, and Castles in the Country, through which they passed, they burnt and sacked; as the Town and Castle of Scilloys, the Town of Brunbrige, Senkerk, Botington, and Manstier, with divers others. On the sixteenth of September they came before the Castle of Hedring, and laid Siege unto it; but the Castle being well fortified, and the Earl having no battering Ordnance, which by reason of the foul Weather he could not bring with him, after eleven Days he raised his Siege; and passing from thence to Dourlens, burnt the Town, and rased the Castle, as also the Town of Dortier, and then, the Year being far spent, came back to Calais the sixteenth of October.

The Earl of Surrey wins many Towns in France.

At this Time the Duke of Albany being established Governour of Scotland, raised an Army of fourscore thousand Men, with which he approached the Borders, but made no Invasion, as thinking perhaps that the bare Report of his great Army would fright the English; but yet this stayed not the Lord Marquess Dorset, Warden of the East and Middle Marches, to enter into Tividale, and so forward ten Miles into Galloway, burning all Towns and Villages on every Side as he passed. All that Night he tarried within the Scotish Ground, and the next Day, being Good-Friday, withdrew back into England, with a Head of four thousand Cattel, having burned Grimsfley, Mowhouse, Donford, Myles, Ackforth, Crowleng, and many other Towns and Villages.

In King Henry's fourteenth Year, on the fifteenth of April began a Parliament, which was holden at the Black-Friers, whither the King came, and there sat down in his Royal Seat; at his Feet on the right Side sat the Cardinal of York, and the Archbishop of Canterbury; and at the Rail behind stood Doctor Tunstal, Bishop of London, who making an Oration, told there the Causes of calling this Parliament; which were, as he said, for remedying of Mischiefs by the Common Law, as Recoveries, Foreign Vouchers, and Corrupt Trials; and for making new Laws for the Good of the Common-wealth; whereof notwithstanding, no one Word was spoken all the Time of the Parliament, nor any other Thing done, but a Subsidy granted; but howsoever, being commanded to choose their Speaker, they chose Sir Thomas More, who at first disabling himself, at last made two Petitions to the King; one for himself, that if he should be sent by the Commons to the King on a Message, and mistake their Intent, he might then with the King's Pleasure resort again to the Commons, to know their Meaning: The other, for the House of Commons, that if in Communication and Reasoning, any Man should speak more largely than of Duty he ought to do, yet all such Offences should be pardoned, and that to be entred on Record. Which Petitions were granted, and then the Parliament began; where at first a Subsidy was demanded: But as there was much ado in the House of Commons about it, so there was no less amongst the Clergy in the Convocation-House; for Richard Bishop of Winchester, and John Bishop of Rochester were much against it, but most of all one Rowland Philips, Vicar of Croydon, and a Canon of St. Paul's; but the Cardinal taking him aside, dealt so with him, that he took him off, so as he came no more to the House; and then the Bell-weather, as one saith, giving over his Hold, the rest soon yielded; and so was granted the Half of all their spiritual yearly Revenues, to be paid in five Years following. The Clergy being thus brought on, on the nine and twentieth of April, the Cardinal came into the House of Commons, to work them also; and there, shewing the great Charges the King was necessarily to be at in his present Wars, demanded the Sum of eight hundred thousand Pounds, to be raised of the fifth Part of every Man's Goods and Lands, which was four Shillings of every Pound. This Demand was enforced the Day after by the Speaker, Sir Thomas More; but the Burgesses were all against it, shewing that it was not possible to have it gathered in Money; for that Men of Lands had not the fifth Part thereof in Coin: And further alledged, that there be not many Parishes in England, one with another, able to spare a hundred Marks, except Cities and Towns; and seeing there were not above thirteen thousand Parishes in the Kingdom (at this Day there are but 9285) how could such a Sum be raised? Hereupon certain of the House were sent to move the Cardinal, to be a Means to the King to accept of a lesser Sum; but the Cardinal answered, He would rather have his Tongue plucked out of his Mouth with a Pair of Pincers, than make to the King any such Motion. Whereupon the Cardinal came again into the House, and desired that he might reason with them that were against the Demand; to which it was answered, That the Order of that House was to hear, and not to reason, except amongst themselves. When the Cardinal was gone, the Commons, after long debating the Matter, at last agreed of two Shillings in the Pound, from twenty Pounds upward, and from forty Shillings to twenty Pounds, of every twenty Shillings twelve Pence, and under forty Shillings of every Head of sixteen Years and upwards, four Pence to be paid in two Years: When this was told to the Cardinal, he was much offended; so that to please him, the Gentlemen of fifty Pound Land and upward, by the Motion of Sir John Hufsey, a Knight of Lincolnshire, were charged with twelve Pence more in the Pound, to be paid in three Years.

The Cardinal to move them to it, bore them A.D. 1523 in Hand, that the Lords had agreed to four Shillings of the Pound; which was untrue, for the Lords had granted nothing, but stayed to see what the Commons would do; whereof when the King heard, he reproved the Cardinal for it; saying withal, that e'er it were long he would look to Things himself, without any Substitute. Which Speech of the King's, though it daunted the Cardinal for a while, yet he soon recovered his Spirits, and was as peremptory afterward as he had been before. After this the Parliament was prorogued till the tenth of June; during which Prorogation, the common People said to the Burgesses, We hear say, you will grant four Shillings of the Pound, we advise you not to do so, that you may go home; with many like Threatnings. At this Time the Cardinal, by his Power Legantine, dissolved his Convocation at St. Paul's, convoked by the Archbishop of Canterbury, calling him and all the Clergy to the Convocation at Westminster; which was never seen before in England, saith Hall. The one and thirtieth of July, the Parliament was adjourned to Westminster; and there continuing till the thirteenth of August, was that Day at nine of the Clock at Night dissolved.

About this Time the Bishop of Durham died, and the King gave that Bishoprick to the Cardinal; who resigned the Bishoprick of Bath to Doctor John Clerk, Master of the Rolls; and Sir Henry Marney, that was Vice-Chamberlain, was made Lord Privy-Seal, and shortly after was created Lord Marney: Also during this Parliament, Sir Arthur Plantagenet, Bastard Son to King Edward IV. at Bridewel was created Viscount Lisle, in the Right of his Wife, who was Wife before to Edmund Dudley, beheaded.

The fifteenth of June, in the fifteenth Year of the King's Reign, Christian King of Denmark, with his Queen, driven out of his own Country, came into England, and was lodged at Bath-Place; who, after he had been feasted by the King, and by the City of London, and received great Gifts of both, returned again into Flanders, where he remained as a banished Man: Some Years after, King Henry sent Doctor Henry Standish, Bishop of St. Asaph, and Sir John Baker, Knight, into Denmark, to persuade the People to receive him again into his Kingdom; but they could not prevail, he was so much hated for his Cruelty.

About this Time the Earl of Kildare having recovered again the Favour of the Cardinal, was sent Deputy into Ireland, as he had been before, where he reduced the wild Irish to indifferent Conformity. All this while had England Wars both with the French and with the Scots. In Scotland the Marquess of Dorset threw down the Castles of Wederborne, of Nesgate, of Blackater, of Mackwalls, and burnt to the Number of seven and thirty Villages, yet never came to Skirmish. In France the Lord Sands, Treasurer of Calais, with twelve hundred Men went before Boulogne, where he skirmished with the Enemy; and after taking divers Churches and Castles in the Enemy's Country, returned back to Calais, with the

A.D. 1524 Los only of a Dozen Men. King Henry being advertised that the Duke of Albany was providing of Forces in France, with which to return into Scotland, sent forth his Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-williams, with divers great Ships to intercept him; but when he could not meet with him, he then landed in the Haven of Treport; where, with seven hundred Men, he beat six thousand French that sought to impeach his Landing, took their Bulwarks, and much Ordnance in them, burned the Suburbs of the Town of Treport, and all in five Hours, and then returned.

All this while King Henry had played with the French; but now he seems to be in Earnest, and therefore sends over the Duke of Suffolk with an Army, the four and twentieth of August, attended with the Lord Montacute and his Brother Sir Arthur Pool, the Lord Herbert, Son to the Earl of Worcester, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Marney, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkley, the Lord Powis, and the Baron Curson, Sir Richard Winkefield, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Sir John Vere, Sir Edward Nevil, Sir William Kingston, Sir Richard Weston, Sir Andrew Windfore, Sir Robert Winkefield, Sir Anthony Winkefield, Sir Edward Guildford, Sir Edward Greville, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir Everard Digby, Sir Adrian Fortescue, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir William Courtney, Sir William Sidney, Sir Henry Owen, and many other Knights and Gentlemen. In the whole Army were six hundred Demi-lances, two hundred Archers on Horse-back, three thousand Archers on Foot, and five thousand Billmen. Also seventeen hundred taken out of the Garrison of Hammes, Guisnes, and Calais, in all ten thousand and five hundred; besides two thousand six hundred Labourers and Pioneers. With this Army the Duke of Suffolk took the Field; his Vanguard was led by the Lord Sands: The Captain of the right Wing was Sir William Kingston, and of the left Sir Everard Digby: The Captain of all the Horse-men was Sir Edward Guildford, Marshal of Calais; the Duke himself led the Battel, and Sir Richard Winkefield the Rereward. The Duke's Enterprize was the Winning of Bell-Castle, which the Lord Sands and the Lord Ferrers assaulted, and had it yielded to them, and then Sir William Skevington was placed Captain in it. At this Time the Duke of Bourbon, High-Constable of France, began to have his Mind alienated from the King of France; and to draw him the more on, the Duke of Suffolk sent Sir John Russel, afterward created Duke of Bedford, to him, who, passing in disguised Apparel, so prevailed with him, that he professed to take Part with the Emperor, and the King of England, who having ten thousand Almaines in his Pay, it was thought fit, for Encouragement of the English, to proclaim in the Army the Access of so powerful an Assistant: And thereupon the Duke of Suffolk removed to Ard, and so forward into Picardy. At Cordes, between Teroin and S. Omers, there came to him the Lord of Isilstein, and with him of Spaniards, Almaines, and others, three thousand Foot-men, and five hundred Horse. With these Forces, the Duke marching on, took first the rich Town of Anchor, then the Castle of Bonguard, and then by Assault the Town of Bray, though two thousand good Men of War were in it. After this, the Towns of Cappe and Roy, Libome and Davenker. And then came before the Town of Mount-Didier, in which were a thousand Foot and five hundred Horse; yet, upon Sir William Skevington's Batteries, was yielded to him. From hence he removed to Roy, where he rested a while with his whole Army: And there, on Allholland-day, in the chief Church of Roy, made Knights, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Powis, Oliver Manners, Arthur Pool, Richard Sands, Robert Jerningham, Robert Salisbury, Edward Beningsfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantel, George Warram, and Edward Seymour (that was after Duke of Somerset.) The Day after, the Army removed to a Place called Neele, from thence to Veane, and then to Beauford, where the Duke made John Dudley and Robert Utreight Knights, and from thence, on the eighth of November, to a Place called Mount Saint Martin. Here the Welsh-men began to murmur, that they might not return home, the Winter being so far spent; but there was to the Number of a thousand Persons, under the leading of Sir John Wallope, who having no Wages but what they could get by Booties, and were therefore called Adventurers, and by some Kreekers; and these had more Desire to stay, than the Welsh-men had to be gone, for the great Gains they made by the Spoils of so many Towns that were taken. The thirteenth of November the Duke removed to a Place within two Miles of Boghan Castle, defended by great Marishes that lay before it; but the Frost at that Time being so great, that many lost their Fingers and Toes with Cold; and some died; Sir Edward Guildford acquainted the Duke, that he thought the Marishes were hard enough frozen to bear great Ordnance; whereupon the Duke bid him venture it then, and go on, which he resolutely did, and had the Castle presently delivered up to him. In this mean Time the King hearing in what State the Army stood, had prepared six thousand Men to be sent to the Duke for a Relief, under the Leading of the Lord Montjoy; but before they could be put in Order to pass the Sea, the Duke, partly by Extremity of the Weather, and partly by the murmuring of the Soldiers, was constrained to break up his Army, and return to Calais.

In this mean Time the Scots knowing that the Strength of England was gone into France, took Boldness to invade the Marishes; but then the Earl of Surrey, Treasurer and High-Admiral of England, with six thousand Men, being sent against them, took divers of their Castles and Holds; and at Yedworth, skirmishing with a great Garrison of Scots, overthrew them, and took and burned both the Town and Castle. And now the French King finding that the Scots did not work any great Trouble to the English, whereby to keep them from molesting of France, and thinking it to be for Want of the Duke of Albany's Presence, whom they accounted their Governor, he therefore prepared a Navy of Ships to transport him into Scotland; but when the Duke of Albany heard that Sir Wil-

How marshalled.

A.D. 1524 liam Fitz-williams was sent with a great Fleet to stop his Passage, he brought his Ships into the Haven of Brest, and gave it out that he would not go into Scotland that Year; which being told to the King of England, he commanded that his Ships also should be laid up in Havens till the next Spring. And now see the Cunning of the Scot; for when he saw the King's Ships discharged, he then boldly took Shipping himself, and sailed into Scotland; whether being come, presently levied a great Army, and approached the English Borders; but when he heard the Earl of Surrey was coming against him with a mighty Power, he then sent a Herald to him, promising of his Honour, to give him Battel; and if he took him Prisoner, to give him good Quarter. To whom the Earl answered, that he would not fail to abide his Battel; and if he took him Prisoner, the Quarter he would give him, should be to cut off his Head, and send it for a Present to his Master the King of England. At this Time the Earl of Surrey being at Alnewick, came the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, the Lords Clifford, D'acres, Lumley, Ogle, and D'arcy, with many Knights, Gentlemen, and other Soldiers, to the Number of forty Thousand: And from the Court came the Master of the Horse, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Edward Baynton, and others. The last of October the Duke of Albany sent two or three thousand Men over the Water to besiege the Castle of Warke; who, by Battery of their Ordnance, won the outermost Ward, called the Barnekens; and continuing their Battery, won the second Ward; but then Sir William Lisle, that was Captain of the Castle, issuing forth with those few he had left, drove the French-men from the Place, and slew of them to the Number of three hundred; a memorable Service, and for which the Earl of Surrey afterwards gave him great Thanks. The Earl would gladly have followed his Enemies into their own Borders, but that his Commission was only to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after the Queen of Scots, Mother to the King, sent to her Brother the King of England, for an Abstinence from War, till a further Communication might be had; which being granted, the English Army brake up, and the Earl of Surrey returned to the Court.

And now for a while we must be content to hear of petty Occurrences, because greater did not happen; which, if it make us like the Story the worse, it may make us like the Times the better; seeing they are ever the best Times that afford least Matter to be talked of: But this Time will last but a while; for shortly we shall come to hear Occurrences, that have been Matter of Talk to this Day, whereof the like have never scarce been seen, and will hardly be believed, when they are heard; a Marriage dissolved after twenty Years Consummation; Houses built in Piety; under Pretence of Piety demolished; a King made a Captive; a Pope held a Prisoner; Queens taken out of Love, put to Death out of Loathing; and the Church it self shaken, that it hath stood in Distraction ever since.

At this Time the Emperor Charles sent to the King of England two Mules trapped in Crimson Velvet, richly embroidered; also eleven goodly Jennets trapped with Ruffet Velvet, richly wrought; four Spears, and two Javelins of strange Timber, and Work richly garnished; and five Brace of Grey-hounds. To the Queen he sent two Mules richly trapped, and high Chairs after the Spanish Fashion: Which Presents were thankfully received both of the King and Queen.

At this Time, in the Month of October, the Cardinal sent out Commissions, that every Man, being worth forty Pounds, should pay the whole Subsidy before granted out of hand; which he called an Anticipation: Which fine new Word, he thought, would make them pay their Money the more willingly; but they loved their Money better than any Words he could devise.

In this Year the King sent the Lord Morley, Sir William Hufsey, Knt. and Dr. Lee, his Almoner, to Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, with the Order of the Garter; which he received in the Town of Noremberg, to his great Contentment.

In this Year, through Books of Prognostications, foreshewing much Hurt to come by Waters and Floods, many Persons withdrew themselves to high Grounds, for Fear of drowning; specially one Bolton, Prior of St. Bartholomew's, in Smithfield, builded him an House upon Harrow on the Hill, and thither went and made Provision for two Months. These great Waters should have fallen in February; but no such Thing happening, the Astronomers excused themselves, by saying, that in the Computation they had miscounted in their Number an hundred Years.

In this mean Time many Enterprizes were attempted between the English-men of Calais and Guifnes, and the French-men of Boulogne and the Frontiers of Picardy, and still Sir William Fitz-williams, Captain of Guifnes, Sir Richard Jerningham, Captain of Newnham-Bridge, Sir John Wallop, and Sir John Gage, were the Men that did the French most Hurt.

This Year, the first of September, was Dr. Thomas Hannibal, Master of the Rolls, received into London, by Earls, Bishops, and divers Lords and Gentlemen, as Ambassador from Pope Clement, who brought with him a Rose-tree of Gold for a Present to the King: And on the Day of the Nativity of our Lady, after a solemn Mass sung by the Cardinal of York, the said Present was delivered to the King, which was a Tree forged of fine Gold, and with Branches, Leaves, and Flowers, resembling Roses.

About the Beginning of Winter, the Adventurers, called Kreekers, being not above two hundred, and of them five and twenty Horsemen, made an Attempt to fetch some Booty from a Village not far from Muttrell; whereof the Earl of Dammartin having Notice, he set upon them with a far greater Number, and slew most of them; and this was the End of the Kreekers, as brave Men as ever served any Prince.

In December this Year, there came to London divers Ambassadors out of Scotland, about a Peace to be had; and a Marriage to be concluded, between the King of Scots, and the Lady

A.D. 1524 Lady Mary, Daughter to the King of England.

At this Time the Lord Leonard Gray, and the Lord John Gray, Brothers to the Lord Marques Dorset, Sir George Cobham, Son to the Lord Cobham, William Cary, Sir John Dudley, Thomas Wyat, Francis Points, Francis Sidney, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Edward Seymore, Oliver Manners, Percival Hart, Sebastian Newdigate, and Thomas Calen, Esquires of the King's Household, made a Challenge of Arms against the Feast of Christmas, which was proclaimed by Windsor the Herald, and performed at the Time appointed very nobly, as Tilts, Turneys Barriers, and the Assault of a Castle erected for that Purpose, in the Tilt-yard at Greenwich, where the King held his Christmas that Year with great State and Magnificence.

1525. About this Time, Joby Jockin, Steward of the Household to the French King's Mother, came into England, and was received, in secret Manner, into the House of one Dr. Lark, a Prebendary of St. Stephen's, who oftentimes talked with the Cardinal about a Peace to be concluded between the two Kings of England and France; of whose often Meetings, Monsieur de Prate, the Emperor's Ambassador, grew very jealous. The four and twentieth of January, Monsieur Brynion, President of Roan, came to London, as Ambassador from the French King, and was lodged with the said Joby Jockin; which small Things should not be related, but that they were Preparatives to great Matters afterward.

On Sunday the fifth of March were received into London Monsieur de Bever, Lord of Campher, Admiral of Flanders, Monsieur John de la Coofe, President of Malines, and Master John de la Gache, as Ambassadors from the Lady Margaret, in the Name of the Emperor, who required three Things: First, they demanded the Lady Mary, the King's only Daughter, to be presently delivered, and she to be named Empress, and as Governess, take Possession of all the Low Countries. Secondly, That all such Sums of Money as the King should give with her in Marriage, should be paid incontinently. Thirdly, That the King of England should pass the Sea in Person, and make War in France the next Summer. The first two Demands were not agreed to for certain Causes. And as to the third, the King said, he would take Time to advise. On Thursday the ninth of March, a Gentleman came in Post from the Lady Margaret, with Letters signifying, That, whereas the King of France had lien long at the Siege of Pavia, he had now been forced to raise his Siege, and was himself taken Prisoner by the Imperialists; for Joy whereof, Bonfires and great Triumph was made in London, and on the twentieth of March, being Sunday, the King himself came to St. Paul's, and there heard a solemn Mass. But for all this Shew of Joy, it was thought, if the King of France had not now been taken Prisoner, that the King of England would have joined in Amity with him, as being angry with the Flemmings for enhancing his Coin in Flanders, which caused much Money to be conveyed out of England thither. The King of France being taken Prisoner, was after some Time conveyed into Spain, and at last brought to Madrid, A.D. 1525 where he fell so sick, that the Physicians had little Hope of his Life, unless the Emperor would speedily be pleased to visit him; upon whose Visitation he recovered his Health, though not presently his Strength. In which Time many Propositions were made for his Delivery; but the Emperor would accept of none without Restitution of the Duchy of Burgoigne. At last, the French King, weary of Imprisonment, and longing for Liberty, was content to agree to any Conditions; the Chief whereof were, That the French King by a certain Day should be set at Liberty, and within six Weeks after should resign to the Emperor the Duchy of Burgoigne, with all Members pertaining to it; and at the same Instant should put into the Emperor's Hands the Dauphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleans his second Son, or else twelve principal Lords of France, whom the Emperor should name; and that there should be between them a League, and perpetual Confederation, for Defence of their Estates. Of whose Attonement when King Henry heard, as before he had expressed Gladness that he was taken Prisoner, so now he sent Sir Thomas Cheyney to him, to express his Joy for being set at Liberty: So sudden is the Interchange of Love and Hatred amongst great Princes. The French King being thus delivered, the Emperor married the Lady Isabel, Daughter to Emanuel, King of Portugal, and had with her in Dower eleven hundred thousand Ducats; though three Years before, being at Windsor, he had covenanted to take to Wife the Lady Mary, King Henry's Daughter.

At this Time Cardinal Wolfey obtained Licence of the King to erect a College at Oxford, and another at Ipswich; and towards the Charge of them, got Leave also to suppress certain small Monasteries, to the Number of forty; and after got a Confirmation of the Pope, that he might employ the Goods and Lands belonging to those Houses, to the Maintenance of those two Colleges: A pernicious President, and that which made the King a Way afterward to make a general Suppression of all Religious Houses; though indeed there be great Difference between converting of Monasteries into Colleges, and utter subverting them.

In March K. Henry sent Cuthbert Tunstal Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Winkfield Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, into Spain, to confer with the Emperor about Matters of great Importance, and particularly about War to be made in France; and yet were these two Princes at this Time in League: But he that shall observe the Carriage of these two Princes towards one another, and how convertible their Leagues were into War, and their War into Peace, shall find it a strange Riddle of Ragion di stato, and their Leagues to have been but meer Complements, where the Scale was turned with the least Grain of a Circumstance: And though they were bound by Oath, yet that Oath made the Leagues but little the firmer, seeing the League might be broken, and yet the Oath kept: For while one gave the Occasion, and the other took it, though they were both Accessaries, yet neither was Principal; and where there

The Cardinal suppresseth forty Monasteries, towards the erecting of two Colleges.

The King of France is taken Prisoner.

A.D. 1525 is not a Principal, the Oath remains inviolate.

And upon those Hinges did the Friendship of these Princes turn; as at this Time the Emperor, though not long before he parted had with the King of England in the greatest Kindness that could be, yet gave not the English Ambassadors so kind Entertainment now, as he had formerly done; but for what Cause was not apparent, unless upon some sinister Report made to him by Monsieur de Prat; who having been his Lieger with the King of England, was without taking Leave of the King departed, and come to the Emperor before the English Ambassadors came.

The Cardinal seeks to raise Money by a Commission; which the People oppose, and the King disclaims.

But howsoever King Henry being determined to make War in France himself in Person, his Council fell into Consideration how the Charge of the War should be maintained; which Care the Cardinal takes upon him; and thereupon appoints Commissioners in all Shires, to sit and draw the People to pay the sixth Part of every Man's Substance, in Plate and Money: But the People opposed it, alledging, that it was against the Law of the Realm, for any Man to be charged with such Payments, unless by Parliament: And as the Cardinal continued to press it, so the People continued to deny it; and when some for denying it were committed to Prison, the Commons in many Countries made great Assemblies for their Defence: The Report whereof at last came to the King, who thereupon came to Westminster and protested openly, that it was done without his Knowledge, and that it was never his Meaning to ask any thing of his Subjects, but according to Law; and therefore desired to know by whose Authority it was done. Here the Cardinal excused himself and said, that it was the Opinion of all the Judges, and of all his Council, that he might lawfully demand any Sum, so it were done by Commission; and thereupon it was done. But the King liked not to take Advantage of a Distinction to draw Money from his Subjects; and thereupon gave Warning for doing any such thing hereafter; and signified so much by his Letters into all the Shires of England: Giving also a general Pardon to all that had offered to rise upon it; which though he did of his own free Grace, yet the Cardinal, to win a good Opinion in the Commons, gave out, that it was by his Means the King granted the Pardon.

An. Reg. 17.

Dukes and Earls created.

King Henry's seventeenth Year was honoured with advancing of many in Honour; for on the eighteenth of June, at the Palace of Bridewel, the King's Son (which he had by Elizabeth Blunt, Daughter to Sir John Blunt Knight) called Henry Fitz Roy, was created first Earl of Nottingham, and after on the same Day, Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Henry Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, was created Marquess of Exeter, the Lord Brandon, Son to the Duke of Suffolk and the French Queen (a Child of two Years old) was created Earl of Lincoln, Sir Thomas Mannors, Lord Ross, was created Earl of Rutland, Sir Henry Clifford was created Earl of Cumberland, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitz-water, was created Viscount Fitz-water, and Sir Thomas Bullen, Treasurer of the King's Household, was created Viscount Rochford.

At this Time the French King's Mother, as A.D. 1525 then Regent of France, procured by her Ambassadors, at first a Truce, and afterward a Peace with England, which was proclaimed in London, the eighth of September. By the Covenants of which Peace, the King of England should receive at certain Days twenty hundred thousand Crowns, which in Sterling Money amounted to the Sum of four hundred thousand Pounds; whereof fifty was to be paid in Hand. Sir William Fitz-Williams and Doctor Taylor were sent to the Lady Regent, to take her corporal Oath, and likewise King Henry the fourth and twentieth of April, at Greenwich, in Presence of the Ambassadors of France, Rome and Venice, took his corporal Oath, to observe the Peace between him, and his loving Brother the French King, during his Life, and one Year after.

In this Winter was a great Mortality in London, so as the Term was adjourned, and the King kept his Christmas at Eltham, with a small Number, and was therefore called the still Christmas. At which Time the Cardinal coming to the Court, took Order for altering the State of the King's House: Many Officers and other Servants were discharged, and put to their Pensions, in which Number were fourscore and four Yeomen of the Guard: Who before having had twelve Pence the Day with Check, were now allowed but six Pence the Day without Check, and commanded to go into their Countries.

On Shrove-Tuesday this Year a solemn Just was held at Greenwich, the King and eleven other on the one Part, the Marquess of Exeter and eleven others of the other Part.

In his nineteenth Year King Henry kept a solemn Christmas at Greenwich, with Revels, Masks, Disguisings, and Banquets, and the thirtieth of December and third of January were solemn Justs holden, when at Night the King and fifteen others with him, came to Bridewel, and there putting on masking Apparel, took his Barge, and rowed to the Cardinal's Palace, where were at Supper many Lords and Ladies, who danced with the Maskers, and after the Dancing was made a great Banquet. This Christmas was a Play at Grays-Inn, made by one Master Roe a Serjeant at Law; the Effect whereof was, that Lord Governance was ruled by Dissipation and Negligence, by whose evil Order Lady Publick Weal was put from Governance. This the Cardinal took to be meant by him, and thereupon sent the said Master Roe to the Fleet, though the Play were made long before the Cardinal had any Authority: By which we may see how inseparable a Companion Suspicion is to a guilty Conscience.

The fourteenth of January came to the Court Don Hugo de Mendoza, a Grandee of Spain, as Ambassador from the Emperor to the King, with a large Commission, to make King Henry Judge how just the Conditions were which the Emperor required of the King of France: And about this Negotiation tarried two Years in England. So desirous the Emperor was to continue good Correspondence with the King of England.

On Shrove-Tuesday the King and the Marquess of Exeter, with others in most sumptuous Attire,

An. Reg. 19. 1528.

The King visits the Cardinal in a Mask.

King Henry made Arbitrator between the Emperor and France.

A.D. 1528 Attire, came to the Tilt, and ran so many Courses, till two hundred fourscore and six Spears were broken; and then disarming themselves, went into the Queen's Chamber, where a sumptuous Banquet was provided. But this Banquet was one of the last of the Queen's Preparing: For hitherto there had been no Exception taken to the Lawfulness of her Marriage; but now came over Ambassadors from the King of France, requiring to have the King's Daughter, the Lady Mary, to be given in Marriage to the Duke of Orleans, second Son to their Master the French King; wherein they that were the Suitors for it, were the Hinderers of it: For amongst them was the President of Paris, who made a Doubt whether the Marriage between King Henry and the Lady Katharine of Spain, having been his Brother's Wife, were lawful or no. But howsoever, the French Ambassadors at Greenwich, on Sunday the fifth of May, in the Name of their Master the French King, took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them during their Lives. And shortly after were sent Sir Thomas Bullen, Viscount Rochford, and Sir Anthony Brown Knight, as Ambassadors to the King of France, to take his Oath in Person for Performance of the League.

The first Exception taken to the Lawfulness of the King's Marriage.

But enough of small Occurrences; and indeed there will be Occurrences now more worthy to be related, but more lamentable to be heard: For now the Duke of Bourbon, General of the Emperor's Army in Italy, was slain by a Shot from the Walls of Rome, as he was passing by; upon whose Death the Army entered and sacked the City, made the People fly to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and there cooped him up, abused the Cardinals, and put them to grievous Ransoms, spared neither sacred Places, nor religious Persons, but committed all Manner of barbarous and inhumane Cruelty.

Rome sacked by the Imperialists, and the Pope and Cardinals cooped up as Prisoners.

These Insolencies of the Emperor's Army committed against the Pope, together with the hard Conditions the Emperor had imposed upon the King of France for setting him at Liberty, and the Emperor's Breach of Promise in not marrying the Lady Mary, King Henry's Daughter, were the apparent Causes of King Henry's breaking League with the Emperor Charles: But a more enforcing, though concealed Cause, perhaps, was the growing Greatness of the Emperor, by his Acquests in Italy and other Places; enough to breed Jealousie in all neighbouring Princes: And indeed, King Henry had some Cause to think the Emperor's Spirits were grown higher with his Victories; seeing where before he was wont always to write Letters to King Henry with his own Hand, and subscribe them, your Son and faithful Friend; now after his Victories in Italy, he caused his Secretaries to write them, subscribing only Charles. And yet a more pressing Cause, though not avowed, might be the Cardinal's Spleen against the Emperor, for denying him the Bishoprick of Toledo in Spain. But whichsoever of these was the predominant Cause, all of them together made a Cause sufficient for King Henry to fall off from Amity with the Emperor; and his falling off from the Emperor, Cause sufficient to fall in with the King of France: And thereupon the two A.D. 1528 Kings send their several Heralds to the Emperor; King Henry, Clarencieux; the French King, his Herald Guyen, to expostulate their Grievances with the Emperor; and he refusing to return a satisfactory Answer, to defie him as their Enemy. The Emperor heard the Heralds with great Temper, and answered Clarencieux very mildly, That he knew his Master's Grievance was grounded upon Mis-information; wherein he would shortly rectifie him by his Letters, as desiring nothing more than to continue his Friend; but Guyen he answered roughly, bidding him tell his Master, that he had broken his Faith in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his Liberty; and with these Answers dismissed them; only Guyen not thinking it fit to deliver his Answer, being in such Terms, by Word of Mouth, obtained to have it sent in Writing. The Heralds being returned Home, and delivering the Answers, the King of France was so incensed to be charged with Breach of Faith, that soon after he sent another Defiance to the Emperor, telling him in plain Terms, that he lied in his Throat; and thereupon challenged him to the Combat, requiring him to appoint the Field, and himself would the Weapons. The Emperor accepted the Challenge, but other Occurrences intervening, hindered the Performance.

Causes of K. Henry's breaking League with the Emperor.

The King of France gives the Emperor the Lye, and challengeth him to a Combat.

In this mean time, the Cardinal was appointed to go Ambassador to the King of France, carrying with him twelve-score thousand Pounds, to be employed by the French King, and other the Confederates, in a War against the Emperor, who the eleventh of July took Shipping at Dover, and landed that Day at Calais; with whom was Cuthbert Tunstal, Bishop of London, the Lord Sands Chamberlain to the King, the Earl of Derby, Sir Henry Guildford, Sir Thomas More, with other Knights and Gentlemen, in all to the Number of twelve hundred Horse. At Amiens, he was received by the French King himself, and by his Mother, and by all the chief Peers of France: By whom it was agreed, that Articles of Accord should be offered to the Emperor; which if refused, then the French King should marry the Lady Mary, King Henry's Daughter, and they both to be Enemies to the Emperor. These Things concluded, the Cardinal returned; and on the last of September came to the King at Richmond. In October following, there came Ambassadors from the French King, to take King Henry's Oath for observing the League with the King of France: And on Sunday the tenth of November, King Henry at Greenwich received the Order of Saint Michael by the Hands of the Lord Anne de Montmorency, great Master of the King's Household, and Monsieur Humieres: As likewise the same Day at Paris the French King received the Order of the Garter by the Hands of the Lord Lisle, Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls, Sir Nicholas Carew, Master of the King's Horse, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Thomas Wriothesly Knight, otherwise called Garter King of Arms, who were sent thither with the whole Habit, Collar, and other Habiliments of the Order.

The Cardinal goeth into France with a Train of 1200 Horse.

Upon

A.D. 1528 Upon King Henry's Defiance of the Emperor in the French King's Quarrel, English Merchants, their Ships and Goods were attached in Spain and in the Low-Countries; as likewise all Spanish and Flemish Merchants were attached here; which being very detrimental to both Nations, at last, by Mediation of Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperor's Ambassador Lieger, a Reconcilement was made, and free Traffick between the Nations was revived.

1529. In his twentieth Year, on the two and twentieth of February, Sir Piers Butler of Ireland was created Earl of Ossory. And now King Henry begun to be troubled in Mind about his Marriage with Queen Katharine; but whether his Trouble of Mind grew for Scruple of Conscience, or for Desire of Change, was by many Men doubted: Some thought he had set his Affection upon the Lady Anne Bullen, whom afterward he married; and to make way for that Marriage, moved this Scruple, that he might be divorced: But this is not likely; for he married not the said Lady till above three Years after this Doubt had been moved; and three Years was a long Time to have Affection be delayed, which commonly is impatient of Delay. If King Henry's own Protestation may be taken, it was very Scruple of Conscience that troubled his Mind: But then by what Means this Scruple came first into his Head, is another Doubt; some thought it was first moved by his Confessor Doctor Longland, telling him, that the Marriage with the Relict of his Brother could not be lawful: But neither is this likely, for Doctor Longland was not like to tell him so, who knew the Marriage had been made by Dispensation from the Pope, an Authority in that Time beyond Exception: Some thought it was a Plot of Wolsey's, thereby to make Variance between King Henry and the Emperor; with whom he was at Variance himself, and for Spleen to the Nephew, be revenged upon the Aunt; but neither is this likely, or else the Cardinal was much deceived in his Plot; for though the Emperor laboured with Milan, and some other Universities, to forbear giving Sentences against the Marriage, yet he continued Amity with K. Henry as much afterward as before. If we will believe the King himself, it was the President of Paris, coming Ambassador from the K. of France, that first moved it, upon a Proposition of Marriage between the Lady Mary, K. Henry's Daughter, and the Duke of Orleans, second Son to the French King: But by what Means soever this Scruple had Beginning, King Henry's Desire was now it should have an Ending; and that the Matter might be debated with Indifferency, he allowed the Queen to make Choice of what Council she thought best; who thereupon chose William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Nicholas West, Bishop of Ely, Doctors of the Law; John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standish, Bishop of St. Asaph, Doctors of Divinity; with many other: In the mean Time he sent to all the Universities in Italy and France, to have their Opinions; but specially to the Court of Rome, desiring the Pope to send his Legate to hear the Cause, who thereupon sent Cardinal Campejus, and joined Cardinal Wolsey in Commission with him. The Place appointed for A.D. 1529 the Cardinals to sit and hear the Cause, was at the Black-friers, where, in the great Hall, Preparation was made of Seats, and all Things necessary for such a Session. Among other Officers of the Court, Stephen Gardner, afterward Bishop of Winchester, sat as chief Scribe. The Court being set, the Judges commanded Silence whilst their Commission was read; which done, the Scribes commanded the Crier to call the King by the Name of King Henry of England, coming into the Court; who answered, Here. Then called he the Queen, by the Name of Katharine Queen of England, come into the Court. The Queen though present, yet answered not; but rising from her Seat, went to the Place where the King sat, and kneeling down, said in Effect; Sir, I humbly desire you to take Pity upon me, for I am a poor Woman and a Stranger, and I have here no indifferent Council, where all are your Subjects; and less Assurance of Friendship, when they all depend upon your Favour: I have been your Wife these twenty Years, and have born you divers Children; if you can charge me with Dishonesty or Undutifulness, I am content to depart from you to my Shame; but if you cannot, I then desire you to do me Justice, and to spare me until I may know what Counsel my Friends in Spain will give me; but if you will not, then your Pleasure be fulfilled. And having so said, she rose up, and making a low Courtesy, departed. The King being advertised that she was going out of the House, commanded the Crier to call her again; who thereupon called her, saying, Katharine Queen of England, come into the Court; which her Gentleman-Usher, Master Griffith, hearing, told her, Madam, you are called. Well, said she, it makes no Matter, I will not tarry, go your Way. And thus she departed, and never after would appear in any Court, but appealed from the Cardinals to the Pope himself. The Queen being gone, the King said, I confess she hath been to me the most dutiful and loving Wife that ever Prince had; and if it were not for this Scruple of my Conscience, I would not leave her for any Woman living: And having now referred the Judgment of the Cause to these Commissioners, I should be most glad they could find the Marriage between us to be in such Sort lawful, that, with Obedience to the Law of God, we might continue together: For I take God to Witness, there is nothing I more desire. This said, the King rose, and the Court was adjourned to another Day: For notwithstanding the Queen's Appeal, from which she would by no Means be drawn, the Cardinals continued their Session Weekly, and heard all of both Sides. The Point that was chiefly stood on was, Whether Prince Arthur had ever had carnal Knowledge of her, or no: The King's Council alledged, he had, and proved it; first, by Prince Arthur's Speech the next Morning after his Marriage, That he had been that Night in the Midst of Spain: And then by the Words of the last Dispensation, Vel forsan cognitam: The Queen's Advocates alledged the contrary; appealing to the King's own Conscience, whom the Queen charged that he knew to be a Virgin when he married her (though to say the

The chief Point of Difference was, Whether Prince Arthur had ever carnal Knowledge of her.

A.D. 1529 the Truth, it were strange, Prince Arthur and, she having lien five Months together, and he no less than almost sixteen Years old.) Whilst Arguments were thus argued on both Sides, and no Certainty could appear, the King sent the two Cardinals to the Queen, lying then in Bridewell, to perswade her, she should submit her self to the King's Pleasure, and not to stand so peremptorily to her Appeal. The Cardinals coming to her, found her at work amongst her Maids, with her Skain of white Thread about her Neck: Who having heard their Message, answered, That in all other Things she would willingly submit her self to the King's Will; but in this, which concerned her Honesty, and the Legitimateness of her Children, she durst not, but would rely upon the Wisdom and Piety of both their Fathers, who, she knew, would never have assented to the Marriage, if there had been the least Scruple of Unlawfulness in it; and other Answer she would not give. Upon their Return to the King, when he perceived she could not be removed from her Opinion, he commanded the Court to go on; so that at last it came to Judgment, which every Man expected should be the next Day. At which Day the King came thither (but in so secret a Manner, that he might hear, and not be seen) where the King's Council at the Bar, calling for Judgment, Cardinal Campejus, as being chief Commissioner, stood up and said; I find the Case very doubtful, and the Party defendant standing to her Appeal; I will therefore give no Judgment till I have conferred with the Pope; and therefore I adjourn the Court for this Time, according to the Order of the Court of Rome, which hears no Causes judicially from the last of July, till the fourth of October; at which Protraction of Time K. Henry was not a little angry; and the Duke of Suffolk being present, in a great Rage, said, It was never merry in England since we had Cardinals amongst us. Soon after this, the Cardinal took his Leave of the King, and returned to Rome. He was indeed commanded so to do by the Pope, who would else most willingly have gratified King Henry, that had bestowed upon him the Bishoprick of Salisbury. Whilst these Things were enacted, Cardinal Wolsey had an Inkling of the King's Affection to Anne Bullen, Daughter of the Viscount Rochford; and that the Divorce once passed, he meant to marry her; which Match, because for many Reasons misliked, one, perhaps, because she was a Lutheran, he sent privily to the Pope, that by no Means he should give Sentence for the Divorce, till he had framed the King's Mind another way: For his Desire was, that the King should marry the Duchess of Alanson, the French King's Sister. This packing of Wolsey was not so closely carried, but that it soon came to the King's Knowledge; and the King finding him a Rub in his Way, whom he expected to have expedited his Proceeding, began to think it necessary to remove him, and to take him off from that Greatness which had made him so presuming; and indeed he made short Work with him; for soon after, he sent the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to him for the Seal, which yet he would not deliver them, till they brought him a Warrant under the King's own Hand. When the Seal was brought to A.D. 1529 the King, he delivered it to Sir Thomas More, then Speaker of the Parliament (the first Layman that bore that Office in any Memory) and in his room was chosen Speaker Thomas Audely, Attorney of the Duchy. Wolsey now removed from his Chancellorship, was in the Parliament then holden, charged with Points of Treason: But that Charge was so clearly taken off by his Servant Thomas Cromwel, who was then of the House, that the Cardinal was acquitted, to the great Commendation of Cromwel, both for Abilities in himself, and Faithfulness to his Master.

After this, the King being informed that all those Things which the Cardinal had done by his Power Legantine, were within the Case of Præmunire; he caused his Attorney, Christopher Hales, to sue out a Præmunire against him; and thereupon the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent unto him, to let him know, the King's Pleasure was, he should go to Asher, a House near to Hampton-Court, belonging to his Bishoprick of Winchester, and there to reside: Whereupon the Cardinal, having first delivered up all his Moveables to the King's Use (the greatest Store, and richest, that was ever known of any Subject) went presently to Putney by Water, and from thence rode to Asher, where he and his Family continued three or four Weeks, without either Bed, Sheets, Table-cloths, or Dishes to eat their Meat in, or Money wherewith to buy any, but what he was forced to borrow of the Bishop of Carlisle. After this, his Matter for the Præmunire being called upon in the King's-Bench, his two Attorneys confessed the Action, and thereupon had Judgment to forfeit all his Lands and Goods, and to be out of the King's Protection; but the King of his Clemency sent him a sufficient Protection, and left him the Bishopricks of York and Winchester, with Plate and Stuff convenient for his Dignity. His Bishoprick of Duresme was given to Doctor Tunstal, Bishop of London; his Abby of St. Alban's to the Prior of Norwich; and the Bishoprick of London to Doctor Stokesley, Ambassador then beyond the Seas.

In this mean while, Margaret Duchess of Savoy, Aunt to the Emperor, and the Lady Louise Duchess of Angolessme, Mother to the French King, met at Cambray to treat of a Peace between the Emperor, the Pope, and the Kings of England and France, where were present Dr. Tunstal, Bishop of London, and Sir Thomas More, then Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Commissioners for the King of England. After long Debating, through the Diligence of the said Ladies, a Peace was concluded, and was therefore called the Woman's Peace; and was indeed as fickle as Women, for it was soon broken, and neither of the Princes trusted the other e'er the more for it.

King Henry before this Time had been wholly ruled by the Cardinal and by the Clergy; but now, growing sensible of that Error, he called his High Court of Parliament, in which the Commons complained sharply of their Grievances against the Clergy, especially in six Things.

Wolsey is in a Præmunire; and is confined to Asher.

The Commons in Parliament complain against the Clergy, and wherein.

A.D. 1529 The first, For that they exacted unreasonable Sums of Money, due as Fees, for the Probate of Mens last Wills and Testaments; insomuch, that Sir Henry Guildford, Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the King's House, declared openly, that he and others being Executors to Sir William Compton, payed for the Probate of his Will to the Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury, a thousand Marks.

The second, The extream Exaction which spiritual Men used in taking of Corpse or Mortuaries.

The third, That spiritual Men became Farmers of great Granges and Farms, to the Prejudice of Husband-men and Grasers.

The fourth, Because many Abbots, Priors, and other spiritual Men, kept Tan-houses, and bought and sold Wool, Cloth, and other Wares, as temporal Merchants.

The fifth, Because such Clergy-men as had the best Livings, would take the Uttermost of their Right, and yet live in the Court, or in Noblemens, or in Bishops Houses, where they spent nothing.

The sixth, Because divers ignorant Men amongst them held ten or twelve Benefices to themselves severally, and yet lived not upon any one of them, but kept great Scholars at small Pensions.

These Things before this Time might not be touched, because the Bishops were Chancellors, and had all the Rule about the King; but now the King, looking better into the Matter, gave Way to these Complaints: Whereupon the Burgeses drew up their Bills; one of the Probate of Testaments; another for Mortuaries; and a third for Non-residence, Pluralities, and taking of Farms by spiritual Men. The Bill of Mortuaries passed first the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords: When, two Days after, was sent up the Bill of Probate of Testaments, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Bishops much frowned, but especially John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who rose up and said, My Lords, you see what Bills come daily from the Commons House, and all is to the Destruction of the Church: For God's Sake, consider what a Realm Bohemia was; and when the Church went down, then fell the Glory of that Kingdom. Now with our Commons is nothing but Down with the Church; and all this, me seemeth, is for lack of Faith only. When these Words were reported to the House of Commons, they took the Matter very heinously; and thereupon sent their Speaker, Thomas Audely, with thirty of the House to the King, complaining what a Dishonour to the King and the whole Realm it was to say, That they which were elected for the wisest Men of all Shires, should be charged to lack Faith, which was all done to say they were Infidels and no Christians; so as what Acts or Laws soever they made, should be taken as Laws made by Pagans and Heathens, and not worthy to be kept by Christian Men: And therefore humbly besought his Majesty to call the said Bishop of Rochester before him, to give an Account of the Words he had spoken. Whereupon, within few Days after, the King sent for the Bishop, and acquainted him with A.D. 1529 the Commons Complaint against him; who excused himself, by saying he meant, the Doings of the Bohemians was for lack of Faith, and not the Doings of the House of Commons; of which Excuse the King sent Word to the House by Sir William Fitz-williams, Treasurer of his Household; but it pleased the Commons nothing at all. After divers Meetings between the Lords and the Commons about the Bills of Probate of Testaments and Mortuaries, the Temporality laid to the Spirituality their own Laws and Constitutions; and the Spirituality defended them by Prescription Usage: To whom a Gentleman of Gray's Inn made this Answer, The Usage have ever been of Thieves to be on Shooter's Hill; is it therefore lawful? Whilst these Bills were in Debate, an Act was passed, which released to the King all such Sums of Money as he had borrowed at the Loan, in the fifteenth Year of his Reign: Which Bill at first was much opposed; but the most Part of the House being the King's Servants, it was at last assented to: Which once known in the Country abroad, made much Murmuring, and the Parliament to be ill spoken of; for every Man counted it a sure Debt; so as some made their Wills of the Money, and some returned it over in Satisfaction to their Creditors. To qualify which Grievance, the King granted a General Pardon for Offences (certain excepted) and was a Means also to have the three Bills passed; one for a Probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, and the third against Plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by spiritual Persons; though this last with some Qualifying.

During this Parliament, the King created Viscount Rochford, Earl of Wiltshire; the Viscount Fitz-water, Earl of Essex; and the Lord Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon. Earls created.

By this Time the Lords of the Upper House had drawn certain Articles against the Cardinal, and sent them down to the House of Commons, the Chief whereof were these:

First, That without the King's Assent he hath procured himself to be made a Legate; by reason whereof he took away the Right of all Bishops, and spiritual Persons. Articles drawn by the Parliament against the Cardinal.

Secondly, That in all his Writings which he wrote to Rome, or to any foreign Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my King; so preferring himself before the King.

Thirdly, That without the King's Assent, he carried the Great Seal of England with him into Flanders.

Fourthly, That having the French Pox, he presumed to come and breath upon the King.

Fifthly, That he caused the Cardinal's Hat to be put upon the King's Coin.

Sixthly, That he would not suffer the King's Clerk of the Market to sit at St. Albans.

Seventhly, That he had sent infinite Store of Treasure to Rome, for purchasing of his Dignity.

These Articles were read in the House, and if not otherwise proved, yet confessed afterward under the Cardinal's own Hand, which added to

An inconsiderable Speech of Fisher Bishop of Rochester;

A.D. 1529 to the former Premunire. All his Lands and Goods were seized on to the King's Use.

This Parliament being ended, the King removed to Greenwich, and there kept his Christmas with his Queen Katharine, in great State; for though this Matter of making void the Marriage between them was hotly pursued by the King, yet abstaining only from her Bed, he conversed with her still, and they kept Court together in as loving Manner as they had done before. And now King Henry understanding that the Pope and the Emperor were to meet at Bologna, he sent Ambassadors thither, the Earl of Wiltshire, Dr. Stokesley Elect of London, and Dr. Lee, to declare both to the Pope and to the Emperor, the Opinions of divers learned Men, in the Matter of his Marriage; who all agree that it was against the Law of God; and thereupon requiring the Pope to do him Justice, and shewing to the Emperor, that the King moved this Matter for Discharge of his Conscience only, and to no other End. To which the Pope answered, That when he came to Rome, he would hear the Matter disputed, and do the King Right. The Emperor answered, That he would in no Case be against the Law of God; and if this Marriage were judged such by the Court of Rome, he would rest contented: With these Answers the Ambassadors returned.

An. Reg. 12.

The Island of Malta given by the Emperor to the Master of St. John's of Jerusalem.

It was now the two and twentieth Year of King Henry's Reign, when the Emperor gave to the Master of St. John's of Jerusalem the Island of Malta, in supplying of the Island of Rhodes, which the Turk sometime before had won from that Order.

In this Year the New Testament having been translated into English by Tindal, Joy, and others, was forbidden to be read; and many for reading it were sharply punished by Command of the Bishops and Sir Thomas More, then Lord Chancellor; but none was more violent in the Matter than the Bishop of London, who caused all the Books to be brought into St. Paul's Church-yard, and there burned.

King Henry having heard by good Information, that when Campejus was sent Legate into England, he had brought with him a Bull of Divorce, but was afterward, upon Change of the Pope's Mind, commanded to burn it, saw plainly by this, that the Pope had no Meaning of proceeding really in the Matter, but to keep it a-foot for his own Ends; neither to displease the Emperor by granting it, nor King Henry by not granting it, but promising Expedition to keep him in Expectance; yet using Delays to keep him in Dependance; and therefore resolved now to take such a Course, that he should not need to take Care whether the Pope granted it or no; and thereupon caused a Proclamation to be published, That no Person, of what Estate or Condition soever, should purchase, or attempt to purchase, from the Court of Rome, any thing prejudicial to the Jurisdiction or Prerogative of this his Realm, upon Pain of Imprisonment, and other Punishments at his Grace's Pleasure: And shortly after an Act was made,

An Act made that no more Annats should be paid to Rome, was proved, there had been paid for Bulls of Bishops, since the fourth Year of King Henry A.D. 1531 the Seventh, an hundred and threescore thousand Pounds, besides what had been paid for Pardons and other Dispensations. Another Act was also then made, That no Person should appeal for any Cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all Causes of the King to be tried in the Upper House of the Convocation.

Nor no Appeals to the Pope.

At this Time the Cardinal lying still at Asher, and his Adversaries doubting lest lying so near the King, he might one Time or other get Access to the King's Presence, and come again into Favour, they used Means to have him sent further off; and thereupon the King appointed him to go to his Diocese of York, and not to come Southward without special Licence; whereupon, in Lent, he made great Preparation for his Journey, and having in his Train to the Number of an hundred and threescore Persons, by easy Journies came to Peterborough, and there kept his Easter: The Week after he went to Stamford, then to Newark, and so to Southwell, where he continued most part of all that Summer: And then rode to Scroby, where he stayed till Michaelmas, and then came to Carwood Castle, within seven Miles of York, where he kept a plentiful House for all Comers; and repaired the Castle, being greatly in Decay, having above three hundred Artificers in daily Wages. At last, he determined to be installed at York, the next Monday after All-hollan-day; against which Time great Preparation was made, and the Cardinal sent to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, which he used to wear at any great Solemnity. At which Presumption the King marvelled not a little; saying to those that were about him, what a thing is this that Pride should thus reign in a Man that is quite under Foot? But before the Day of Instalment came, he was arrested in this Manner; Sir Walter Walsh, one of the King's Privy-Chamber, was sent down to the Earl of Northumberland, with whom he was joyned in Commission to arrest the Cardinal; whereupon they go together to Carwood, where the Cardinal lay: And being entred into the House, it was told the Cardinal, that the Earl of Northumberland was come, and in the Hall: Then, quoth the Cardinal, I am sorry we have dined, for I doubt our Officers are not provided of any good Cheer. With that he went and brought the Earl up, welcoming him in a complementary Manner, as if they had come only to visit him; but being come into the Chamber, the Earl, with a soft Voice, laying his Hand upon the Cardinal's Arm, said, My Lord, I arrest you of High-Treason. The Cardinal somewhat astonied, asked to see his Commission; which the Earl denying to shew, then, saith the Cardinal, I will not obey your Arrest. At that Instant Master Walsh came in, and kneeled down to the Cardinal; who asked him, if he were joyned in Commission with the Earl; who answered, He was: Well then, said the Cardinal, I trow you are one of the King's Privy-Chamber, your Name is Walsh: I am content to yield to you,

He prepares to be installed, and sends to the King for his rich Mitre and Pall.

He is arrested by Sir Walter Walsh, one of the King's Privy-Chamber.

A.D. 1531 you, but not to my Lord of Northumberland, unless I see his Commission: The meanest of the King's Privy-Chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest Peer of the Realm, by the King's Commandment, without any Commission. Then the Earl took the Cardinal's Keys from him, and put him in Custody of his Gentlemen. Some few Days after he was conveyed from Carwood to Pomfret, and after to Sheffield Park, where he had kind Entertainment, and stayed with the Earl of Shrewsbury and his Lady eighteen Days, till at last fitting one Day at Dinner, his Colour was observed to change; and being asked how he did? Not well, saith he, I have something suddenly at my Stomach as cold as a Whet-stone, which I know is Wind; I desire to have something from the Apothecary to break Wind; which was brought; and the Earl seeing the same taken, he took it, and thereupon broke Wind indeed; but whether it were he took it in too great a Quantity, or that there was some foul Play used, he fell soon after into such a Looseness, that the Night following he had above fifty Stools: Yet the next Day he rode to Nottingham, and the Day after to Leicester Abby; being so sick by the Way, that he was ready to fall off his Mule: Coming to the Abby Gates, the Abbot with all the Convent met him; to whom he said, Father Abbot, I am come hither to lay my Bones among you; and then was led up into his Chamber, and went to Bed; where growing sicker and sicker, the next Morning Master Kingston, Lieutenant of the Tower, who had been sent to bring him up, coming to him, and asking him how he did? I do but tarry, said he, the Pleasure of God, to render up my poor Soul into his Hands: For this is my Case, I have a Flux with a continual Fever; the Nature whereof is, that if there be no Amendment within eight Days, either Excoriation of the Entrails will ensue, or Frenzy, or else present Death; and the best of them is Death; and, as I suppose, this is the eighth Day. Sir, said Master Kingston, you are afraid of that you have no Cause; for I assure you, the King commanded me to say unto you, that you should be of good Cheer, for that he beareth you as much good Will as ever he did: No, no, Master Kingston, said the Cardinal, I see how it is framed; but if I had served God as diligently as I have done the King, he would not have given me over in my grey Hairs; but it is a just Reward for my Study to do him Service, not regarding the Service of God to do him Pleasure: And having so said, his Speech failed, and incontinent the Clock struck eight, and then he gave up the Ghost; which made some about him remember, how he had said before, that at eight of the Clock they should lose their Master. Being dead, he was buried in the Abby of Leicester.

His many Honours and great Retinue.

This Man held at once the Bishoprick of York, Winchester, and Durham, the Dignities of Lord Cardinal Legate and Chancellor of England, the Abby of St. Alban's, divers Priories, and sundry great Benefices in Commendam: He had also in his Hands, as it were in Farm, the Bishoprick of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, which having been given by Henry VII. to Strangers that lived out of the Realm, they suffered Wolsey to enjoy them, receiving of him a Pension only. The Retinue of this Prelate is scarce credible, a thousand Persons daily in his Household, of whom many Knights and some Lords; all which Greatness, as it came by the King's Favour, so by the withdrawing of his Favour it was overthrown: So true is that Saying of Solomon, The King's Favour is as Dew upon the Grass; but his Wrath is as the Roaring of a Lion, and as a Messenger of Death. After this, the King removed from Hampton-Court to Greenwich, where with his Queen Katharine he kept a solemn Christmas, and on the Twelfth-night he sat in State in the Hall, where were divers Interludes, costly Masks, and a sumptuous Banquet. After Christmas he came to his Manor of Westminster, which before was called York-place; for the Cardinal had made a Feoffment of it to the King, which the Chapter of York confirmed; and then it was no more called York-place, but the King's Manor of Westminster, now White-Hall.

White-hall given by the Cardinal to the King.

About this Time was a Call of eleven Sergeants at Law; namely, Thomas Audely, Walter Luke, John Barwewine, John Hynde, Christopher Jenny, John Densel, Edward Merwine, Edmund Knightly, Roger Chomley, Edward Montague, and Robert York; who kept their Feast at Ely-house five Days together; where on the last Day the King and Queen dined.

At this Time the whole Clergy of England was charged by the King's learned Council, to be in a Premunire for supporting and maintaining the Cardinal's Legantine Power; and were thereupon called by Process into the King's Bench to answer; but before their Day of Appearance came, they in their Convocation concluded an humble Submission in Writing, and offered the King an hundred thousand Pound to have their Pardon by Parliament; which Offer, after some Labour, was accepted, and their Pardon promised. In which Submission the Clergy called the King Supreme Head of the Church. This Pardon was signed with the King's Hand, and sent to the Lords, who assented to it, and then sent it to the Lower House: But here divers of the House excepted against the Pardon, unless themselves also might be included in it; who, they said, having had something to do with the Cardinal, might be brought into the same Cases the Clergy were. Hereupon their Speaker, Thomas Audely, with a convenient Number of the House, was sent to the King about it: To whom the King made Answer, That he was their Sovereign Lord, and would not be compelled to shew his Mercy; and seeing they went about to restrain him of his Liberty, he would grant a Pardon to the Clergy, which he might do by his Great Seal without them, and for their Pardon, he would be advised before he granted it. With this Answer the Speaker and Commons returned, much grieved and discontented; and some said that Thomas Cromwel, who was newly come into the King's Favour, had disclosed the Secrets of the House, which made the King give this displeasing Answer. But soon after, the King, of his own Accord, caused their Pardon also to be drawn, and signed it; which easily passed both Houses, with great Commendation

The King first called the Supreme Head of the Church.

The King's Wisdom in granting his Pardon.

A.D. 1531 dation of the King's Judgment, to deny it at first when it was demanded as a Right, and to grant it afterward, when it was received as of Grace.

In this Parliament-time, on the 30th of March, Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor, with twelve of the Lords, came into the Lower House, acquainting them, that though in the Matter of the King's Divorce, he might sufficiently rest upon the Judgment of learned Men in his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, yet to avoid all Suspicion of Partiality, he had sent into France, Italy, the Pope's Dominions, and the Venetians, to have their Opinions; and then causing them to be read, Sir Bryan Tuke took out of a Box certain Writings sealed, which were the Determination of the Universities of Orleans, of Paris, of Anjou, of Bourges, of Bologna, of Padua, and of Tholouse: All which were peremptory in these two Points; That the Brother, by the Law of God, might not marry the Relict of his Brother; and then being against the Law of God, that it is not within the Power of the Pope to dispense with it: And now, said they, you may know, that the King hath not sought this Divorce for his Pleasure, but for the Discharge of his Conscience; and this said, they departed. The King himself, when he heard of these Determinations, was so far from rejoycing at it, that he rather mourned, as for the Loss of so good a Wife; yet conversed with her as he had done before, in nothing altered but abstaining from her Bed. But being willing the Queen should know these Determinations, in Whitsun-week after, he sent divers Lords to acquaint her with them, requiring her hereupon to recal her Appeal, and to refer the Matter to eight indifferent Lords, which she utterly refused, using her usual Answer, that she was his lawful Wife, and would abide the Determination of the Court of Rome, but of no other. After Whitsuntide the King and Queen removed to Windsor, and there continued till the 14th of July, on which Day the King removed to Woodstock, and left the Queen at Windsor, where she remained a while, and after removed to East-hamstead, whither the King sent to her divers Lords, first to persuade her to be conformable to the Law of God, which if they could not do, then to let her know, that his Pleasure was, she should be at either of these three Places, his Manor of Okeing, or of East-hamstead, or the Monastery of Bisham, and there to continue without further molesting him with her Suits.

The Queen is confined.

Cranmer is sent to Rome to prove the King's Marriage unlawful.

And now Cranmer is to play his Part. It chanced, that Dr. Stephens, and Dr. Fox and he met at Waltham, one Day at Dinner; where falling into Discourse about the Case now in Agitation, of the King's Marriage with Queen Katharine, the other Doctors thought the Marriage might be proved unlawful by the Civil Law: But, said Cranmer, it may be better proved by the Law of God, and it is no hard Matter to do it. Which Words of his being made known to the King, Cranmer is sent for, and commanded to set his Reasons down in Writing; which having done, and shewed them to the King, he was asked, whether he would stand to that which he had written; who answered, he would, even before the Pope himself, if his Majesty pleased: Marry, said the King, and to the Pope you shall go; and thereupon sent him to the Court of Rome, and with him Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltshire, A.D. 1531 Dr. Stokesley Eleet of London, Dr. Lee, the King's Almoner, and others; who coming to Bologna, where the Pope was, had a Day of Audience appointed, but was hindered by a ridiculous Accident; for the Pope holding out his Foot for them to kiss his Toe, as the Manner is, a Dog of the Earl's by Chance in the Room, ran and caught the Pope's Foot in his Mouth, and made it for that Time unfit to kiss. After this, when Cranmer had made his Proposition, he was told it should be answered when the Pope came to Rome: So the Ambassadors were dismissed, and Cranmer went to the Emperor's Court, where in private Conference he satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most learned at that Time about the Emperor, and brought him to be of his Opinion. Cranmer returning Home, and giving the King this Satisfaction, the King's Marriage with Queen Katharine was soon after dissolved by Parliament, and the Bishop of Canterbury, accompanied with Dr. Stokesley, Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, the Bishops Bath and Lincoln, and other learned Men, rode to Dunstable, where Queen Katharine then lay; where being cited to appear, and making Default fifteen Days together, for lack of Appearance, she was divorced from the King, and the Marriage declared to be void and of none Effect; and from thenceforth it was decreed, she should no more be called Queen, but Princess Dowager; after which Time, the King never saw her more.

The Queen is by Parliament divorced.

At this Time, being the four and twentieth Year of K. Henry's Reign, Sir Thomas More, after long Suit, delivered up the great Seal, which was then delivered to Thomas Audely, Speaker of the Parliament, which Parliament, begun at the Black-Friers, was adjourned to Westminster, and there at nine o'Clock at Night dissolved, and was therefore called the Black Parliament. This Thomas Audely, was first made Lord Keeper, and shortly after Chancellor; in whose Room of Speaker, Humfrey Wingfield of Gray's Inn, was chosen. On the first of September this Year, the King being at Windsor, created Anne Bullen Marchioness of Pembroke, giving her one thousand Pounds Land a Year; and then being desirous to talk with the King of France in Person, on the 10th of October taking the said Lady with him, and divers Lords, as the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the Marquess of Dorset and Exeter, the Earls Arundel, Oxford, Surrey, Essex, Derby, Rutland, Suffex, and Huntingdon, with divers Viscounts, Barons, and Knights, he sailed over to Calais, and on the 20th of October met with the King of France at Boulogne, with whom he stayed four Days; in which Time, to do him Honour, the King of France honoured the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, with the Order of St. Michael; and then both Kings went to Calais, where the French King stayed certain Days; in which Time, to do the King of France Honour, King Henry honoured two of his great Lords with the Order of the Garter, and then after great Magnificence in Revelling and Feasting, on the 20th of October the French King departed from Calais, and K. Henry returned into England; where on the 14th of November following, he married secretly the Lady Anne Bullen, which Marriage was not openly known till Easter after, when it was perceived.

Sir Thomas More delivers up the great Seal, and Thomas Audely, Speaker of the Parliament, is made Lord Chancellor. The Lady Anne Bullen is created Marchioness of Pembroke.

He marries the Lady Anne Bullen.

A.D. 1531 she was with Child; at which Time William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, died; Thomas Cranmer was elected in his room.

Cranmer is made Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Order of Knight-hood imposed upon all Men of forty pounds Land. Cromwell is taken into the King's Service. Queen Anne of Bullen is Crowned.

After that the King perceived his new Wife to be with Child, he caused all Officers necessary to be appointed to her; and so on Easter-Eve she went to her Closet openly as Queen, and then the King appointed her Coronation to be kept on Whitsunday following, and Writings were sent to all Sheriffs, to certify the Names of Men of forty Pounds, to receive the Order of Knight-hood, or else to make Fine: The Assessment of which Fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell, Master of the Jewel-house, and of the King's Council; a Man newly come into the King's Favour, by whose Industry great Sums of Money were by such Fines gathered. In the Beginning of May, the King caused Proclamation to be made, that all Men who claimed to do any Service at the Coronation, by Way of Tenure, Grant, or Prescription, should put in their Claim three Weeks after Easter, in the Star-Chamber, before Charles Duke of Suffolk, for that Time High-Steward of England, the Lord Chancellor and other Commissioners. Two Days before the Coronation were made Knights of the Bath, the Earl of Dorset, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Fitz-water, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Monteagle, the Lord Vaux, Sir John Mordant, Sir Henry Parker, Sir William Windsor, Sir Francis Weston, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir John Hurlson, Sir Thomas Poynings, Sir Henry Savile, Sir George Fitz-williams, Sir John Tindal, and Sir Thomas Jeremy. On Whitsunday the Coronation was kept in as great State and Pomp for all Circumstances as ever any was, and the Day after solemn Jufts were holden.

In May this Year, Pope Clement sent a Messenger to K. Henry, requiring him Personally to appear at the general Council, which he had appointed to be kept the Year following: But when his Commission was shewed, there was neither Time nor Place specified for keeping of this said Council; and so with an uncertain Answer to an uncertain Demand, the Messenger departed.

An. Reg. 25. 1534.

The Queen is delivered of a Daughter named Elizabeth.

It was now the five and twentieth Year of the King's Reign, when on Midsummer-day, Mary the French Queen, and then Wife to Charles Duke of Suffolk, died, and was buried at St. Edmund's-bury; and on the seventh of September following, between three and four o' Clock in the Afternoon, the Queen was delivered of a Daughter that was named Elizabeth: The Godfather, at the Christning, was the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Godmothers the old Duchefs of Norfolk, and the old Marchionefs of Dorset, Widow; and at the Confirmation, the Lady Marchionefs of Exeter: The Christning was performed with exceeding great State, and great Gifts were given by the Gossips.

The Judgment of God upon an unhallowed Oath.

This Year, one Pavier, the Town-Clerk of London, hanged himself, whom Holingshed saith, he heard once swear a great Oath, that if he thought the King would set forth the Scripture in English, rather than he would live to see that Day, he would cut his own Throat; which I therefore relate, that the Judgment of God may be seen upon such an unhallowed Oath.

A little before this Time one Elizabeth Barton, named the Holy Maid of Kent, came to be discovered; whose Abettors were Richard Master, a Priest, Parson of Aldington in Kent, Ed. Bocking, D. D. a Monk of Canterbury, Richard Deering, a Monk, Edward Thwayts, Gent. Henry Gold, Parson of Aldermay, Hugh Rich, a Friar Ob-servant, Richard Risby and Thomas Gold, Gentle-men. This Maid had learned to counterfeit falling into Trances, in which she would deliver many strange Things, and amongst other, said, That by Revelation from God and his Saints, she was informed, that if K. Henry proceeded to the Divorce, and married another, he should not be King of England one Month after. And here we may see how credulous sometimes great Scholars are in believing Impostures, when Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter, were thought to give Credit to this Counterfeit: So that we need not wonder at St. Austin, who though he gave Credit to many lying Miracles, yet they were such as had more Probability in them than this, which consisted in nothing but making of Faces, as upon Examination of the Maid and her Abettors, was confessed; and thereupon she and most of them were condemned, drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged.

A.D. 1534 The Holy Maid of Kent, her Imposture discovered, and she hanged.

In the mean Time the Scots had been troublesome, and made Inroads upon the Borders; till at last, Commissioners being sent to treat of Agreement, a Peace was concluded, to continue both the Kings Lives; which on the twentieth of May, this Year, was openly proclaimed.

About this Time, at the Suit of the Lady Katharine Dowager, a Bull was sent from the Pope, which cursed both the King and the Realm; which Bull was set up in the Town of Dunkirk, in Flanders, the Messenger not daring to come nearer: And because it was known that the Lady Dowager had procured this Curse to be sent, the Duke of Suffolk was sent to her, lying then at Bugden besides Huntingdon, to discharge a great Part of her Household-servants; yet leaving her a convenient Number like a Princess.

It was now the six and twentieth Year of K. Henry's Reign, when in a Parliament holden, an Act was made for establishing the Succession in the Crown upon the Lady Elizabeth; to which, first all the Lords, Knights, and Burgesses were sworn; and after Commissioners were sent into all Parts of the Realm, to take the Oath of all Men and Women to the said Act. Another Act was also made, which authorized the King to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Pope's Authority to be utterly abolished. But Dr. John Fisher, Bishop of Rocheſter, Sir Thomas More, Knight, and Dr. Wilson, Parson of St. Thomas Apostles, in London, expressly denied at Lambeth, before the Archbishop of Canterbury, to take the Oaths; of whom Dr. Wilson recanted, but the other two, persisting in their Opinion, were both of them beheaded. Of these two, Bishop Fisher was much lamented, as reputed a Man both of great Learning and good Life. The Pope had elected him Cardinal, and his Hat was come as far as Calais, but before it could come into England, his Head was off. Sir Thomas More was both learned, and very wise, but so given to a Vein of merry Jestings and Scoffing, that he could not refrain it at the very Time of his Death, as when he was carried to

The Pope's Authority in England abolished by Parliament. Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter and Sir Thomas More beheaded; and why.

A.D. 1535 the Tower, being demanded his upper Garment (meaning his Gown) You shall have it, said he, and gave them his Cap; saying, It was the uppermost Garment he had: Also, when being upon the Scaffold, the Hangman kneeled down and asked him Forgiveness; I forgive thee, said he, but I promise thee, thou wilt never have Credit by cutting off my Head, my Neck is so short: And when he was to lay his Head down upon the Block, having a great gray Beard, he stroked it out, and said to the Hangman, I pray you let me lay my Beard over the Block, lest you should cut it; for though you have Warrant to cut off my Head, you have none to cut my Beard. But his Devotion was no jesting Matter, for he used to wear a Shirt of Hair next his Skin for a perpetual Penance; and oftentimes in the Church he would put on a Surplice, and help the Priest to say Mass; which he forbore not to do, even when he was Lord Chancellor of England, as one Time the Duke of Norfolk coming to the Church found him doing it. Two memorable Things are recorded of him: One, which shews his great Integrity, and the small Reckoning he made of Riches, that having passed through so many great Employments, and born so many great Offices, yet in all his Time he never purchased above one hundred Pounds Land a Year, nor left any great Stock of Money behind him when he died. The other, which shews his filial Piety, that being Lord Chancellor of England, at the same Time that his Father was a Judge of the King's Bench, he would always at his going to Westminster, go first to the King's Bench, and ask his Father Blessing, before he went to sit in the Court of Chancery.

The ninth of July, this Year, the Lord D'acres of the North was arraigned at Westminster of High-Treason, before the Duke of Norfolk, as High-Steward of England: His Indictment being read, he so answered every Part and Matter therein contained, that by his Peers he was found not Guilty; a rare Thing to stop a Current that ran with such Violence! The one and twentieth of September, Doctor Taylor, Master of the Rolls, was discharged of that Office; and the nineteenth of October following, Thomas Cromwell was sworn in his Place.

Cromwell is made Master of the Rolls.

This Year the King of the Scots was installed Knight of the Garter, by his Deputy the Lord Erskine; and Stephen Gardiner, who after the Cardinal's Death, was made Bishop of Winchester, was sent Ambassador Lieger into France, where he remained three Years. Also in January, of this Year, Katharine, Princess Dowager, fell into her last Sickness; to whom the King sent the Emperor's Ambassador Lieger, desiring her to be of good Comfort; but she finding her Death to approach, caused only one of her Gentlewomen to write a Letter to the King, commending to him her Daughter and his, and beseeching him to be a good Father to her; and then desiring him further, to have some Consideration of her Servants. On the eighth of January, at Kimbolton, she departed this Life, and was buried at Peterborough. Wives. Also the nine and twentieth of January this Year, Queen Anne was delivered of a Child before her Time, which was born dead.

And now King Henry began to fall into those great Disorders, which have been the Blemish of his Life, and have made him to be blotted out of the Catalogue of our best Princes. For first in October this Year, he sent Doctor Lee and others to visit the Abbies, Priories, and Nunneries in England, who set at Liberty all those Religious Persons that would forsake their Habit, and all that were under the Age of four and twenty Years; and in December following, a Survey was taken of all Chantries, and the Names of such as had the Gift of them. After which, in a Parliament holden the fourth of February, an Act was made, which gave the King all Religious Houses, with all their Lands and Goods, that were of the Value of three hundred Marks a Year and under; the Number of which Houses was three hundred seventy and six; the Value of their Lands Yearly, above two and thirty thousand Pounds, their moveable Goods one hundred thousand, the Religious Persons put out of the same Houses above ten thousand. This Year William Tindal was burnt at a Town in Flanders between Brussels and Mechlin, called Villefort, for translating into English the New Testament, and divers Parts of the Old; who having been long imprisoned, was upon the Lord Cromwell's writing for his Deliverance, in all Haste brought to the Fire and burnt.

It was now the eight and twentieth Year of King Henry's Reign, when one Monday there were solemn Jufts holden at Greenwich, from whence the King suddenly departed and came to Westminster; whose sudden Departure struck great Amazement into many, but to the Queen especially, and not without Cause: For the next Day the Lord Rochford, her Brother, and Henry Norris, were brought to the Tower of London Prisoners; whither also the same Day, at five o' Clock in the Afternoon, was brought Queen Anne her self, by Sir Thomas Audely, Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, and Sir William Kingston, Lieutenant of the Tower, who at the Tower-gate fell on her Knees before the said Lords, beseeching God to help her, as she was innocent of that whereof she was accused. On the fifteenth of May she was arraigned in the Tower before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting as High-Steward of England. When her Indictment was read, she made unto it so wise and discreet Answers, that she seemed fully to clear her self of all Matters laid to her Charge: But being tried by her Peers, whereof the Duke of Suffolk was Chief, she was by them found Guilty, and had Judgment pronounced by the Duke of Norfolk. Immediately the Lord Rochford, her Brother, was likewise arraigned and condemned: Who on the seventeenth of May, together with Henry Norris, Mark Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the King's Privy-Chamber, about Matters touching the Queen, were beheaded on the Tower-bill. Queen Anne her self, on the nineteenth of May, on a Scaffold upon the Green within the Tower, was beheaded with the Sword of Calais by

A.D. 1537 the Hangman of that Town: Her Body with the Head was buried in the Quire of the Chapel there. This Queen Anne was the Daughter of Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth, Daughter of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk; the Earl's Father was the Son of Sir William Bullen, whose Wife was Margaret the second Daughter and Co-heir of Thomas Butler Earl of Ormond; and the said Sir William was the Son of Sir Godfrey Bullen, Lord Mayor of London, who lieth buried in St. Leonard's Church in the Jewry, whose Wife was Anne, eldest Daughter and Co-heir to Thomas Lord Hoo and Hastings, and his Descent was out of the House of the Bullens in the County of Norfolk: Thus much for her Parentage.

Her Religion and Alms-deeds.

Her Inno-
cency.

For her Religion, she was an earnest Professor, and one of the first Countenancers of the Gospel: In Alms-deeds so liberal, that in nine Month's Space, it is said, she distributed among the Poor, to the Value of fifteen thousand Pounds. Now for the Crimes for which she died (Adultery and Incest) Proofs of her Guiltiness there are none recorded; of her Innocency many. First, her own clearing of all Objections at the Time of her Arraignment: Then Cromwell's Writing to the King, after full Examination of the Matter, that many Things have been objected, but none confessed, only some Circumstances had been acknowledged by Mark Smeton (and what was Mark Smeton, but a mean Fellow, one that, upon Promise of Life, would say any thing? And having said something, which they took hold of, he was soon after executed, lest he should retract it) Lastly, they that were accused with her, they all denied it to the Death; even Henry Norris, whom the King specially favoured, and promised him Pardon, if he would but confess it. It was a poor Proof of Incest with her Brother, that coming one Morning into her Chamber before she was up, he leaned down upon her Bed, to say something in her Ear; yet this was taken hold of for a Proof: And it need be no marvel, if we consider the many Adversaries she had, as being a Protestant, and perhaps in that respect, the King himself not greatly her Friend (For though he had excluded the Pope, yet he continued a Papist still) and then who knows not, that Nature is not more able of an Acorn to make an Oak, than Authority is able of the least Surmise to make a Certainty? But howsoever it was that her Death was contrived, certain it is, that it cast upon K. Henry a dishonourable Imputation; inso-much that where the Protestant Princes of Germany had resolved to choose him for Head of their League; after they heard of this Queen's Death, in such a Manner, they utterly refused him as unworthy of the Honour: And it is memorable what Conceit Queen Anne her self had of her Death; for at the Time when she was led to be beheaded in the Tower, she called one of the King's Privy-Chamber to her, and said unto him, Commend me to the King, and tell him, he is constant in his Course of advancing me; for from a private Gentlewoman, he made me a Marchioness, from a Marchioness a Queen; and now that he had left no higher Degree of worldly Honour for me, he hath made me a Martyr.

Immediately after her Death, in the Week A.D. 1537 before Whitsuntide, the King married Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, who at Whitsuntide was openly shewed as Queen: And on Tuesday in Whitsun-week, her Brother, Sir Edmund Seymour, was created Viscount Beauchamp, and Sir Walter Hungerford was made Lord Hungerford.

The eighth of June the Parliament began; during the which, the Lord Thomas Howard, without the King's Assent, had affianced the Lady Margaret Douglass, Daughter to the Queen of Scots, and Niece to the King: For which he was attainted of Treason, and an Act was made for like Offenders hereafter; and so he died in the Tower, and she long Time remained there a Prisoner; yet afterward was set at Liberty, and married Matthew Earl of Lenox, who by him had Henry, Father of James I. King of Great Britain.

In the Time of this Parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy had a solemn Convocation at St. Paul's Church in London, where, after much Disputation and Debating of Matters, they published a Book of Religion, entitled, Articles devised by the King's Highness: In which Book are specially mentioned but three Sacraments, namely, Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance; also certain Injunctions were set forth, whereby many of the old Holidays were abrogated, specially those that fell in Harvest-time.

Articles devised by the King's Highness.

The two and twentieth of July, Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerset (base Son of King Henry by Elizabeth Blunt) died at St. James's, and was buried at Thetstone in Norfolk.

The nine and twentieth of June, the King held a great Just and Triumph at Westminster, but a disastrous Sea-fight was upon the Water, where one Gates, a Gentleman, was drowned in his Harness, and by the bursting of a Gun, two Mariners were sore maimed. In July following, Thomas Cromwell, Secretary to the King, and Master of the Rolls, was made Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal: And the nineteenth of July, the Lord Fitz-Warren was created Earl of Bath; and the Day after, the said Cromwell was made Lord Cromwell, and on the eighteenth of July, Vicar General under the King over the Spirituality; who sate divers Times in the Convocation-House, amongst the Bishops, as Head over them. And now was the State of Religion in England come to a strange Pass, because always in passing, and had no Consistence: For at first, the Authority of the Pope was excluded in some Cases only, a while after in all, but yet his Doctrine was wholly retained. Afterward his Doctrine came to be impugned, but in some few Points only; a while after, in many more; that the Fable of Proteus might no longer be a Fable, when the Religion in England might be his true Moral. And indeed, it could be no otherwise; the Distance between the two Religions being not possible to be passed, per saltum, but must be done by Degrees; which Degrees may be observed in the Progress of the Story. For where at first it was permitted only to read the Bible in English, now it came to be permitted to pray in English; for now in Sep-

A.D. 1537 the Ten Commandments, and all the Articles of the Christian Faith translated into English, and to be taught by all Persons and Curates to their Parishioners: Which Innovation so stirred up the People, that in Lincolnshire they assembled to the Number of twenty Thousand, against whom the King himself went in Person; who winning by Perswasion their chief Leaders, brought the rest upon Pardon to submit themselves: But when he had himself done the Work of Mercy, he afterward sent the Duke of Suffolk, with Sir Francis Bryan, and Sir John Russel, to do the Work of Justice; who caused Nicholas Melton, and a Monk, naming himself Captain Cobler, and thirteen other (Ring-leaders of the Sedition) to be apprehended, and most of them to be executed. But this Commotion was scarce appeased, when presently there arose another in the North-parts, where forty Thousand were assembled, giving themselves out for an Holy Pilgrimage, where on one Side of their Ensigns, they had CHRIST hanging on the Cross, on the other Side, the Cup and Bread of the Sacrament, as taking Arms only for Maintenance of the Faith of CHRIST, and Deliverance of the Holy Church now oppressed. But these were opposed by George Earl of Shrewsbury, who having raised an Army without Commission, though to resist the Rebels, yet began to be much troubled, whether in so doing he had not committed Treason, and was never quiet till he had sent to the King for Pardon, and Commission to proceed: At which Time a Rumour being raised amongst his Soldiers, that the Earl so well liked the Rebels Cause, that what Shewsoever he made, yet when it should come to the Trial, he would not stick to join with them, and take their Parts. To remove this Opinion out of their Minds, he caused all his Soldiers to come before him, and made his Chaplain give him an Oath; by which he swore, in their Hearing, to be true to the Crown, and never be assisting to any Rebels. To his Aid were sent the Duke of Norfolk, with the Marquess of Exeter, the Earls of Huntingdon and Rutland; who with a mighty Army approaching the Rebels, beyond Doncaster, in the Way towards York, attempted first to have pacified them without Bloodshed; but when no Perswasions would serve, it was resolved of both Sides to come to Battel. But see here the great Goodness of God; for the Night before the Day appointed for Battel, it happened that a little Brook, called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon a small Rain grew to such a Height, that it was not passable by either Foot or Horse; so as the Armies having Time to consider, and considering perhaps this Miracle as sent of God, they came to Agreement, and upon Pardon disbanded and returned to their Houses: But in the mean Time they had besieged the Castle of Scarborough, where the resolute Carriage of Sir Ralph Evers is memorable, who held the Castle by only his own Servants and Tenants, and that, when for twenty Days together he had no other Sustenance but Bread and Water. But all Commotions were not yet appeased; for at this very Time there was another great Army assembled out of Cumberland, A.D. 1537 Westmorland, and the North Parts of Lancashire, marching Southwards: But by the Diligence of the Earl of Derby, to whom also the Earl of Suffex was sent, they were suppressed, and their chief Leaders, as the Abbots of Wally, Sauly, and others, apprehended and hanged. But neither is there yet an End of Commotions; for now in February, Nicholas Musgrave, Thomas Tilby, with others to the Number of twelve thousand, began a Rebellion, and besieged Carlisle; but by the Power of the City were first beaten back, and then were encountred by the Duke of Norfolk, who caused seventy-four of them, by Martial Law, to be hanged on the Walls of Carlisle. But neither was there yet an End of Commotions; for now in Streington, Pickering, Leigh, and Scarborough, began a new Rebellion, by Procurement of Francis Bigot, who had a great Power, and meant to have taken Hull: But by the Industry of Sir Ralph Ellarker, and the Mayor of the Town, threescore of the Rebels were taken and hanged, and the rest put to Flight, and glad to be quiet. But neither yet was there an End of Commotions; for in the latter End of this eight and twentieth Year the Lord D'arcy, the Lord Huffey, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Bulmer and his Wife, Sir Thomas Piercy, Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest, Esquire, and others began to conspire, although each of them before had been pardoned by the King: But this, as being but the Fag-end of the Commotion, was soon suppressed; the Lord D'arcy was beheaded on the Tower-hill, the Lord Huffey at Lincoln, Sir Robert Constable was hanged in Chains at Hull, Sir John Bulmer's Paramour was burnt in Smithfield, and most of the other were executed at Tyburn. Tantæ molis erat, so great a Matter it was to make the Realm be quiet, in so great Innovations of Religion.

This Year, on St. George's Feast, the Lord Cromwell was made Knight of the Garter, and on the twelfth of October, which is St. Edward's Even, at Hampton-Court, the Queen was delivered of a Son, but with so hard a Labour, that she was fain to be ripped. The Child was named Edward, whose God-fathers at the Christening were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolk; his God-mother was his Sister, the Lady Mary: At his Bishoping his God-father was the Duke of Suffolk. On the eighteenth of October he was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. But the Birth of his Son brought not so much Joy to the King, as the Death of his Queen brought him Sorrow; for within two Days after she died, and was buried at Windfor, and so much was the King's Grief for her Death, that he continued a Widower two Years after.

It is not unworthy the relating, what a miserable Dissolution befel the Family of the Geraldines, or Fitz-Garrets (Earls of Kildare in Ireland) about this Time. For Gerald Fitz-Garret, who had been ten Years Deputy in Ireland, upon Complaint for some Fault was sent for over into England; where, not making

A.D. 1537 a satisfying Answer, he was committed to the Tower; but before his coming over, had, with the King's Leave, left Deputy there his own Son, a young Man of not above twenty Years of Age, but yet ripe of Understanding, and fit for the Place. This young Lord hearing that his Father was committed Prisoner to the Tower, and soon after, as the Rumour encreased, that he was put to Death; in Rage to be revenged, rose up in Arms: And having five Uncles in the Country (Men of great Estimation) drew them, though some of them unwillingly, to take his Part. Amongst other Outrages he committed, the Archbishop of Dublin was slain in his Presence. The Father in the Tower hearing hereof, with very Grief died; the Son and his Uncles, upon the King's sending an Army, were all either taken or submitted; and being sent for over into England, those of his Uncles, that against their Wills had been drawn into the Action, had good Hopes of their Lives, till entering the Ship of Passage, which was called the Cow, they then presently despaired, because of a Prophecy, that five Sons of a certain Earl should be carried into England in the Belly of a Cow, and never after return: And indeed it fell out true; for through the Malice of their Adversaries, exasperating the King against them, and saying there would never be Quietness in Ireland as long as any of the Geraldines were left alive, they were put to Death: One only Son of the Family remained, a Youth of thirteen Years of Age, who, though at that Time sick of the Small-pox, yet made Shift to save himself by Flight; fled first into France, and frighted from thence, afterward into Flanders, and driven from thence, at last into Italy, where protected by Reginald Pool, at that Time made Cardinal by Pope Julius III. he was afterward, by his Means, restored to his Dignity and his Patrimony.

Edward Seymour, Viscount Beauchamp, is made Earl of Hertford. Sir William Fitzwilliams, Lord Admiral, is created Earl of Southampton.

Frier Forrest hanged by the Middle, and withal burnt; by which a Prophecy is fulfilled.

This Year Edward Seymour, Viscount Beauchamp, the Queen's Brother, was created Earl of Hertford, and Sir William Fitzwilliams, Lord Admiral, was created Earl of Southampton. Sir Master Paulet was made Vice-Treasurer, Sir John Russel was made Comptroller of the King's House, and divers Gentlemen were made Knights. In February divers Roods were taken down by the King's Commandment; as the Rood of Baxeley, called the Rood of Grace, which was made with Screws to move the Eyes and Lips; also the Rood called St. Saviour, at Bermondsey Abby in Southwark, and divers others. In May a Frier Observant, called Frier Forrest, who had taken the Oath of Supremacy himself, yet privately perswaded others, that the King was not Supreme Head of the Church, was thereupon examined, and for his Defence said, That he took the Oath with his outward Man, but his inward Man never consented to it: But this Answer served not his Turn from being condemned; and on a Pair of Gallows prepared for him, in Smithfield, he was hanged by the Middle and Arm-holes, all quick, and under the Gallows was made a Fire, wherewith he was consumed. A little before his Execution, a huge great Image was brought to the Gallows, fetched out of Wales, which the Welsh-men had in great Reverence, called Dar-vel Gatheran, of which went a Prophecy, that this Image would set a whole Forrest on Fire, which was thought to take Effect, in setting this Frier Forrest on Fire, and consuming him to nothing.

In September, by the special Motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable Images, unto All Images which were made any special Pilgrimages and Offerings, were taken down and burnt; as the Images of Walsingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the Lady of Wilsdon, with many others; and forthwith, by Means of the said Cromwell, all the Orders of the Friars and Nuns, with their Cloisters and Houses, were suppressed and put down: Also the Shrines of counterfeit Saints, amongst others, the Shrine of Thomas Becket, in the Priory of Christ-Church, was taken to the King's Use, and his Bones, Scull, and all which was there found, with a Piece broken out by the Wound of his Head, were all burnt in the same Church by the Command of the Lord Cromwell: And the one and twentieth of October the Church of Thomas Becket in London, called the Hospital of St. Thomas of Acres, was suppressed: The sixteenth of November the Black-friers in London were suppressed; the next Day the White-friers, the Gray-friers, and the Monks of the Charter-house, and so all the other immediately after; only three Abbots resisted, the Abbot of Colchester, the Abbot of Reading, and the Abbot of Glasenbury, who therefore were all taken and executed. The four and twentieth of November the Bishop of Rochester preached at St. Paul's Cross, and there shewed the Blood of Hales, affirming it to be no Blood, but Honey clarified and coloured with Saffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Council.

The Number of Monasteries suppressed, were six hundred forty-five, besides fourscore and ten Colleges, one hundred and ten Hospitals, and of Chantries and free Chappels two thousand three hundred seventy four. But now to make Amends for the suppressing of so many Monasteries, the King instituted certain new Bishopricks, as at Westminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester; and assigned certain Canons and Prebends to each of them.

The third of November Henry Courtney, Marquess of Exeter, and Earl of Devonshire, Henry Pool, Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington, Knight of the Garter, and Master of the King's Horse, and Sir Edward Nevil, Brother to the Lord Aburgenny, were sent to the Tower, being accused by Sir Geoffrey Pool, the Lord Montacute's Brother, of High Treason: They were indicted for devising to promote and advance one Reinald Pool to the Crown, and put down K. Henry. This Pool was a near Kinsman of the King's (being the Son of the Lady Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, Daughter and Heir to George Duke of Clarence.) He had been brought up by the King in Learning, and made Dean of Exeter; but being sent after to learn Experience by Travel, he grew so great a Friend of the Pope's, that he became an Enemy to King Henry, and for his Enmity to the King, was by Pope Julius III. made Cardinal. For this Man's Cause the Lords aforesaid being condemned, were all executed; the Lord Marquess, the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevil, beheaded on the Tower-

A.D. 1537 Tower-Hill the ninth of January, Sir Nicholas Carew the third of March: Two Priests condemned with them were hanged at Tyburn; Sir Geoffrey Pool, though condemned also, yet had his Pardon.

About this time one Nicholson, alias Lambert, being accused for denying the Real Presence in the Sacrament, appealed to the King, and the King was content to hear him: Whereupon a Throne was set up in the Hall of the King's Palace at Westminster, for the King to sit on: And when the Bishops had urged their Arguments, and could not prevail, then the King took him in hand, hoping, perhaps, to have the Honour of converting a Heretick, when the Bishops could not do it; and withal promised him Pardon if he would recant; but all would not do: Nicholson remained obstinate, the King mis'd his Honour, the Delinquent mis'd his Pardon, and shortly after was drawn to Smithfield, and there burnt.

About this Time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by Instigation of Cardinal Pool, had earnestly moved divers great Princes to invade England; he, as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earnestly to provide for Defence; and to that End rode himself to the Sea-coasts to see them fortified, and in needful Places Bulwarks to be erected. He caused his Navy to be rigged, and to be in Readiness at any short Warning: He caused Musters to be taken in all Shires, and Lists of all able Men in every County, in London specially; where Sir William Forman, the then Mayor, certified the Number of fifteen Thousand; not that there were no more, but that so many were ready prepared; and these, on the eighth of May, the King himself saw mustered in St. James's Park; where the Citizens strove in such sort to exceed each other in Bravery of Arms, and Forwardness of Service, as if the City had been a Camp, and they not Men of the Gown, but all professed Soldiers; which they performed to their great Cost, but greater Commendation.

An. Reg. 31.

The King enclines to marry again.

It was now the one and thirtieth Year of King Henry's Reign, and the nine and fortieth of his Age; when having continued a Widower two Years, he began to think of Marrying again; and he needed not to be a Suitor for a Wife, for he was sued unto to take one. The Emperor solicited him to marry the Duchess of Milan; but to marry her he must first obtain a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was resolved rather to have no Wife, than to have any more to do with the Pope. Then the Duke of Cleve made Suit to him to marry the Lady Anne his Sister, and he was a Protestant Prince; and so, though differing in Points of Doctrine, yet in the main Point of excluding the Pope, both of one Mind. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell specially; and indeed it concerned him more than any other, that the King should take a Protestant Wife, seeing his Actions had been such, as none but a Protestant Queen would ever like; and if the Queen should not like them, the King, though done by his Leave, would not like them long. Hereupon such Means were used, that Ambassadors came from the Duke of Cleve to conclude the Match; and then, the eleventh of December, the Lady herself, in great State, was brought to Calais, and then over to Dover; and being come to Rocheſter, the King secretly came to see her: Afterward she was conducted to London, met by the Way, in several Places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdom. The third of January she was received into London by Sir William Hollis, Knight, then Lord Mayor, with Orations, Pageants, and all Complements of State, the greatest that ever had been seen. On Twelfth-day the Marriage was solemnized: The Archbishop of Canterbury did the Office; the Earl of Overſtein, a German Lord, gave her. In April following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the King's Heart for ever, by making this Match, was made Earl of Essex; for in March before, Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, and the antientest Earl of England, had broke his Neck, by trying to break a young Horse, leaving only one Daughter; and she dying without Issue, the Earldom came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the Honour, till afterward in Queen Elizabeth's Time; and then made, but not restored.

The Lord Cromwell is made Earl of Essex. How the Earldom of Essex came to the Family of Devereux.

The ninth of March, the King created Sir William Paulet, Treasurer of his House, Lord Saint John; Sir John Russel, Comptroller, Lord Russel; and shortly after Sir William Par was created Lord Par. The eight and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margaret Countess of Salisbury, Gertrude, Wife to the Marquess of Exeter, Reynold Pool Cardinal, Brother to the Lord Montacute, Sir Adrian Fortescue, Thomas Dingley, Knight of St. John's, and divers others, were attainted of High-Treason; of whom Fortescue and Dingley the tenth of July were beheaded, the Countess of Salisbury two Years after: And in this Parliament the Act of the Six Articles was established, and Sir Nicholas Hare was restored to his Place of Speaker in the Parliament.

Earls created,

It was now five Months after the King's Marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve; and though the King, at the first Sight of the Lady, did not like her Person, yet, whether as respecting the Honour of Ladies, he would not disgrace her at the first Meeting; or whether he meant to try how Time might work him to a better Liking; or indeed, that he would not give Distaste to the German Princes at that Time, for some Ends he had a working, he dissembled the Matter, and all Things went on in a Shew of Contentment on all Hands. But for all these Shews, the crafty Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner, finding how the World went with the King's Affection towards his Queen, and for her Sake with Cromwell, to neither of whom he was greatly affected (not to the Queen, as misliking her Religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his Greatness) he so wrought upon the King's Inclination, what by suggesting, and what by aggravating, that the Lord Cromwell, the ninth of July, sitting in the Council-Chamber, was suddenly apprehended, and committed to the Tower; and the nineteenth of the same Month was attainted by Parliament, and never came to his Answer; by a Law which, as some reported, he himself had

A.D. 1540 caused to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-Hill, for Crimes, as appears in Record, of Heresy and Treason. This Lord Cromwell was born at Putney, a Village in Surrey near the Thames Side; Son to a Smith; after whose Decease his Mother was married to a Sheer-man. For the Pregnancy of his Wit he was first entertained by Cardinal Wolsey, and by him employed in many great Affairs. The Cardinal falling, the King took him into his Service; and finding his great Abilities, first advanced him for his Worth, and then for his Pleasure overthrew him. But the greatest Part of Stephen Gardiner's Practice had been done before: For at Midsummer before, the King caused the Queen to remove to Richmond, as for her Health and Pleasure; and in the Time of her Absence, on the sixth of July, sent certain Lords to the Lower House of Parliament, who there declared certain Causes, for which the King's Marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve was not to be counted lawful; and so carried the Matter, that the Convocation clearly determined, the King might marry any other, and so might she. Being thus divorced, it was further Enacted, she should no more be called Queen, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The Fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expressly delivered: Some say a Pre-contract of the said Lady with a Lord of Germany was pretended; but it seems to have been from some Womanish Defect in her Body; as she spared not to affirm, that she had never been carnally known by the King in all the Time of their lying together: And, as it is said, when her Ladies one Time said unto her, that they looked now every Day to hear of her great Belly; she should answer, they might look long enough, unless saying, How dost thou, Sweet-heart? Good morrow, Sweet-heart, and such like Words, could make a great Belly; for, said she, more than this there never passed between the King and me. However it was, she willingly submitted to the Decree, whether out of Fear, or perhaps, as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private Life here in England, well respected of the King, and dying sixteen Years after, in the fourth Year of Queen Mary, was buried at Westminster.

ard, was shewed openly as Queen at Hampton-Court. On the tenth of June the Year following, Sir Edmund Knevet of Norfolk, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-Cloth, for striking one Master Cleer of Norfolk, within the Tennis-Court of the King's House: Being found guilty, he had Judgment to lose his right Hand, and to forfeit all his Lands and Goods: Whereupon there was called to do Execution, first the Serjeant-Surgeon, with his Instruments pertaining to his Office; then the Serjeant of the Wood-yard, with a Mallet and a Block to lay the Hand upon; then the King's Master-Cook, with a Knife to cut off the Hand; then the Serjeant of the Larder, to set the Knife right on the Joint; then the Serjeant-Farrier, with Searing-Irons to sear the Veins; then the Serjeant of the Poultry, with a Cock, which Cock should have his Head smitten off upon the same Block, and with the same Knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandry, with Sear-Cloths; then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a Pan of Fire to heat the Irons, a Chafer of Water to cool the Ends of the Irons, and two Forms for all Officers to set their Stuff on; then the Serjeant of the Cellar, with Wine, Ale, and Beer; then the Serjeant of the Ewry, with Bason, Ewre, and Towels. All Things being thus prepared, Sir William Pickering, Knight-Marshal, was commanded to bring in his Prisoner, Sir Edmund Knevet, to whom the Chief Justice declared his Offence, which the said Knevet confessed, and humbly submitted himself to the King's Mercy; only he desired, that the King would spare his right Hand, and take his left, because, said he, if my right Hand be spared, I might live to do the King Service: Of whose Submission, and Reason of his Suit, when the King was informed, he granted him to lose neither of his Hands, and pardoned him also of his Lands and Goods.

A.D. 1541

The Summer of his three and thirtieth Year, King Henry, with his Queen Katharine, made a Progress into the North Parts; and returning at Alballontide to Hampton-Court, he was there informed of the Queen's dissolute Life, first before her Marriage, with one Francis Deerham, a Gentleman of Norfolk, whom employed afterward in Ireland, she had lately again at Pomfret received into her Service; and now, since her Marriage, with one Thomas Colepepper, of the King's Privy-Chamber: Whereupon, the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothsley Knight, Secretary to the King, was sent to the Queen at Hampton-Court, to charge her with these Crimes, and discharging her Household, to cause her to be conveyed to Sion, there to remain till the King's Pleasure should be further known. The Delinquents being examined, Deerham confessed, that before the King's Marriage with the Lady Katharine, there had been a Pre-contract between himself and her; but when he once understood of the King's Liking towards her, he then waved and concealed it for her Preferment. So the first of December these Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guild-hall, they confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment to die, as in Cases of Treason: The tenth of December they were drawn from 1542.

King Henry is informed of the dissolute Life of Queen Katharine with Deerham and Colepepper.

A.D. 1542 from the Tower to Tyburn, where Colepepper was beheaded, and Deerham was hanged and dismembred: Colepepper's Body was buried in St. Sepulcher's Church in London, but both their Heads were set on London-bridge. The two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the King's Bench, the Lord William Howard, and the Lady Margaret his Wife, Katharine Tilney and Alice Wreftwold Gentlewomen, Joan Bulmer Wife to Anthony Bulmer Gentleman, Anne Howard Wife to Henry Howard Esquire, and Brother to the Queen, with divers others, who were all condemned for Misprision of Treason, for concealing the Queen's Misdemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their Lands and Goods during Life, and to remain in perpetual Prison. The sixteenth of January, the Parliament began at Westminster, where the Lords and Commons petitioned the King, that he would not vex himself with the Queen's Offence, and that both she and the Lady Rochford might be attainted by Parliament; and that to avoid protracting of Time, he would give his Royal Assent unto it, under the great Seal, without staying for the End of the Parliament. Also that Deerham and Colepepper, having been attainted before by the common Law, might be attainted likewise by Parliament. All which was assented to by the King; and after, on the thirteenth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochford were beheaded on the Green within the Tower, where they confessed their Offences, and died penitently. Yet something to take off the Offences of this Queen: It is certainly said, that after her Condemnation, she protested to Doctor White, Bishop of Winchester, her last Confessor, that as for the Act for which she was condemned, she took God and his Holy Angels to witness, upon her Soul's Salvation, that she died guiltless.

Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland, whereas before this Time, the Kings of England were only entituled Lords of Ireland: And this Title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland, before Sir Anthony Saintleger, Knight, the King's Deputy there.

About this Time Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle, base Son to King Edward IV. having been imprisoned upon Suspicion of a Practice for betraying of Calais to the French, whilst he was the King's Lieutenant there, was now found to be innocent of the Fact: And thereupon the King, to make some Reparation for his Disgrace, sent him a Ring, and a very gracious Message, by Sir Thomas Wriothesley his Secretary; whereat the said Viscount took so great Joy, that the Night following, of that very Joy he died: So deadly a Thing is any Passion, even Joy it self, if it be extreme. After his Death Sir John Dudley, his Wife's Son, was created Viscount Lisle. This Sir John Dudley was Son to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the first Year of this King's Reign, and was made Viscount Lisle in Right of his Mother.

During this Parliament, one George Ferrers Gentleman, Servant to the King, and Burges for the Town of Plymouth in Devonshire, in A.D. 1542 going to the Parliament House, was arrested in London by a Process out of the King's Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as Surety for one Welden, at the Suit of one White: Which Arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Moyl, Knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgeses there; Order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint John, should be sent to the Compter in Bread-street (whither the said Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered. But the Officers of the Compter not only refused to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant such Language, that they fell at last to an Affray; at which Time the Sheriffs coming, they also took the Officers Part; so as the Serjeant was fain to return without the Prisoner: Which being signified to the Speaker and the Burgeses, they took the Matter in so ill Part, that they would sit no more without their Burgeses: And thereupon rising up, repaired to the upper House, where the whole Case was declared to the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audely Lord Chancellor, and the Lords and Judges there assembled; who judging the Contempt to be very great, referred the Punishment thereof to the House of Commons it self: Whereupon returning to their Places again, upon new Debate of the Case, they took Order that their Serjeant should once more repair to the Sheriffs of London, and demand the Prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the Matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellor offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it; being of a clear Opinion, that all Commandments from the neather House were to be executed by their Serjeants without Writ, only by shewing his Mace, which is his Warrant. But before the Serjeants return into London, the Sheriffs better advised, became more mild, and upon the second Demand delivered the Prisoner without any Denial: But then the Serjeant had further in Charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerks of the Compter, to appear personally the next Morning before the House of Commons: Where appearing, they were charged by the Speaker with their Contempt, and compelled to make immediate Answer, without being admitted to any Council. Sir Roger Cholmley, Recorder of London, offered to speak in their Cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the Parties themselves. In Conclusion, the Sheriffs and White who had caused the Arrest, were committed to the Tower; the Officer that did the Arrest, with four other Officers, to Newgate; but after two or three Days, upon the humble Suit of the Mayor, were set at Liberty: And because the said Ferrers, being in Execution upon a Condemnation of Debt, and set at large by Priviledge of Parliament, was not by Law to be brought again into Execution, and so the Creditor without Remedy for his Debt against him as his principal Debtor: Therefore after long Debate, by the Space of nine or ten Days together, they at last resolved to make an Act on Purpose, to revive the Execution of the said Debt against Welden who was

A.D. 1542 principal Debtor, and to discharge Ferrers that was but Surety: Wherein notwithstanding the House was divided, and the Act passed but by fourteen Voices. The King being advertised of this Proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancellor and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the Lower House, to whom he declared his Opinion to this Effect: First commending their Wisdom, in maintaining the Priviledges of their House (which he would not have to be infringed in any Point) he alledged that he being the Head of the Parliament, and attending in his own Person upon the Business thereof, ought in Reason to have Privilege for himself and all his Servants attending upon him; so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burgeses, but only his Servant, yet in that Respect, he was to have the Privilege as well as any other. For I understand, faith he, that you not only for your own Persons, but also for your necessary Servants, even to your Cooks and Horse-keepers, enjoy the same Privilege; infomuch, as my Lord Chancellor here present hath informed us, that whilst he was Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in Execution upon a Statute of the Staple; and for so much as the said Cook during all the Parliament served the Speaker in that Office, he was taken out of Execution by Privilege of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court (as our learned Council informeth us) is so great, that all Acts and Proccesses coming out of any other Court, must for a Time cease and give Place to it. And touching the Party himself, though for his Presumption he was worthy to have lost his Debt, yet I commend your Equity, that have restored him to his Debt against him that was the Principal. When the King had said this, Sir Edward Montacute, Lord Chief Justice, rose up and confirmed by many Reasons all that the King had said, as likewise did all the other Lords, none speaking any thing to the contrary.

1543. It was now the four and thirtieth Year of King Henry's Reign, when in May he took a Loan of Money of all such as were valued at fifty Pounds and upwards in the Subsidy-book. The Lord Privy-seal, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir Thomas Baker and Sir Thomas Wriothesley, were Commissioners for the Loan in London, who so handled the Matter, that of some chief Citizens they obtained a thousand Marks impress'd to the King's Use: For which Privy-Seals were deliverd to repay it again within two Years.

At this Time were many Complaints made by the English against the Scots, partly for receiving and maintaining divers English Rebels fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the English Borders: But still when the King of England was preparing to oppose them, the Scottish King would send Ambassadors to treat of Reconcilement; till at last, after many delusory Pranks of the Scots, the King of England, no longer enduring such Abuses, sent the Duke of Norfolk his Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earls of Shrewsbury, Derby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, the Lords of the North

Parts, Sir Anthony Brown, Master of the King's Horse, and Sir John Gage, Comptroller of the King's House, with others to the Number of twenty thousand Men; who on the one and twentieth of October entred Scotland, where staying but eight Days only, he burnt above eighteen Towns, Abbys, and Castles, and then, without having Battel offered, for want of Victuals returned to Berwick. As soon as he returned, comes abroad the King of Scots, raileth a Power of fifteen thousand Men, and using great Threatnings what he would do, invaded the West Borders: But the Edge of his Threatning was soon taken off: For the Bastard D'acres with Jack of Musgrave, setting upon them with only an hundred Light Horse, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to Flight; upon a Conceit that the Duke of Norfolk with all his Army had been come into those Parts: Where were taken Prisoners of the Scots, the Earls of Cassils and Glencar, the Lord Maxwel Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwell, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sincleer, the King's Minion, John Ross Lord of Gray, Roger Erskin, Son to the Lord Erskin, Car Lord of Gredon, the Lord Maxwel's two Brothers, John Lesly, Bastard Son to the Earl of Rothies, George Hume Lord of Hemetton, with divers other Men of Account, to the Number of above two hundred, and more than eight hundred of meaner Calling; so as some one English Man, and some Women also, had three or four Prisoners in their Hands. At which Overthrow the King of Scots took such Grief, that he fell into a burning Ague, and thereof died, leaving behind him one only Daughter. And here King Henry began to apprehend a greater Matter than the Victory; for he and his Council conceived, that his Daughter would be a fit Match for his Son Prince Edward, thereby to make a perpetual Union of the two Kingdoms: And to this Purpose they conferred with the Lords whom they had taken Prisoners; who exceeding glad of the Proposition, and promising to further it by all the possible Means they could, were thereupon set at Liberty, and suffered to return Home. Coming into Scotland, and acquainting the Earl of Arran with the Motion, who was chosen Governor of the young Queen, and of the Realm, the Matter with great Liking was entertained, and in Parliament, of the three Estates in Scotland, the Marriage was confirmed, and a Peace between the two Realms for ten Years proclaimed; and Ambassadors sent into England, for sealing the Conditions. But Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews, being Cardinal, and at the Pope's Devotion, and therefore an utter Enemy to King Henry, so crossed the Business, that it came to nothing, but ended in a War between the two Kingdoms; so as in March the Year following the Lord Seymour, Earl of Hertford, with an Army by Land, and Sir John Dudley, Lord Lisle, with a Fleet by Sea, met at New-Castle, and there joined together, for invading of Scotland. With the Earl of Hertford were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cobham, Clinton, Conyers, the Lord William Howard, with Knights and others, to the Number of

A.D. 1543 ten thousand; with Sir John Dudley, the Admiral, were two hundred Sail of Ships. On the fourth of May the whole Army was landed two Miles from the Town of Leith, at a Place called Grantham Garg; and there the Lord Lieutenant putting his Men in Order, marched towards the Town of Leith; the Lord Admiral led the Forward, the Lieutenant the Battel, and the Earl of Shrewsbury the Reerward. Before they came to the Town of Leith, the Cardinal with six hundred Horse, besides Foot, lay in the Way to impeach the Passage; but they were so assailed by the Harquebusars, that they were glad to fly, and the first Man that fled was the Cardinal himself, and then the Earls of Huntley, Murray, and Bothwell: Hereupon the English made forward to Leith, and entred it without any great Resistance. The sixth of May they marched towards Edinburgh, and as they approached the Town, the Provost, with some of the Burgers, came and offered the Keys of the Town to the Lord Lieutenant, upon Condition they might depart with Bag and Baggage, and the Town to be preserved from Fire: But the Lord Lieutenant told them, their Falshood had been such as deserved no Favour, and therefore, unless they would deliver the Town absolutely without any Condition, he would proceed in his Enterprize and burn the Town. Here we may see what it is to make Men desperate; for to this the Provost answered, They were better then to stand upon Defence: And so indeed they did, and made the English glad to retire; for the Castle shot so fiercely upon them, that having burnt only a Part of the Town, they returned to Leith; but whilst they lay there, they so wasted the Country, that within seven Miles every way of Edinburgh, there was not a Town, nor Village, nor House that was left unburnt. At Leith, the eleventh Day of May, the Lord General made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Conyers, Sir William Wroughton, Sir Thomas Holcroft, Sir Edward Dorrell, Sir Francis Hotbam, and others, to the Number of at least Threescore. In Leith Haven they seized upon all the Scottish Ships, whereof two were of notable Fairness; the one called the Salamander, given by the French King at the Marriage of his Daughter into Scotland; the other called the Unicorn, made by the late Scottish King; the Ballast of which two Ships was Cannon Shot, whereof they found in the Town to the Number of fourscore Thousand. On the fifteenth of May their Army and their Fleet departed from Leith, both in one Hour, having first set the Town on Fire and burned it to the Ground: From Leith the English Army marched to Seaton, from thence to Haddington, from thence to Dunbar, from thence to Ranton; all which Towns and Castles, with divers others, they burnt and utterly defaced; and on the eighteenth of May came to Berwick, not having lost in all the Journey above fourteen Men.

1544. In the mean Time, in King Henry's five and thirtieth Year, on Trinity-Sunday, a new League was entred into and sworn, between the King and the Emperor, at Hampton-Court, to be both Offensive and Defensive.

In this Year Proclamation was made, where- A.D. 1544 by the People were licensed to eat white Meats in Lent; but strictly forbidden the eating of Flesh: Whereupon, shortly after, the Earl of Surrey with divers other Lords and Knights were imprisoned, for eating of Flesh contrary to the Proclamation.

The third of June, this Year, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Obrian was here created Earl of Thomond (which Honour his Posterity enjoyeth to this Day) Mack William à Bary, was created Earl of Clarickard, and Mack Gilpatrick was made Baron of Ebranky.

King Henry had already had five Wives, all of them Maids, and no good Luck with any of them; he will now therefore try his Fortune with a Widow, and thereupon the twelfth of June, in the five and thirtieth Year of his Reign, he took to Wife the Lady Katharine Parr, Widow of the Lord Latimer, late deceased, who was then proclaimed Queen; but how lucky this Match would have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knows, seeing in a short Time of three Years they lived together, it was no small Danger she escaped; which though it happened not till a Year or two after this Time, yet will not unfitly be spoken of in this Place, that so her Story may come together. This Queen, as being an earnest Protestant, had many great Adversaries, by whom she was accused to the King, to have Heretical Books found in her Closet; and this was so much aggravated against her, that they prevailed with the King, to sign a Warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a Purpose to have her burnt for Heresy. This Warrant was delivered to Wriothesley, Lord Chancellor, and he by Chance, or rather indeed by God's Providence, letting it fall from him, it was taken up and carried to the Queen; who having read it, went soon after to visit the King; at that Time keeping his Chamber, by reason of a sore Leg. Being come to the King, he presently fell into Talk with her, about some Points of Religion, demanding her Resolution therein; but she knowing that his Nature was not to be crost, specially considering the Case she was in, made him Answer, That she was a Woman, accompanied with many Imperfections, but his Majesty was Wise and Judicious, of whom she must learn as of her Lord and Head. Not so, by Saint Mary, said the King, for you are a Doctor, Kate, to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often we have seen heretofore. Indeed, Sir, said she, if your Majesty have so conceived, I have been mistaken; for if heretofore I have held Talk with you touching Religion, it hath been to learn of your Majesty some Point, whereof I stood in Doubt, and sometimes, that with my Talk I might make you forget your present Infirmary. And is it even so, Sweet-heart? quoth the King, why then we are Friends, and so kissing her, gave her Leave to depart. But soon after was the Day appointed by the King's Warrant for apprehending her; on which Day, the King disposed to walk in the Garden, had the Queen with him, when suddenly the Lord Chancellor, with forty of the King Henry marries the Lady Katharine Parr, Widow of the Lord Latimer.

She is accused to the King of Heresy.

And by what Means she avoids the Danger.

A.D. 1544 the Guard, came into the Garden with a Purpose to apprehend her: Whom as soon as the King saw, he stepp'd to him, and calling him Knave and Fool, bid him avaunt out of his Presence. The Queen seeing him so angry with him, began to entreat for him; to whom the King said, Ah, poor Soul! thou little knowest what it is he came about; of my Word, Sweet-heart, he hath been to thee a very Knave. And thus by God's Providence was this Queen preserved, who else had tasted as bitter a Cup as any of his former Wives had done.

King Henry sends over an Army to aid the Emperor against the King of France.

About this Time, King Henry and the Emperor sent Garter and Toyson d'Or, Kings at Arms, to demand Performance of certain Articles of the French King; which if he denied, they were then commanded to defy him; but the French King would not suffer them to come within his Land, and so they returned: Whereupon King Henry caused the said Demands to be declared to the French Ambassador at Westminster; and in July sent over six thousand Men, under the Leading of Sir John Wallop, accompanied with divers Knights and Gentlemen. Sir Thomas Seymour was Marshal of the Army, Sir Robert Bowes, Treasurer, Sir Richard Cornwall, Captain of the Horse, and Sir George Carew, his Lieutenant. There were likewise Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir John Rainsford, Sir John Saint-John, and Sir John Gascoigne, Knights, that were Captains of the Foot. Their Commission was to join with the Emperor, and together to make War upon France. The third of August, open War was proclaimed in London, between the Emperor and the King of England on the one Part, and the French King on the other, as mortal Enemy to them both, and to all other Christian Princes besides, as he that had confederated himself with the Turk. Sir John Wallop marching forth of Calais with his Army, joined with the Emperor's Forces, who together went and besieged Landrecy, a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the Borders of the Emperor's Dominions. To raise this Siege the French King had raised a mighty Army, with which he came on as if he meant to give the Emperor Battel: And thereupon the Emperor raising his Siege, with a Purpose to encounter him, the French King took the Opportunity to put Men and Victuals into the Town, which was the Thing he intended; and having done this, the Night following departed with his Army: And then the Emperor seeing him gone, and finding the Winter coming on, and no Hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplied, he also brake up his Army, and returned Home.

Lords made.

This Year, the Sunday before Christmas, the Lord William Parr, Brother to the Queen, who had married the Daughter and Heir of Henry Bouchier Earl of Essex, was at Hampton-Court created Earl of Essex; and Sir William Parr, Knight, Uncle to them both, was made Lord Parr of Horton, and Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and on New-Year's Day, Sir Thomas Wriothsley, the King's Secretary, was made Lord Wriothsley of Tockfield.

In June this Year, Matthew Earl of Lenox A.D. 1544 fled out of Scotland, and came into England, whom King Henry received kindly, and gave him in Marriage the Lady Margaret his Sister's Daughter, by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed Memory. King James his Parentage.

Thomas Audely, Lord Chancellor, being lately dead, Thomas Lord Wriothsley succeeded him in the Place. And now with an Army levied to go for France, the Duke of Norfolk, and the Lord Privy-Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey, the Duke's Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and his Son, Sir Robert Devereux, Sir Thomas Cheyney, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Montjoy, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Thomas Poynings, Captain of Guyfnes, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitsuntide passed over to Calais, and marching towards Monstreul, joined with the Emperor's Forces, under the Leading of the Count De Baron, which two Armies laid Siege to Monstreul, whereof Monsieur De Bies, one of the Marshals of France, was Captain: But being then at Boulogne, and hearing of the Siege of Monstreul, he left Boulogne, and with his Forces came thither, which was the Thing that was desired, to draw him from Boulogne; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolk appointed to pass over with the King's Army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundel, Marshal of the Field, the Lord Saint John, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Gage, Comptroller of the King's House, Sir Anthony Brown, Master of the King's Horse, with divers others, who on the nineteenth of July, came and encamped before Boulogne. The four and twentieth of July, the King in Person, accompanied with divers of the Nobility, came to Calais; and the six and twentieth encamped before Boulogne on the North-side. Many Batteries and Assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town, upon Composition, yielded, and the Duke of Suffolk entred and took Possession, suffering six thousand French, as was agreed, with Bag and Baggage to depart. The eighth of September King Henry entred the Town himself, and then leaving the Lord Lisle, Lord Admiral, his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many Enterprizes after this were made by the Dauphin of France, and by Monsieur de Bies, for Recovery of Boulogne; but they were still repulsed, and the English kept the Town in spite of all they could do; although at one Time there came an Army of eighteen thousand Foot, at another Time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelve thousand Launce-Knights, twelve thousand French Foot-men, six thousand Italians, four thousand of Legionary Soldiers of France, a thousand Men of Arms, besides eight thousand Light-Horse: Great Forces certainly, to come and do nothing!

Whilst these Things were doing about Boulogne, the Ships of the West-Country and other Places wafted abroad on the Seas, and took above three hundred French Ships; so that the Gray-friers Church in London was laid full of Herrings. Three hundred French Ships taken, laden with Wine and Wine, Wine, the Austin-friers and Black-friers full of Herrings and other Fish, which should have been conveyed into France.

About this Time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjects, towards his Wars in France and Scotland; to which Purpose the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Suffolk, and other of the King's Council sat at Bernard's Castle, where they first called before them the Mayor and Aldermen; and because Richard Read Alderman would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded to serve the King in his Wars in Scotland, which the obstinate Man rather chose to do, than he would pay the Rate he was required. But being there, he was taken Prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater Damage than if he had agreed to the Benevolence required: For at this Time Sir Ralph Evers, Lord-Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roads into Scotland, assembled four thousand Men, and entering Scotland now again, was encountered by the Earl of Arran, by whom he and the Lord Ogle, and many other Gentlemen, were slain, and divers were taken Prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

It was now the seven and thirtieth Year of King Henry's Reign, when, on St. George's Day, Sir Thomas Wriothesley, Lord Chancellor, was made Knight of the Garter: Also Trinity Term was adjourned by reason of the Wars; but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tenth were open.

At this Time the English Fleet went before New-haven; but being there encountered by a far greater Fleet of French, they returned; with whose Retreat the French Admiral, emboldened, came upon the Coast of Sussex, where he landed Soldiers; but, upon firing of the Beacons, was driven back: After which he landed two thousand Men in the Isle of Wight, but was there repelled, though reported to have in his Ships three score thousand Men.

In August this Year died the valiant Captain the Lord Poynings, the King's Lieutenant of his Town of Boulogne; and the same Month also died at Guilford the Noble Duke of Suffolk, Charles Brandon, Lord Great Master of the King's House, whose Body was honourably buried at Windsor at the King's Cost.

About this Time the Scots, having received Aid out of France, approached the English Borders, but durst attempt nothing: Whereupon the Earl of Hertford, Lieutenant of the North Parts, raising an Army of twelve thousand Men, English and Strangers, entred Scotland, and burnt a great Part of Mers and Tividale, as Kelsey Abby, and the Town, the Abbies of Melrofs, Driburgh and Yedworth, with an hundred Towns and Villages more; when, on the sixteenth of September, an Army of Scots and French attempted to enter into England on the East Borders, but in a Streight were set upon by the English, who slew and took of them to the Number of Seven-score, amongst whom was the Lord Humes's Son, and a principal French Captain. In another Road, which they made into the West Borders, the Lord Maxwell's Son, and divers other were taken: But then, at another Time (such is the Chance of War) five hundred English entring the West Borders of Scotland, were discomfited, and the greatest Part of them either taken or slain.

And now, to revenge the presumptuous Attempts of the French upon the Isle of Wight, the Lord Admiral with his Fleet approached the Coasts of Normandy, landed six thousand Men at Treport, burnt the Suburbs of that Town, with the Abby, destroyed thirty Ships there in the Haven, and then returned, not having lost above fourteen Persons in the whole Voyage.

At this Time the Earl of Hertford, lying at Boulogne, had in his Army above four score thousand Men, and many Skirmishes passed between him and the French; till at last, by Mediation of the Emperor and divers other Princes, a Meeting was appointed to treat of a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Hereupon there came to Guisnes for the King of England, the Earl of Hertford, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Dudley, Viscount Lisle, Baron of Malpas, and High Admiral of England, Sir William Paget the King's Secretary, and Dr. Nicholas Wotton Dean of Canterbury: For the French King there came to Ard, Claude D'Anebaut Admiral of France, the Bishop of Eureux, Monsieur Raymond chief President of Roan, and the Secretary Bouchetel. Divers Times they met betwixt Ard and Guisnes: After a long debating of Matters, and divers Breakings off, at length, the seventh of June, a Peace was concluded, and proclaimed in the City of London, on Whitsunday the thirtieth of June, by Sound of Trumpet; and the same Day in like Manner at Paris and Roan: The chief Articles of which Peace was this, That the French King, paying to the King of England eight hundred thousand Crowns, within the Term of eight Years, should have Boulogne again restored to him, which in the mean Time should remain in Possession of the King of England, as a Pledge for Assurance of the said Money. And now, for a full Establishment of this Peace, the Viscount Lisle Lord Admiral, with the Bishop of Duresme, and divers other Lords, were sent into France, to take Oath of the French King, and of the Dauphin; as likewise at the same Time divers Lords came from the French King, to take Oath of King Henry, who by the Way were met by the young Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton-Court.

In his seven and thirtieth Year, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the King a Subsidy both of Spirituality and Temporality, and all Colleges, Chantries and Hospitals were given to him to dispose of. The four and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued; on which Day the King coming to the Parliament-House, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellor was used to answer, but at this Time the King would answer himself: The Effect whereof was, That where Master Speaker had commended him for many excellent Qualities that were in him, he thanked him for it; not that he had them, but for putting him in Mind how necessary it was he should have them: Then he

F f f f thanked

A.D. 1546 thanked the whole House for their Subsidy, and for giving him the Colleges and Chantries, which he promised should be bestowed to the Glory of God, and the Good of the Realm. Lastly, He acknowledged their Love to himself, but found Fault with want of Love to one another; for what Love, where there is not Concord? And what Concord, when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptist; and he again calleth him Papist and Hypocrite? and this not only amongst those of the Temporality, but even the Clergy-men themselves preach one against another, inveigh one against another, without Charity or Discretion; some to be stiff in their old Mumpsimus, and others so curious in their new Sumpsimus, that few or none preacheth truly and sincerely the Word of God. Now therefore let this be amended; fear and serve God, be in Charity among your selves, to the which I, as your Supreme Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you. And this said, the Acts were openly read: To some he gave his Royal Assent, and to divers assented not.

Whilst the Oath for the Peace was thus taken by both Kings, Boulogne remaining still in King Henry's Possession, Monsieur de Chatillon, Captain of Mont-plaisir, began to make a new Bastilion at the very Mouth of the Haven of Boulogne, naming it Chatillon's Garden: Hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton, as then Deputy of Boulogne, advertised the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his Pleasure, whether he should rase it, as a Thing very inconvenient to the Town, or let it stand. The King asked Advice of his Council, who all agree, that the Conditions of the Peace ought in no wise to be infringed, and therefore to let the Bastilion stand: Whereupon the King caused his Secretary, the Lord Paget, to write a Letter to the Lord Gray to that Purpose; but then called Sir Thomas Palmour secretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatsoever he had written in his Letter, yet with all Speed possible he should rase the Fortification to the Ground. Sir Thomas Palmour replying, That a Message by Word of Mouth being contrary to his Letter, would never be believed: Well, said the King, do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his Choice. Upon the coming back of Sir Thomas Palmour, the Lord Gray called a Council, shewing them the King's Letter, and withal Sir Thomas Palmour's Message, and then asked their Advice, what in this Case he should do; who all agreed, without any Question, that the Letter was to be followed, and not the Message: To which the Lord Gray himself said nothing, but caused the Message to be written verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmour's Mouth, and those of the Council to set their Hands to it: This done, the Night following he issued forth with a Company of armed Men and Pioneers, and overthrew the Fortifications to the Ground, and then sent Sir Thomas Palmour with Letters to the King, who, as soon as he saw him, asked aloud, What, will he do it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his Letter, said, Your Majesty shall know by these; but then the King, half angry, Nay, tell me, said he, Will he do it or no? Being then told it was done, and the Fortifications clean rased, he turned to his Lords and said, What say you, my Lords, to this? Chatillon's Garden is rased to the Floor. Whereto one presently answered, He that had done it was worthy to lose his Head: To which the King straightly reply'd, That he would rather lose a Dozen such Heads as his was that so judged, than one such Servant as had done it; and therewith commanded the Lord Gray's Pardon should presently be drawn; the which he sent with Letters of great Thanks, and Promise of Reward. The Cause why the King took this Course was this, lest if he had written the rasing of the Fortification in this Letter, it might have come to the French-men's Knowledge before it could have been done, and so have been prevented. And this may be taken as a Scantling of King Henry's great Capacity.

It is now the eight and thirtieth Year of his Reign, when, about Michaelmas, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Earl of Surrey, his Son and Heir, upon certain Surmises of Treason, were committed to the Tower of London: And the thirteenth of January, the King then lying at the Point of Death, the said Earl was arraigned in the Guild-hall before the Lord Mayor, the Lord Chancellor, and other Lords there in Commission. The special Matter wherewith he was charged, was the bearing of certain Arms that were said to belong to the King and to the Prince; though the Earl justified the bearing of them, as belonging to divers of his Ancestors; affirming withal, that he had the Opinion of Heralds therein. But for this notwithstanding, being no Lord of the Parliament, he was tried by a common Jury, by them was found guilty, and thereupon had Judgment of Death; and the nineteenth of January was beheaded on the Tower-Hill. The Duke was attainted by Parliament, and kept in Prison, till in the first Year of Queen Mary the Attainder was reversed. The Death of this Earl might lay an Imputation of Cruelty upon King Henry, if a just Jealousy, growing from the many Circumstances of the Earl's Greatness, in the tender Age of his own Son, did not excuse him.

Soon after the Death of this Earl the King himself died; having made his last Will, in which he took Order, that his Son Edward should succeed him in the Crown, and he dying without Issue, his Daughter Mary; and she dying without Issue, his Daughter Elizabeth; although another Order of Succession had passed before by Act of Parliament. The Executors of his last Will were these sixteen; Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, Sir William Pawlet Lord Saint John and great Master of the Household, Sir Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, and High Chamberlain of England, Sir John Russel Lord Privy-Seal, Sir John Dudley Viscount Lisle Lord Admiral, Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, Sir Edmund Montacute Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, Sir Thomas Bromley one of the Justices of the King's-Bench, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Augmentation, Sir William Paget Knight of the Order, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir William Herbert, Sir Edward Wotton Treasurer of Calais, and Nicholas Wotton

A.D. 1547 Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York: To whom were adjoined as Assistants these twelve; Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, William Parr Earl of Essex, Sir Thomas Cheney Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Comptroller, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vice-Chamberlain, Sir William Petre Principal Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of Sissingherst in Kent, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwell, and Sir Edward Peckham. And it was not without Need to leave a full Council-Table, considering in what Terms he left the Kingdom when he died. Abroad in League with the Emperor, at Peace with the King of France; but whether these were not Personal only, and no longer binding than King Henry lived, might be doubted: With the Scots at deadly Feud; with the Pope at utter Defiance; from both which Coasts there could be expected but little fair Weather. At home the Frame of Religion extremely disjointed, and the Clergy that should set it in Frame, out of Frame themselves; the Minds of the People extremely distracted; and the Nobility that should cement them, scarce holding themselves together. And in this State was the Kingdom when King Henry the eighth died, in the Year 1547, the fifty sixth of his Life, and of his Reign the eight and thirtieth.

Of his Taxations.

IN his fourth Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, was granted to the King two Fifteenths of the Temporality, and two Tenths of the Clergy, and Head-Money; of every Duke ten Marks, an Earl five Pounds, a Baron four Pounds, a Knight four Marks, and every Man valued at eight hundred Pounds in Goods, to pay four Marks, and so after that Rate till him that was valued at forty Shillings, and he paid twelve Pence, and every Man and Woman of fifteen Years and upward four Pence. In his sixth Year a Parliament was holden, wherein divers Subsidies were granted to the King, towards the Charges of his Wars in France. In his fourteenth Year Order was taken by the Cardinal, that the true Value of all Mens Substance might be known, and he would have had every Man sworn to tell what he was worth, and required a tenth Part thereof towards the King's Charges in the present Wars, as the Spirituality had granted a fourth Part. This the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused from taking Oath, and were allowed to bring in their Bills upon their Honesties: But when all was done, after much labouring by the Cardinal, the Clergy granted one Half of all their Yearly Spiritual Revenues, for five Years, and the Temporality two Shillings in the Pound, from twenty Pounds upwards; and from forty Shillings to twenty Pounds, of every twenty Shillings twelve Pence; and under forty Shillings, of every Head of sixteen Years and upwards, four Pence to be paid in every two Years. In his sixteenth Year, the Cardinal of his own Head attempted by Commission, to draw the People to pay the sixth Part of every Man's Substance in Plate or Money; but this was generally opposed, and the People in many Countries rose upon it, so as coming to the King's Knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the Cardinal exceedingly for attempting it. In his four and twentieth Year, in a Parliament then holden, a Fifteenth was granted to the King, towards his Charges of making Fortifications against Scotland. In his one and thirtieth Year, a Subsidy of two Shillings in the Pound of Lands, and twelve of Goods, with four Fifteens, were granted to the King, towards his Charges of making Bulwarks. In his five and thirtieth Year, a Subsidy was granted to be paid in three Years, every Englishman being worth in Goods twenty Shillings and upwards to five Pounds, to pay four Pence of every Pound; and from five Pounds to ten Pounds, eight Pence; and from ten Pounds to twenty Pounds, twelve Pence; from twenty Pounds and upwards, of every Pound two Shillings: Strangers, as well Denizens as others, being Inhabitants, to pay double. And for Lands, every Englishman paid eight Pence of the Pound, from twenty Shillings to five Pounds, and from five Pounds to ten Pounds sixteen Pence, and from ten Pounds to twenty Pounds two Shillings, and from twenty Pounds and upwards, of every Pound three Shillings; Strangers double. The Clergy six Shillings in the Pound of Benefices, and every Priest having no Benefice, but an Annual Stipend, six Shillings eight Pence Yearly, during three Years.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his Time.

IN a Parliament holden his sixth Year, divers Laws were made, but two most spoken of; one for Apparel, another for Labourers. In his twelfth Year, he caused the Statutes against Inclosures to be revived, and commanded that decayed Houses should be built up again, and that inclosed Grounds should be laid open; which, though it did some Good, yet not so much as it might have done, if the Cardinal for his own Benefit had not procured Liberty for great Men to keep up their Inclosures, to the Oppression of poor Men. In his seventeenth Year, the King lying at Eltham, divers Ordinances were made by the Cardinal touching the Governance of the King's House, and were long after called the Statutes of Eltham. In his eighteenth Year, in the Month of May, Proclamation was made against all unlawful Games; so that in all Places, Tables, Dice, Cards, and Bowls were taken and burnt; but this Order continued not long; for young Men being restrained from these Games, fell some to drinking, some to stealing of Cornies and Deer, and such other Misdemeanors. Also in this Year was an Enhancing of Coin, for the preventing the carrying it over to Places where it went at a higher Rate; so that the Angel that went before but for seven Shillings, should now go for seven and Six-pence, and every Ounce of Gold should be five and forty Shillings, which was before but forty, and other Coins accordingly. In his twentieth Year, Sir James Spencer being Mayor of London, the Watch used on Midsummer Night was laid down. In his three and thirtieth Year, in a Parliament then holden, an Act was made, that whosoever should poison any Person should be boiled

A.D. 1547 boiled to Death: By which Statute one Richard Rouse, who had poisoned divers Persons in the Bishop of Rocheſter's Palace, was boiled to Death in Smithfield, to the terrible Example of all other. In his two and twentieth Year three Acts were made, one for Probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, the third against Plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by Spiritual Persons. In his thirtieth Year, it was ordained by Cromwell, the King's Vicar-General, that in all Churches a Register should be kept of every Wedding, Christening and Burial within the same Parish for ever. In his one and thirtieth Year, the King first instituted and appointed fifty Gentlemen, called Pensioners, to wait upon his Person, assigning to each of them fifty Pounds a Year for the Maintenance of themselves and two Horses. In his six and thirtieth Year, Proclamation was made for the enhancing of Gold to eight and forty Shillings, and Silver to four Shillings the Ounce; also he caused to be coined base Money, mingling it with Brass, which was since that Time called down the fifth Year of Edward VI. and called in the second Year of Queen Elizabeth. In his seven and thirtieth Year, the Brothel-houses, called the Stews, on the Bank-side in Southwark, were put down by the King's Commandment, and it was done by Proclamation and Sound of Trumpet. In his three and twentieth Year, it was enacted, that Butchers should sell their Meat by Weight, Beef for a Half-penny the Pound, and Mutton for three Farthings: Also at this Time foreign Butchers were permitted to sell their Flesh in Leaden-Hall Market, which before was not allowed. In his Time also the Government of the President in the North was first instituted, and the first President there was Tunstal, Bishop of Durham.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the Year 1517, the eighth Year of this King's Reign, Martin Luther, of Wirttemberg in Germany, a Frier of the Order of the Hermits, taking Occasion from the Abuse of Indulgences, began to preach against the Authority of the Pope, and to bring in a Reformation of Religion. For repressing of whom, the Council of Trent was called by Pope Paul III. in the Year 1542, which continued above forty Years, but was never received in the Kingdom of France: Which Council, by decreeing many Things to be Points of Faith, which were not so accounted before, hath made no small Distraction amongst Papists themselves. Against this Luther, King Henry wrote a Book with great Bitterness, and with as great Bitterness was answered. At the same Time with Luther there arose also in the same Country other Reformers of Religion, as Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Melanchthon; who differing from Luther in some few Points, made the Difference which is at this Day of Lutherans and Protestants, so called at first at Augsburg, for making a Protestation in Defence of their Doctrine, which soon after spread all Christendom over. King Henry in the six and twentieth Year of his Reign, had excluded the Pope's Authority out of his Realm; but thinking the Work not sufficiently done, as long as Abbies and Priories kept their Station, which were, as it were, his Fortresses and Pillars, there was not long after Means found to have them suppressed: For Aspersions being laid upon them (and perhaps no more than Truth) of Adulteries and Murthers; they by Act of Parliament, in his eight and twentieth Year, at least near four hundred of them were suppressed, and all their Lands and Goods conferred upon the King. In his one and thirtieth Year, all the rest; and, lastly, in his five and thirtieth Year, all Colleges, Chantryes, and Hospitals. So as the Hives being now all removed, there have never since any Bees or Drones been seen in the Country. In this King's Time the City of Rome was taken and sacked by the Imperial Army, forcing the Pope to fly to his Castle St. Angelo, there kept a Prisoner, till he agreed to such Conditions as his Adversaries propounded. In the two and twentieth Year of this King's Reign, a Proclamation was set forth, that no Person should purchase any thing from the Court of Rome; and this was the first Blow given to the Pope in England. In his three and twentieth Year, the Clergy submitting themselves to the King, for being found guilty of a Præmunire, were the first that called him Supreme Head of the Church. In his four and twentieth Year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made that Bishops should pay no more Annates or Money for their Bulls to the Pope; and another, that no Person should appeal for any Cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all Causes of the King to be tried in the Upper House of the Convocation. In his six and twentieth Year, in July, John Frith was burnt in Smithfield, and with him, at the same Stake, one Andrew Howet, a Taylor, both for denying the real Presence in the Sacrament. And in a Parliament holden this Year, an Act was made which authorized the King's Highness to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Authority of the Pope to be abolished; and then also was given to the King the First-fruits and Tenths of all Spiritual Livings. And this Year were many put to Death, Papists for denying the King's Supremacy, Protestants for denying the real Presence in the Sacrament; and it is incredible what Number for these two Causes were put to Death in the last ten Years of the King's Reign, of whom, if we should make particular Mention, it would reach a great way in the Book of Martyrs. In his eight and twentieth Year, the Lord Cromwell was made Vicar-General under the King over the Spirituality, and sat divers times in the Convocation-House, amongst the Bishops, as Head over them; and in September, this Year, he set forth Injunctions, commanding all Parsons and Curates to teach their Parishoners the Pater-noster, the Ave, and Creed, with the Ten Commandments and the Articles of the Christian Faith, in the English Tongue. In his one and thirtieth Year, was set forth by the Bishops the Book of the Six Articles, condemning all for Hereticks, and to be burnt, that should hold,

1. That

A Register of all Weddings, Christenings, and Burials, when first kept. The Gentlemen Pensioners, when first ordained.

The Stews put down.

Butchers appointed to sell their Meat by Weight.

The King, when first called Supreme Head of the Church. No more Annates to be paid to Rome; nor Appeals to be made to the Pope.

The six Articles set forth by the Bishops

1. That the Body of Christ was not really present in the Sacrament, after Consecration.

2. That the Sacrament might not be truly administered under one kind.

3. That Priests enter'd into Holy Orders might marry.

4. That Vows of Chastity enter'd into upon mature Deliberation, were not to be kept.

5. That private Masses were not to be used.

6. That Auricular Confession was not necessary in the Church.

The Order of St. John's dissolved.

This Year also the Religion of St. John's in England, commonly call'd The Order of Knights of the Rhodes, was dissolv'd; and on Ascension-day Sir William Weston Knight, Prior of St. John's, departed this life, for thought (as was reported) after he heard of the Dissolution of his Order; for the King took all the Lands that belong'd to that Order into his own hands. In his six and thirtieth Year the Letany or Procession was set forth in English, with commandment by the King to be generally used in Parish-Churches.

Works of Piety done by him, or Others, in his Time.

UPON the Suppression of Abbeyes, King Henry instituted six new Bishopricks, and six Cathedral Churches, endowing them with convenient Maintenance. He also gave competent Pensions, during their lives, to such Religious Persons as were turn'd out of their Cloysters. He also instituted in both the Universities Professors of the Hebrew and Greek Tongues, of Divinity, Civil-Law, and Physick, allowing to each of them Forty Pounds a Year. He also founded a College at Cambridge. He gave at his Death a Thousand Marks to the Poor; and to twelve poor Knights of Windsor each of them twelve Pence a Day for ever, and every Year a long Gown of white Cloth. But his greatest Work of Piety was, his putting down the Stews in Southwark.

Margaret Countess of Richmond, the King's Grandmother, founded two Colleges at Cambridge, Christ's College and St John's. In the fifth Year of this King's Reign, George Monox Mayor of London re-edified the decay'd Steeple of the Church of Walthamstow in Essex, adding thereunto a fine Isle, with a Chapel, where he lieth buried. On the North side of the Church-yard there he founded a fair Almshouse for a Priest and Thirteen poor Men and Women, giving them a Weekly Maintenance. He also, for the commodity of Travellers, made a Cawsey of Timber over the Marshes, from Walthamstow to Lock-bridge towards London.

Corpus Christi College in Oxford, when and by whom founded.

In this King's Eighth Year, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi College in Oxford, minding to have made it an House for Monks; but Hugh Oldham Bishop of Exeter persuaded him to make it rather a College for Scholars; and joyning with him in it, contributed great sums of Money towards it, contenting himself with only the Name of a Benefactor. In his seventh Year King Henry built the Tower of Greenwich. In this King's time Cardinal Wolsey founded two Colleges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich. To his College at Oxford he had given Four thousand pounds Lands a year, but his Lands being all confiscated to the King, the King took the Lands, but yet gave to the College a competent Maintenance for a Dean, eight Prebends, and a hundred Fellows; which College is now call'd Christ-Church, and accounts King Henry for their Founder. His College at Ipswich was demolish'd. This Cardinal also built Hampton-Court, the chiefest at this day of all the King's Houses, and built or enlarg'd White-hall, call'd then York-Place. King Henry, in his Four and twentieth Year, built also his Mansion-house of St. James, where also he made a fair Park. This Place before had been an Hospital of Sisters, with whom the King compounded, giving them Pensions during their lives. In his Thirtieth Year Nicholas Gibson, Grocer, then Sheriff of London, built a Free School at Ratcliff, near London, with Maintenance for a Master and an Usher: He also built an Almshouse there for Fourteen poor and aged People. In his One and thirtieth Year Thomas Huntlow, the then Sheriff of London, gave certain Tenements to the Haberdashers, for finding of Ten Alms-men of the same Company. In his Six and thirtieth Year, Sir John Allen, who had been twice Mayor of London, and of the King's Council, gave at his Death to the City of London a rich Collar of Gold, to be worn by the Mayor; which Collar was first worn by Sir William Laxton, on St. Edward's Day, at the election of the new Mayor, who gave to every Ward in London Twenty pounds, to be distributed among poor Housholders; besides the Sixscore Persons, whereof Threescore Men, to every one a Gown of Broadcloth, and a black Cape; and Threescore Women, to every one a Gown of the like Cloth, and a white Handkerchief. In the Eight and thirtieth Year, King Henry gave to the City of London, for the relief of poor People in St. Bartholomew's Spittle, the Church of the Grey-friers, and two Parish-Churches, the one at St. Nicholas in the Shambles, the other St Ewin's in Newgate Market, all to be made one Parish Church of the Grey-friers; and in Lands he gave, for the Maintenance of the same, Five hundred Marks a Year for ever; and this Church to be named Christ-Church, founded by King Henry the Eighth. The Lady Elizabeth Hollys, (Widow of Sir William Hollys Knight, late Lord-Mayor of the City of London) by her last Will and Testament, dated the 17th of February 1543, and in the 35th Year of the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, and prov'd at London in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury the 28th of March 1544; did will her Executors, her Cousin Mr. Andrew Jud, Alderman, (afterwards Knight and Lord-Mayor of London) and her Brother Thomas Stopham, that they should provide a Place or Plot of Ground whereon should be erected 6 Almshouses for 6 aged folks, Men or Women, or else both, to inhabit and dwell in; for the Maintenance of which she will'd, that her said Executors should purchase as much Land or Tenements within the City of London, or Liberties of the same, as would amount, de claro above all Charges, to the yearly value of Ten Pounds Sterling, to be distributed in this manner; that is to say, to every of the said six

Which said Lady Elizabeth Hollys and Sir William Hollys were great Grandfather and great Grandmother unto John Hollys Knight, Earl of Clare, &c. decess'd.

A Sweating-sickness, of which many Great Men died.

IN his Ninth Year happen'd a Sweating-sickness, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England died, especially in London, which was so violent, that in three, and sometimes in two hours, it took away Mens lives, and spar'd neither Rich nor Poor; for in the King's Court the Lord Clinton, the Lord Gray of Wilton, and many Knights, Gentlemen, and Officers died of it. It began in July, and continued to the midst of December. In his Thirteenth Year was a great Mortality in London, and other places of the Realm, and many Men of Honour and Worship died; amongst others, Dr. Fitz-James Bishop of London, in whose place Dr. Tunstal succeeded. In his Fifteenth Year, after great Rains and Winds, there follow'd so fore a Frost, that many died for Cold; and some lost Fingers, some Toes, and many their Nails. In his Nineteenth Year, by extremity of Rain in Seed-time, there follow'd a great dearth of Corn, which would have caus'd great Calamity, but that it was reliev'd in London by Merchants of the Steel-yard out of Germany, and a thousand Quarters supply'd out of the King's own Provision. In his Twentieth Year, in the end of May, began in London another Sweating-sickness, which afterwards infected all places of the Realm, by reason whereof the Term was adjourn'd, and the Circuit of the Assizes also. Many died in the Court, as Sir Francis Poynes, Sir William Compton, Knights, and William Carew Esquire, of the King's Privy-Chamber. The King himself for a space remov'd almost every day, till he came to Tittinghanger, a Place of the Abbot of St. Alban's, where he, with the Queen and a small number, remain'd till the Sickness was past. In his Thirtieth Year the manner of casting Pipes of Lead, for conveyance of Water under-ground, without using of Soder, was first invented by Robert Brocke, Clerk, one of the King's Chaplains: A profitable Invention, for by this two Men and one Boy will do more in one Day than could have been done before by many Men in many Days. Robert Cooper, Goldsmith, was the first that made the Instruments, and put this Invention in practice. In a Rebellion in the North, in this King's time, when the Duke of Norfolk was sent with an Army against the Rebels, and that a Day of Battel between them was appointed, it happen'd that the Night before a small Brook call'd Dun running between the two Armies, upon the fall of a small Rain swell'd to such a height, that it was not passable by either Foot or Horse; a thing which had never happen'd before upon a great Rain, and was then counted (as indeed it was) no less than a Miracle. In his Three and thirtieth Year was a great Mortality in the Realm, by reason of hot Agues and Fluxes, and withal so great a Drought that small Rivers were clean dry'd; much Cattle died for lack of Water, and the Thames was grown so shallow, that the Salt Water flow'd above London-bridge, till the Rain had encreas'd the Fresh Waters. In his Five and thirtieth Year the first cast Pieces of Iron that ever were made in England were made at Buckstead in Sussex, by Ralph Hage and Peter Bawde. In his Six and thirtieth Year was a great Plague in London, so as Michaelmas Term was adjourn'd to St. Albans, and there kept. In his Seven and thirtieth Year, on Tuesday in Easter Week, William Foxley, Pot-maker for the Mint of the Tower in London, fell asleep, and could not be waked with pinching or burning, till the first Day of the next Term, which was full Fourteen Days; and when he waked, was found in all points as if he had slept but One Night, and liv'd Forty Years after. About his Fifteenth Year it happen'd that diverse Things were newly brought into England, whereupon this Rhime was made:

KING Henry had six Wives: His first was Katharine, Daughter of Ferdinand King of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Arthur. She liv'd his Wife above twenty Years, and then was divorc'd from him; after which she liv'd three Years by the Name of Katharine Dowager: She decess'd at Kimbolton in the County of Huntington, the 8th of January, in the Year 1535, and lieth interr'd in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, under a Hearse of black Say, having a white Cross in the midst. His second Wife was Ann, second Daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond. She was married to him the Five and twentieth Day of January, in the Year 1533, liv'd his Wife three Years, three Months, and five and twenty Days, and then was beheaded, and her Body buried in the Choir of the Chapel in the Tower. His third Wife was Jane, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, and Sister to the Lord Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, and Duke of Somerfet: She was married to him the next Day after the beheading of Queen Ann, liv'd his Wife one Year, five Months, and four and twenty Days, and then died in Childbed, and was buried in the midst of the Choir of the Church within the Castle of Windsor. His fourth Wife was Ann, Sister to the Duke of Cleve: She liv'd his Wife six Months, and then was divorc'd: She remained in England long after the King's Death, and accompanied the Lady Elizabeth thro' London, at the solemnizing of Queen Mary's Coronation. His fifth Wife was Katharine, Daughter of Edmund, and Neice of Thomas Howard his Brother, Duke of Norfolk: She was married to him in the Two and thirtieth Year of his Reign, liv'd his Wife one Year, six Months, and four Days, and then was beheaded in the Tower of London, and buried in the Chancel of the Chapel by by Queen Ann Bullen. His sixth Wife was Katharine Daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kindal, and Sister to the Lord William Parre Marquis of Northampton: She was first married to John Nevil Lord Latimer, and after his decease to the King, at Hampton-Court, in the 35th Year of his Reign: She was his Wife three Years, six Months, and five Days; and then surviving him, was again married to Thomas Seymour Lord Admiral of England, unto whom she bore a Daughter, but died in her Child-bed, in the Year 1548. He had Children by his first Wife Queen Katharine, Henry born at Richmond, who liv'd not full two Months, and was buried at Westminster; also another Son, whose Name is not mention'd, liv'd but a short time neither; then a Daughter, named Mary, born at Greenwich in the eighth Year of his reign, who came afterward to be Queen of England. By his second Wife, Queen Ann Bullen, he had a Daughter named Elizabeth, born at Greenwich, in the Five and twentieth Year of his Reign, who succeeded her Sister Mary in the Crown: He had also by her a Son, but born dead. By his third Wife, Queen Jane, he had a Son named Edward, born at Hampton-Court in the Nine and twentieth Year of his Reign, who succeeded him in the Kingdom. Besides these, he had a base Son, named Henry Fitz-Roy, begotten of the Lady Talboys, call'd Elizabeth Blount, born at Blackmore in Essex, in the Tenth Year of his Reign, who was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset, married Mary Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, with whom he liv'd not long, but died at St. James by Westminster, and was buried at Framlingham in Suffolk.

HE was exceeding tall of Stature, and very strong, fair of Complexion, in his latter Days corpulent and burly. Concerning his Conditions; he was a Prince of so many good Parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill; and indeed he had not many ill, till Flattery and ill Counsel in his latter time got the upper-hand of him. His Cruelty to his Wives may not only be excus'd, but defended; for, if they were incontinent, he did but Justice; if they were not so, yet it was sufficient to satisfie his Conscience, that he thought he had Cause to think them so: And if the Marriage-bed be honourable in all, in Princes 'tis sacred. In suppressing of Abbeyes he shew'd not a little Piety, but great Prudence; for tho' they were excellent things being rightly used, yet most pestilent being abused; and then may the Use be justly suppress'd, when the Abuse scarce possibly can be restrain'd. To think he suppress'd Abbeyes out of Covetousness, and desire of Gain, is to make him extremely deceiv'd in his reckoning; for, if we compare the Profit with the Charge that follow'd, we shall find him certainly a great loser by the Bargain. He was so far from Pride, that he was rather too humble; at least he convers'd with his Subjects in a more familiar manner than was usual with Princes: So valiant, that his whole Life almost was nothing but Exercises of Valour; and tho' perform'd amongst his Friends in jest, yet they prepar'd him against his Enemies in earnest; and they that durst be his Enemies found it. It may be said, the Complexion of his Government for the first Twenty Years was sanguine and jovial; for the rest, cholerick and bloody; and it may be doubted, whether in the former he were more prodigal of his own Treasure, or in the latter of his Subjects Blood; for as he spent more in Fictions than any other King did in Realities, so in any Distemper of his People he had no other Physick but to open a Vein. But we shall do him extream Wrong to think that all the Blood shed in his time was of his shedding; they were the Bishops that were the Draco, to make the bloody Laws; the Bishops that were the Phalaris, to put them in execution, the King oftentimes scarce knowing what was done. Certain 'tis, when a great Lord put a Gentlewoman the second time on the Rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemn'd him for such extream Cruelty. As for Religion, tho' he brought it not to a full Reformation, yet he gave it so great a beginning, that we may truly say of that he did, Dimidium plus toto. They who charge him with the Vice of Lust, let them shew such another Example of Continence as was seen in him, to lie Six Months by a young Lady, and not to touch her; for so did he with the Lady Ann of Cleve. But this is to make Nosegays: I like better to leave every Flower growing upon its Stalk, that it be gather'd fresh; which will be done by reading the Story of his Life.

THIS recorded of him, That in his latter time he grew so fat and slothful that Engines were made to lift and remove him up and down: But howsoever, in the 65th Year of his age, whether by a Dropsie, or by reason of an Ulcer in his Leg, he fell into a languishing Fever, which brought him into such extremity, that his Physicians utterly despair'd of his Life; whereof none durst speak a Word to him, till Mr. Denny, one of his Privy-Chamber, took the boldness to go to him, telling him of the Danger he was in, and withal putting him in mind to think of his Soul's health: To which he answer'd, That he confess'd his Sins to be exceeding great, yet had such confidence in the Mercy of GOD thro' Christ, that he doubted not of Forgiveness, tho' they had been much greater. And being then ask'd by Mr. Denny, if he would have any Divine brought to him, with whom he might confer; he answer'd, He would willingly have Archbishop Crammer, but not yet a while, till he had taken a little Rest. Whereupon the Archbishop, being then at Croydon, was presently sent for, but before he could come the King was become speechless, only seeming to retain a little Memory, so as putting out his Hand; and the Archbishop desiring him to shew some Sign of his Faith in Christ, he then wrung the Archbishop hard by the Hand, and immediately gave up the ghost, the 28th Day of January, in the Year 1547, the Sixty-fifth Year of his Age, and of his Reign the Thirty-eighth. His Body with great Solemnity was buried at Windsor, under a most costly and stately Tomb, begun in Copper, and gilt, but never finish'd.

Men of Note in his Time.

MEN famous for the Sword were many in his Time, and in a manner all, that it is hard making choice without being partial, unless we shall prefer Dukes of equal Valour before others of meaner calling; and then will the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk hold worthily the first place; and, next to them, the young Earl of Surrey, who had been more fortunate if he had been less valiant.

THE REIGN OF King EDWARD VI.

An. Dom.

1547.

The Earl of Hartford chosen Protector.Advancement of divers in Honour.King Edward
is crown'd.

IT was now in the Year 1547, when on the 28th of January King Henry dying, Prince Edward, his Son by his third Wife the Lady Jane Seymour, and the only Son he left behind him, as well by Right of Inheritance as by his last Will, succeeded him in the Kingdom; to whom, as being but Nine Years old, and therefore unripe for Government, he had assign'd Twenty-eight Counsellors; a fit number, if agreeing amongst themselves; too many, if at variance; and at variance they would soon fall, if there were not a Moderator to keep them in concord. The first Work therefore necessary to be done in this new World, was to make choice of such a Man as might be to the Counsellors a Moderator, a Protector to the King, and in his minority to the Kingdom. To this Place, by common Consent of the King and Council, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford, the King's Uncle, was chosen, to hold the Place until the King should accomplish the age of Eighteen Years; in which Office the first thing he did, was to make the young King a Knight; who presently thereupon made Henry Hobblethorn, Mayor of London, Knight: And then, King Henry's Obsequies being solemnly perform'd, on the 17th of February were raised in Honour, the Earl of Hartford Protector, to be Duke of Somerset; William Parr Earl of Essex, to be Marquis of Northampton; Dudley Viscount Lisle, to be Earl of Warwick; Wriothesley Lord-Chancellor, to be Earl of Southampton: Sir Thomas Seymour, the Protector's Brother, was made Lord Sudeley, and Admiral of England; Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich; Sir William Willoughby was made Lord Willoughby; and Sir Edmund Sheffield was made Lord Sheffield of Butterwick. On the 19th of February the King in great state rode from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster, where the Day following he was crown'd by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites accustomed, in great solemnity; at which time a General Pardon was proclaim'd for all Offenders, six only excepted, namely, the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pool, Edward Courtney eldest Son to the Marquis of Exeter, Mr. Fortescue, Mr. Throgmorton, and Dr. Pate Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid taking the Oath of Supremacy; all which six continued unpardon'd till the first Year of Q. Mary, and then were restor'd. A few Days after, the Earl of Southampton, Lord-Chancellor, for being contumacious to the rest of the Lords in matters of Counsel, was remov'd both from his Office of being Chancellor, and from his Place in Council; and the Great Seal was deliver'd to Sir William Pawlet, Lord St. John, and Lord Great Master of the King's Household.

Within two months after the Death of King Henry died Francis King of France also, for whom solemn Obsequies were kept in Paul's Church, as he likewise had kept before at Paris for King Henry. These two Kings were of so consenting natures, that they had certainly been great Friends while they liv'd if they had not been Kings, and that Jealousie of State had not made them oftentimes not to be themselves.

King Henry, before his Death, had left in charge with the Lords of his Council, by all means possible to procure a proceeding in the Marriage with the young Queen of Scots; and now, in discharge thereof, the Lord Protector himself, with an Army of 12000 Foot, and 6000 Horse, beside Labourers and Pioneers Thirteen hundred, enter'd Scotland the 3d of September; at which time also Edward Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of Threescore sail, assisted by Sea: But before he would do any hostile Act, he caused Proclamation to be made, That his coming was only to have Performance of the Articles heretofore agreed on for the Marriage, tending to the Good of both Kingdoms, which if they would yield unto, he would then return in peaceable manner. And the more to draw them on, where before 'twas demanded to have the Queen brought into England, and there to be brought up, the Protector was content she should remain in Scotland till Years of Consent. This Demand the more moderate sort of Scots accounted very reasonable, but those of the French and Papal Faction, who were the greatest Persons and the greatest number, strongly opposed: Whereupon the Lord Protector presently put his Army into array. The Lord Gray and Sir Francis Bryan, with Eight hundred Light-Horse, were sent before to provide Lodging for the Army, and to give advertisement of the Enemy's Approaches; then follow'd the Avant-guard, in number between Three and Four thousand Foot, One hundred Men at Arms, and Six hundred Light-Horse, led by the Earl of Warwick; then follow'd the main Battel, consisting of above six thousand Foot, six hundred Men at Arms, and One thousand Light-Horse,

Horfe, led by the Protector himself; laſtly follow'd the Rear, wherein were between Three and Four thouſand Foot, One hundred Men at Arms, and Six hundred Light-Horſe, under the conduct of the Lord Dacres. Upon one Wing the Artillery was drawn, being ſixteen Pieces of great Ordnance; the other Wing was made by Men at Arms and Demilances; for the Avant-guard and half the Battel riding about two flight-shot from their ſide, the other half of the Battel, and the whole flank of the Rear, was cloſed by the Carriages, being Nine hundred Carts beſides Waggon; the reſt of the Men at Arms and the Demilances march'd behind. In this order they march'd two Days, taking in three Caſtles as they went with little reſiſtance. Where 'tis memorable what a ſudden Device the Defendants of one of 'em uſed to ſave themſelves by; for, finding they were no longer able to defend themſelves, and that their Obſtinacy had excluded all hope of Pardon, they made ſuit, that they might not preſently be ſlain, but have ſome time to commend their Souls to GOD, and afterwards be hang'd: Which Reſpite being obtain'd, their Pardon afterwards did more eaſily enſue; ſo much doth the gaining of Time oftentimes prevail, more than any other Policy. The Governor of Scotland hearing of the Protector's approach, and having no ſufficient Army ready to reſiſt him, ſent his Heralds abroad into all parts of the Realm, and commanded the Fire-croſs to be carried (an ancient Cuſtom in Caſes of importance) which was two Firebrands ſet in faſhion of a Croſs, and pitch'd upon the point of a Spear, and therewith Proclamation to be made, That all above ſixteen years of age, and under ſixty, ſhould reſort forthwith to Muſſelborough, and bring convenient proviſion of Victuals with 'em. By this means having gotten a ſufficient Army, he ſet forward towards the Engliſh, who were now come to the River call'd Linne: And here the Earl of Warwick, being too venturous, was like to have been entrapp'd, but by his Valour came off bravely. And now the Scottiſh Horſemen began to hover about the Engliſh Army, and to come pricking towards them, ſometimes within length of their Staves, uſing provoking Words to draw the Engliſh from their ſtrength; but the Protector, not mov'd with their provocations, maintain'd a cloſe March till he came to Salt-Preſton by the Frith, where he encamp'd within two Miles of the Scottiſh Army: And here the Scots, having gotten the advantage of a Hill, came upon the Engliſh with the number of Twelve hundred Horſe, beſides Five hundred Foot that lay in ambuſh behind the Hill; at which time the Lord Gray and Francis Bryan, impatient of ſuch Braveries, obtain'd Leave of the General to encounter them; and ſo, as they came ſcatter'd upon the Spur, within a Stone's caſt of the Engliſh, and were beginning to wheel about, the Lord Gray with ſome Troops of Light-Horſemen charg'd them home, and was forthwith ſeconded by certain numbers of Demilances, and both of them back'd with a thouſand Men at Arms; yet the Scots reſolutely maintain'd the Fight three hours and more; but in the end, overlaid with a number, they were put to flight, and chaſed almost to the edge of their Camp. In this Fight the chiefſt force of the Scottiſh Horſemen was defeated; the Lord Hume, by a Fall from his Horſe loſt his Life; his Son and Heir, with two Priests, and ſix Gentlemen, were taken Priſoners, and about Fifteen hundred ſlain. The next Day the Protector and the Earl of Warwick rode towards the place where the Scottiſh Army lay, to view their manner of encamping: As they return'd an Herald and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them, who having obtain'd an Audience, the Trumpeter ſaid, that the Lord Huntley, his Maſter, to ſpare effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, would fight upon the whole Quarrel, either with twenty againſt twenty, or with ten againſt ten, or elſe try it between the Lord-General and himſelf. The Protector answer'd, That for number of Combatants, it was not in his power to conclude any Bargain; and as for himſelf, that being in publick charge, it was not fit he ſhould hazard himſelf againſt a Man of private conditions, which otherwiſe he would moſt willingly accept. Here the Earl of Warwick entreated the Lord-General that he might accept the Challenge; and, Trumpeter, (ſaith he) bring me Word that thy Maſter will perform the Combat with me, and thou ſhalt have an hundred Crowns for thy pains. Nay, rather (ſaith the Lord-General) bring me Word that thy Maſter will abide and give us Battel, and thou ſhalt have a thouſand Crowns for thy pains. And thereupon, when no other Agreement could be made, a general Battel was reſolv'd on. In the Army of the Scots were Five or Six and thirty thouſand Men; in the Avant-guard commanded by the Earl of Angus, about Fifteen thouſand; in the Battel, over whom was the Lord-Governor, about Ten thouſand; and in the Rear as many, led by the valiant Gordon, Earl of Huntley. Hackbutters they had none, nor Men at Arms, but about Two thouſand Horſemen, (Prickers, as they term them) the reſt were all on foot, well furniſh'd with Jacks and Scull, Pikes, Daggers, Bucklers made of Board, and ſlicing Swords, broad and thin: Every Man had a long Kercheif folded twice or thrice about his Neck, and many of them had Chains of Latin drawn three or four times about their Hoſe or Doublet-ſleeves. They had alſo, to affright the Enemy's Horſe, great Rattles cover'd with Parchment or Paper, and ſmall Stones within put upon Staffs three Ells long. And now both Armies joyn'd in Battel, where, after a long Fight, and much variety of Fortune on both ſides, at length the Victory fell to the Engliſh. In this Fight diverſe of the Nobility of Scotland were ſlain; of the inferior ſort, about Ten or (as ſome ſay) Fourteen thouſand: Of the Engliſh were ſlain One and fifty Horſemen, and one Footman, but many hurt. The Lord Gray was dangerously thruſt with a Pike in the Mouth, which ſtruck two inches into his Neck. The Scottiſh Priſoners, accounted by the Maſhal's Book, were about Fifteen hundred, the chief whereof were the Earl of Huntley, the Lords Yeſter, Hobley, and Hamilton, the Maſter of Sanc-poole, and the Lord of Weems. The Earl of Huntley being ask'd, while he was a Priſoner, how he ſtood affected to the Marriage, made this Answer, That he liked liked the Marriage well enough, but he liked not this kind of wooing. This Victory of Musselborough against the Scots was on the Tenth of December, the very same Day on which, Thirty Years before, a Victory had been had against them at Flodden Field; so as, it seems, this Day was fatal to the Scots, and confirms the Opinion of Astrologers, that there are Days to some Men fortunate, and unfortunate to others, if they could be known.

This Victory struck such a Terroure into many of the Scots, that the Earl of Bothwell, and divers chief Gentlemen of Trivale, submitted themselves to the King of England, and were receiv'd by the Protector into his protection. After this the English Army took many Towns and Castles, and then, for want of Provision, return'd into England, having not stay'd above Five and twenty Days in Scotland, and not lost above Threescore Men. After the taking of Musselborough, the Duke of Somerset made many Knights, but three especially; namely, Sir Ralph Sadler Treasurer, Sir Francis Bryan Captain of the Light-Horse, and Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Horsemen: He made Bannetts, which is a Dignity above a Knight, and next to a Baron; and these were the last that from that time to this did ever receive this Dignity. But, notwithstanding this great Overthrow at Musselborough, the Governor of Scotland would not yet be quiet, but assembling the People, made unto them an Oration, exhorting them to defend the Liberty of their Country, and not to be daunted with any Event of War.

In this time many Distractions and Troubles happen'd in England, partly in matter of Religion, and partly about Inclosures. And first for Inclosures, the Lord Protector caused Proclamation to be set forth, commanding, that they who had inclosed any Lands accusom'd to lie open, should, upon a certain pain, before a Day assign'd, lay them open again. And then in matters of Religion, certain Injunctions were set forth for removing of Images out of Churches; and divers Preachers were sent with Instructions to dissuade the People from praying to Saints, or for the Dead; from the use of Beads, Ashes, and Processions; from Masses, Dirges, praying in an unknown Tongue; and for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed publickly to be read in Churches: And many, for offering to maintain these Ceremonies, were either punish'd, or forced to recant. Edmund Bonner, Bishop of London, was committed to the Fleet for refusing to receive these Injunctions. Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was likewise committed first to the Fleet, and after to the Tower, for that he had preach'd, 'Twere well these Changes in Religion should be stay'd until the King were of Years to govern by himself. For the like Causes Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Heath Bishop of Rocheſter, and Day Bishop of Chicheſter, were in like manner committed to Prison, and all of them disposseſs'd of their Bishopricks: And that which was worse, the Bishopricks themselves were disposseſs'd of their Revenues, in such sort, that a very small part remain'd to the Bishops that came after.

And now a Parliament was held, in the First Year of the King, and by Prorogation in the Second, wherein divers Chuntries, Colleges, free Chapels, Fraternities, and Guilds, with all their Lands and Goods, were given to the King; which being sold at a low rate, enrich'd many, and ennobled some, and thereby made them firm in maintaining the Change: Also it was then order'd, that no Man should speak against receiving the Eucharist in both Kinds; and, that Bishops should be placed by Collation of the King under his Letters-patent, without any Election preceeding, or Confirmation ensuing; and, that all Procesſes Ecclesiastical should be made in the King's Name, as in Writs at the Common-Law; and, that all Persons exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction should have the King's Arms in the Seals of their Office: And further, the Statute of the Six Articles, and other Statutes concerning punishment of Lollards, were repeal'd, and the King's Supremacy over the Church of England was confirm'd.

All this while the Wars in Scotland continued, and were manag'd by the Lord Gray of Wilton with variable success: And now about this time was sent to him in aid the Earl of Shrewsbury, with Fifteen thousand Men: Against him, in aid of the Scots, was sent the Rhinegrave with Ten thousand French; who entring into consultation how to remove the young Queen out of the reach of the English, provided a Fleet, and sailing round about Scotland, notwithstanding the English Fleet lay in wait to impede their passage, yet convey'd her safely into France, being then but six years old, accompanied in the Journey with James her base Brother, John Erskin, and William Levison; and in April following she was married to Francis the Dauphin of France.

You heard before the Alterations in Religion, now hear the Troubles: For when the Injunctions were sent abroad into the Country, and Commissioners appointed to see them executed, one Mr. Boddy, a Commissioner, as he was pulling down Images in Cornwall, was suddenly by a Priest stab'd in the Body with a Knife. Hereupon the People flock'd together in divers parts of the Shire, taking Arms, and beginning to commit Outrages: And altho' the chief Offender was hang'd and quarter'd in Smithfield, and many of his Complices executed in divers parts of the Realm, and withal a Pardon proclaim'd to all that would lay down their Arms, yet neither could that Severity, nor this Lenity, restrain them from their Insolencies, but in divers Countries, as Sussex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Warwickshire, Worcestershire, but especially Somersetshire and Devonshire, great Assemblies of People gather'd to a head, whose chief Leaders were Humphrey Arundel, and about six others of inferior note, and many Priests. Some of these (we may say) were Commonwealth Mutineers, and some mutinied for Religion: They who were for the Commonwealth could agree upon nothing; some would have no Justices, some no Gentlemen, some no Lawyers, nor ordinary Courts of Justice; but above all, Inclosures must down; but whether all, or which, or how to be employ'd, none could tell. The Religious Mutineers were not altogether so various in their Voices, as having some few amongst amongst 'em by whom they were guided; these in the name of the People hammer'd up these Articles following, upon granting of which they profess'd, that both their Bodies and Goods should be at the King's devotion.

1. That Curates should administer Baptism at all times of Necessity, as well on Week-days as on Holy-days.
2. That their Children might be confirm'd by the Bishop.
3. That the Mass might be celebrated, no Man communicating with the Priest.
4. That they might have Reservation of the Lord's Body in their Churches.
5. That they might have holy Bread, and holy Water, in remembrance of Christ's precious Body and Blood.
6. That Priests might live unmarried.
7. That the Six Articles set forth by King Henry the Eighth might be continued, at least till the King should come to full Age.

Upon these Demands, altho' the King knew that Reasons would little prevail with unreasonable Men, yet to discharge the Place he held, he sent them in writing Answers to them all, and withal a general Pardon, if they would desist and lay down Arms; but the seditious growing the more outrageous the fairer they were entreated, and finding themselves unable to subsist with their own Estates, began to think upon the spoil of Cities: And first they came to Exeter, and demanded entrance, which the Citizens refusing, they fell to set fire of the Gates; but the Citizens prevented this, by casting in Wood and maintaining the Fire till they had cast up a half-Moon within; upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were presently hewn and cut in pieces. After this they mined the Walls, laid Poudre, and ramm'd the Mouth, but the Citizens prevented this also, by making a Countermine, whereinto they poured such plenty of Water that the wet Poudre could not be fired. All this while the Lord Russel, Lord Privy-Seal, who had been sent down to suppress the Commotion, lay at Honyton expecting more Forces, whilst the Citizens of Exeter, for twelve Days together, endur'd so great a Famine that they were fain to eat Horses, and make Bread of coarse Bran moulded in Cloths, for otherwise it would not cleave together. At last the Lord Gray came to the Lord Russel with a supply of Forces; who, after many Conflicts with the Rebels, forced them to raise their Siege at Exeter, and thereby freed the City from many Miseries, to whom the King afterward gave the Mannor of Eyland in reward for their Loyalty. After this, the Rebels rallying their Forces, were again set upon by the King's Army, and the greatest part of 'em slain, the rest fled; many were taken and executed by Martial Law; the chief Leaders were sent to London, and there executed. The Sedition being thus suppress'd, 'tis memorable what sport Sir William Kingsfon the Provost-Martial made, by vertue of his Office, upon Men in misery. One Boyer, Mayor of Bodmyn in Cornwall, had been amongst the Rebels, not willingly, but enforced; to him the Provost sent word, he would come and dine with him, for whom the Mayor made great Provision: A little before Dinner the Provost took the Mayor aside, and whisper'd him in the Ear, That an Execution must that Day be done in the Town, and therefore requir'd to have a pair of Gallows set up against Dinner should be done. The Mayor fail'd not of his charge. Presently after Dinner the Provost taking the Mayor by the Hand, entreated him to lead him to the place where the Gallows was; which when he beheld, he ask'd the Mayor if he thought them to be strong enough. Yes, (said the Mayor) doubtless they are. Well then, said the Provost, get you up speedily, for they are provided for you. I hope (answer'd the Mayor) you mean not as you speak. In faith (saith the Provost) there is no Remedy, for you have been a busie Rebel. And so, without respite or defence, he was hang'd to death; a most uncourteous part for a Guest to offer his Host! Near the said place dwelt a Miller, who had been a busie Actor in that Rebellion, who fearing the approach of the Marshal, told a sturdy fellow his Servant, that he had occasion to go from home, and therefore bid him, that if any Man came to enquire after the Miller, he should not speak of him, but say, that himself was the Miller, and had been so for three Years before. So the Provost came, and call'd for the Miller; when out comes the Servant, and saith he was the Man. The Provost demanded how long he had kept the Mill. These three Years, answer'd the Servant. Then the Provost commanded his men to lay hold on him, and hang him on the next Tree: At this the Fellow cried out, that he was not the Miller, but the Miller's Man. Nay, Sir, (said the Provost) I will take you at your word; and if thou beest the Miller, thou'rt a busie Knave; if thou beest not, thou'rt a false lying Knave; and howsoever, thou canst never do thy Master better Service than to hang for him. And so, without more ado, he was dispatch'd.

When this Sedition in Devonshire was appeased, there arose another in Norfolk, and that specially upon a Grievance for Inclosures. The Rebels had got one Robert Ket, a Tanner of Wymondham, to be their Leader, and were grown to a Body of 20000, seating themselves at Mount-Surrey, where they carried a face as it were of Justice and Religion; for they had one Conyers, an idle fellow, to be their Chaplain, who Morning and Evening read solemn Prayers; also Sermons they had often: And as for Justice, they had a Bench under a Tree, where Ket usually sate, and with him Two of every Hundred whence their Companions had been rais'd, to hear Complaints, and give Judgment; and from hence were Warrants sent in the King's Name, to bring in Poudre, Shot, Victuals, and all things necessary; which Tree hath ever since been call'd the Tree of Reformation. And now being grown to a height, they presented certain Complaints to the King, requiring he would send a Herald to them, to give them Satisfaction. The King, tho' he took it for a great Indignity, to have such base fellows to capitulate with him, yet framing himself to the Time, he return'd this Answer, That in October following he would call a Parliament, wherein their Complaints should be heard, and all their Grievances should be redress'd; requiring them in the mean time to lay down Arms and return to their Houses; and thereupon granting them a

But this was so far from satisfying the Seditious, that hereupon first they assaulted the Town of Norwich, took it, and made the Mayor attend them as their Servant, and then return'd again to their Station at Moussbold. Not long after, William Parre, Marquis of Norhampton, with the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wintworth, divers Knights, and 1500 Horse, with a small Band of Italians, was sent against them, whom the Seditious so stoutly oppos'd, that much Mischief was done on both sides. The Lord Sheffield falling with his Horse in a Ditch, was taken Prisoner, and as he pull'd off his Helmet to shew who he was, he was by a Butcher stricken down with a Club, and slain. So as the Marquis with his Forces not prevailing, there was afterward sent the Earl of Warwick with 6000 Foot and 1500 Horse, with whom were the Lords Willoughby, Powis, and Bray, his two Sons Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of name. When the Earl was come near to the Camp of the Seditious, he sent an Herald to them, offering them the King's Pardon if they would desist; but they were so far from accepting it, that a lewd Boy turning up his naked Breach towards the Herald, bid him kiss it. Upon this many Skirmishes pass'd between the Earl and them, with loss sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another: At last they came to Battel, where the Rebels placed in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken Prisoners, meaning they should be the first slain, of whom yet very few were hurt, but of the Rebels were slain above Two thousand. And now once again the Earl offer'd them Pardon if they would desist; but, for all their losses, they continued obstinate still. At last the Earl sent to know if they would entertain their Pardon in case he should come in person and assure 'em of it. This mov'd them much; and then they answer'd, They knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and causing their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Weapons, wishing all Joy and Prosperity to the King. Nine of the principal Rebels were hang'd upon the Tree of Reformation: Ket himself flying away, was taken and hang'd in Chains upon Norwich Castle. The Day of this Defeat of the Seditious was a long time after observ'd for a Festival Day by the Inhabitants of Norwich. And thus ended the Sedition in Norfolk; when at the same time another rose in Yorkshire, whereof the chief movers were William Ombler a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish-Clerk, and Stevenson a Poet, to whom were assembled Four or Five thousand, who took their Encouragement from a certain Prophecy, which did foretell, that the time should come when there should be no King; when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroy'd; when the Realm should be ruled by four Governors elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in Commotion, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England; and that time they understood to be the present; and, that the Rebels of Devonshire, Norfolk, and Yorkshire should draw together to accomplish this Prophecy. But as soon as they heard that the Tumults of Devonshire and Norfolk were quieted, they found that they were deceiv'd in the understanding of the Prophecy; and thereupon presently, upon the King's Pardon, they fell off and dispers'd: Their chief Leaders, Ombler, Dale, and four others, were executed at Tyk; and with this the Spirit of Sedition was quite laid in all places of this Kingdom.

But the King of France taking advantage of these Seditions, tho' he had been in Treaty of Peace with England before, yet now he brake off the Treaty, proclaim'd War, and denounc'd it by his Ambassador to the King. Hereupon all Frenchmen in England, not Denizens, were taken Prisoners, and all their Goods seiz'd for the King; which the French King understanding, he sent a Fleet of Ships to surprize Guernsey and Jersey, but was repell'd with the loss of a thousand Men. After this, he levied an Army by Land, and went himself in person against Buloign, defended by the valiant Sir Nicholas Arnold; but being weary of the Work, he left his Lieutenant Chatillon to pursue the Siege; who having made many fierce Batteries, and at last Assaults, and not prevailing, he then attempted to hinder the Town from supply of Victuals: And to this end charg'd a Galley with Gravel and Stones, meaning to sink it in the Haven; but the English took the Galley before it was sunk, and made use of the Stones for their own defence. After this they made Faggots of light matter mix'd with Pitch, Tarr, Tallow, Rosin, Powder, and Wild-fire, with intention to fire the Ships in the Haven; but that Enterprize was defeated by the Buloigners, and the Faggots taken from the French; and more than this there was little done in those parts at this time.

But in England, in the mean time, an unfortunate Accident happen'd, which beginning upon a very light Occasion, produced afterward very heavy Effects; whereof tho' there were many concurrent Circumstances, yet the original Cause was the Pride of a Woman, upon a point indeed wherein the Natures of Women are commonly most tender, Precedency of Place. The Protector had married Ann Stanhope, a Woman of a haughty Stomach; and the Lord-Admiral, his Brother the Queen-Dowager, a Lady of great mildness. The nearness of the Husbands gave occasions of the Ladies often meeting, where the Dutcheffs would inwardly murmur, why she, being the Wife of the elder Brother, and the better Man, should give place to her who was the Wife of the younger Brother, and the meaner Man. This Envy of hers towards the Queen bred a Malice in her towards the Admiral, as thinking the Mischief she did to the Husband to be a part of Revenge upon the Wife; and tho' the Queen shortly after died in Childbed, yet the Malice of the Dutcheffs towards the Admiral lived still (so hard a thing it is for Malice, once settled in a Woman's Heart, to be remov'd.) Out of this Malice she puts divers Surmises into her Husband the Protector's Head, against his Brother the Admiral, as tho' he went about to procure his Death, to the end he might aspire to the Place he held; but certainly, as misliking his Government, being a Protestant, who was himself a Papist: In this case Causes of Jealousie against the Admiral were obvious enough; for it was known known that in King Henry's time, he had aim'd at the Marriage of the Lady Elizabeth, King Henry's second Daughter; and now his Wife the Queen Dowager being dead, (and not without suspicion of Poyson) he fell upon that Marriage afresh, which could not be thought to tend but to some very high-aspiring End. The Protector, a plain Man, and one that had not the deepest insight into Practices, whether too importunately provoked by his Wife, or whether out of an honest Mind, not willing to patronize Faults, though in a Brother, gave way to Accusations brought against him; so as in a Parliament then holden, he was accused for attempting to get into his custody the Person of the King and Government of the Realm; for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth, the King's Sister; for persuading the King in his tender Years to take upon him the Rule and Ordering of himself. Upon which points (though perhaps proved, yet not sufficiently, against him, who was never called to his Answer) he was by Act of Parliament condemned; and within few Days after Condemnation, a Warrant was sent under the Hand of his Brother the Protector, to cut off his Head: Wherein (as after it prov'd) he did as much as if he had laid his own Head down upon the Block: For whilst these Brothers lived and held together, they were as a strong Fortrefs one to the other; the Admirals Courage supporting the Protector's Authority, and the Protector's Authority maintaining the Admiral's Stoutness; but the Admiral once gone, the Protector's Authority, as wanting support, began to totter, and fell at last to utter ruin. Besides, there was at this time, amongst the Nobility, a kind of Faction; Protestants, who favoured the Protector for his own sake, and other of the Papal Inclination, who favoured him for his Brother's sake: But his Brother being gone, both sides forsook him, even his own side, as thinking they could expect little assistance from him, who gave no more assistance to his own Brother. And perhaps more than all this, the Earl of Warwick, at this time, was the most powerful Man both in Courage and Council amongst all the Nobility, and none so near to watch him as the Admiral, while he lived; but he being gone, there was none left that either was able and durst, or durst and was able to stand against him. However, it was not long after the Admiral's Death the Protector was invaded with several Accusations; wherein the Earl of Warwick made not always the greatest show, but had yet always the greatest hand. One thing the Protector had done, which, though a private act, yet gave a publick Distaste.

To make him a Mansion-house in the Strand; (the same which is now called Somerfet-house) he pulled down a Church and two Bishops Houses by the Strand-Bridge; in digging the Foundation whereof, the Bones of many who had been there buried were cast out, and carried into the Fields: And because the Stones of those Houses and the Church sufficed not for his work, the Steeple and most part of the Church of St. John's of Jerusalem, near Smithfield, was mined and overthrown with Powder, and the Stones applied to this spacious Building; and more than this, the Cloyster of Paul's on the North side of the Church, in a place called Par-don Church-yard, and the Dance of Death very curiously wrought about the Cloyster, and a Chapel that stood in the midst of the Church-yard, also the Charnel House that stood on the South side of Paul's, (now a Carpenter's Yard) with the Chapel, Timber, and Monuments therein, were beaten down, the Bones of the Dead carried into Finsbury Fields, and the Stones converted into this Building. This Act of the Protector's did something alienate the Peoples Minds from him; which the Earl of Warwick perceiving, thought it now a fit time to be falling upon him; and thereupon drew eighteen of the Privy-Council to joyn with him, who withdrawing themselves from the Court, held secret Consultations together, and walked in the City with many Servants weaponed, and in new Liveries. Whereof when the Protector heard, he sent Secretary Petre to them, to know the Causes of their Assembly, requiring them to resort to him peaceably, that they might commune together as Friends: But in the mean time he armed Five hundred Men, and removed the King by Night from Hampton-Court to Windsor. On the other side, the Lords at London, having first taken Possession of the Tower, sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of the City to the Earl of Warwick's Lodging at Ely-House in Holbourn; to whom the Lord Rich, then Lord Chancellor, made a long Oration, wherein he shewed the ill Government of the Lord Protector, and the many Mischiefs that by it were come upon the Kingdom, and hereupon required them to joyn with the Lords there assembled to remove him. And presently that Day a Proclamation was made in divers parts of the City to that purpose, to which the Lords and Councillors that subscribed their Names were these; the Lord Rich Chancellor, the Lord Saint-John Lord great Master, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick Lord great Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundell Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Cheney Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Constable of the Tower, Sir William Petre Secretary, Sir Edward North Knight, Sir Edmund Montague Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Edward Watton, Sir Richard Southwell, Knights, and Doctor Watton, Dean of Canterbury. In the Afternoon of the same Day the Lord Mayor assembled a Common-Council in Guild-hall, where two Letters arrived almost in one instant, one from the King and the Lord Protector, for a thousand Men to be raised for defence of the King's Person; another from the Lords at London, for Two thousand Men to aid them in defence of the King's Person also; both pretending alike, and therefore hard how to please them both. The Recorder set forth the Complaint of the Lords against the Protector in such sort, that he made many inclinable to favour that side: But one named George Stallow, better advised, stept up, and in a long Speech shewed what Mischiefs had come to the City by opposing the King; and therefore gave his Opinion, to suspend giving Aid to the Lords, at least for a time. His Advice was hearkned unto and
